But our quarrel is not alone with either get up of cover or poverty of preface. The teller of the "Legend," the biographer, is, as Mr. Sebastian Evans tells us in the preface, "a simple-minded brother of Assisi." His language is a piece of cloth from a provincial loom, grey and coarse as the first Franciscan Habit itself, just such as best suits Brother Francis." What, then, could have induced the translator to depart from this double pattern of simplicity to indulge his nineteenth century readers with archaic English of the Elizabethan time? Some of his readers will probably be so simple as not to know what "sihence," "eftsoon," "uneath" mean, and will wonder why Mr. Sebastian Evans prefers the constant use of the phrase "make him be heal," for the phrase "make himself whole," or "cure himself"; or why, when he speaks of St. Francis being vexed to see a man with a doleful countenance, he must needs write "and therefore did it irk him to see sadness in the cheer." All this is pure affectation, certainly out of place in an attempt to render into modern English mediæval Latin; and it is the more regrettable in that with some few blunders and mistranslations, and here and there some slight omission of an important word, the translator has entered thoroughly into the spirit of the biography, and gives a very sufficient and literal rendering of the original. To take one or two instances—Chapter 90, "conversari" is clearly the technical term in monkish latinity for the profession of Monasticism, for the leading of the monkish lives, the profession of monkhood, and has nothing to do with our idea of communion or converse in the ordinary sense. In chapter 92 "conversio" again must mean the taking of the monkish habit; in chapter 93 "suspendebatur ad coelum" must mean only that he stood as one in a trance, rapt upward into Heaven, and cannot by any possibility be translated, as Mr. Sebastian Evans has done, "hang suspended from Heaven." In chapter 100 "curialis doctor cantorum" cannot well mean "right courteous doctor of singers," but probably means the court teacher of singing, or the official singing master. These are, it is true, insignificant mistranslations, but they tend to shake confidence in Mr. Evans' knowledge of Monkish Latinity.

Meanwhile we have much to be thankful for, for it is clear that the translator has taken pains in many ways to give us the literal meaning of Brother Leo's narrative, and to English ears that can get rid of the affectations of archaisms, this little volume, that brings us face to face with the Poverello, lays us under deep obligation to translator and publisher alike.

Not before it was in urgent request by English readers has the second English edition of Sabatier's LIFE OF ST. FRANCIS OF ASSISI (9s. n.) made its appearance. Messrs. Hodder and Stoughton are to be congratulated on having produced it in less bulky form and at less cost. Mrs. Houghton's translation is most praiseworthy, and, though the lucidity and picturesqueness of Paul Sabatier's French is wanting, the English reader will find in this volume a quite sufficient rendering of the Huguenot ex-clergyman's interesting and scholarly life of his friend Saint Francis.

The volume is worth obtaining for its introduction alone, and its concluding chapter, "The Critical Study of the Sources," while, to the student of the cross currents of history and tradition, the appendix, with its critical study of the stigmata and the indulgence of August 2nd, will always be of deep interest. Devotion to a cause and its hero, untiring industry, a rare scholarship, an abundant sense of humour, and a power of good-fellowship with the peasant life whose leader he has so faithfully delineated; this, combined with the deep feeling for a purer religion for the people, makes Sabatier specially fitted for his task. It is to the lasting credit of the townsmen of Assisi that they have recognized in their literary guest a real helper of their commonweal, and have granted Sabatier the freedom of the city. The scholarly brilliance of this book has won for it the honour of being crowned by the French Academy, and though, in our insularity, no single University has thought it worth their while to honour the chronicler of one of the greatest religious reformers of the middle ages, in Europe this book is already a classic, and loved by all students of St. Francis throughout the Continent.

FINNISH POETRY.

The Traditional Poetry of the Finns. By Domenico Comparetti. Translated by Isabella M. Anderton. With Introduction by Andrew Lang. 9x6in., xxvii.+350 pp. London, 1898. Longmans. 16/-

We welcome with keen pleasure this English version of Comparetti's masterly treatise, and cordially congratulate the careful translator on the successful accomplishment of her arduous task. For the English lover of folk-lore, or student of comparative mythology, the book is of the highest importance. No fragile structure reared on the quicksand of theory or the barren waste of pedantry, Comparetti's work is a sound fabric built on the solid foundation of the comparative method and of well-attested facts—facts, too, that could be obtained only from actual intercourse with Finns, an intimate acquaintance with the literature, both in Finnish and Swedish, of Finland itself, and a knowledge of the living native language of that country. Not without reason does Mr. Andrew Lang, in his scholarly Introduction, say: "The learned will be obliged to reckon with Comparetti. It is not in vain that he has four times visited the blameless Hyperboreans, and minutely studied the popular and scientific literature of a difficult language." Comparetti himself, in alluding to "the remoteness and uncommonness of a subject known and familiar to few outside Finland," frankly admits that he learned much from scholars there that was useful for the purposes of his study. Indeed, the great number of references to the writings of Finns may astonish a reader who is unaware of the large amount of literature bearing on the subject of our author's book that had been already evolved by native writers. The wide extent of the vista presented, the minute elaboration of its various parts, and the multifarious aspects depicted render it impossible for us adequately to describe the whole in the limited space at our disposal. We must, however, draw attention to one particular phase, the importance of the Magic Song or Magic Rune, which is much insisted on by Comparetti, but which has been too often ignored.

As the author maintains this to be the earliest form of the Finnic rune, he holds that we cannot understand or define the nature or origin of the epic rune of the "Kalevala," except

is the rune par excellence; it is imbued with the life of the people, with its religious past, with its memories, with its ideals. The part which magic action plays in the "Kalevala" and the numerous magic runes introduced into the poem in their entirety by Lönnrot afford excellent proof of its reality and importance, as well as of its epic function among the Finns. The magic song is conspicuous enough among many peoples, but its poetical value is generally small, and it holds but an unimportant place in the history of their poetry. Here, on the contrary, it plays a principal part: with it appears and develops not only poetry of word and conception, but also the poetical myth.

As Comparetti does not fail to remind us, it was long ago observed by Porthan, in his "De Poesi Fennica" ("Op. selecta," III., p. 373), that the rune was, in the beginning, magic. As an essential part of the national poetry the magic runes reveal its antiquity, and are, moreover, a useful source of knowledge as regards the ancient mythology of the Finns. Further, the epic runes, having sprung from the magic, are largely indebted to them for their peculiarities.

Comparetti has divided his work into two parts. In the first chapter of the first part, which is explanatory, we find general definitions and information about Finnish folk-song, e.g., an account of the various stores of Finnish traditional poetry, especially those brought together by Lönnrot; a full description of the old verse-form or rune of the Finns; notices of the poetry of other Ugro-Finnic peoples, particularly the Lapps and Estonians; and a description of the manner in which the runes are sung. The second chapter consists of an epitome of the "Kalevala," whilst the third is devoted to a study of its composition. The second part of the book is theoretical, and endeavours to explain the original sources, development, and life of Finnish traditional poetry in both the dæmonic and heroic aspects of its mythic creations. The third chapter of the second part is a dissertation on and a history of the "rune," and points out how Finnic myth and poetry were influenced by contact with Germanic and Lithu-Slav races, and how the ancient Shamanism of the Finns was gradually modified by this means. In a final survey of the whole subject of the book, the "Kalevala" is contrasted with the national epics of other peoples, and general deductions are made as regards their origin. It is perhaps in this final survey that the special merit of Comparetti, that of applying the comparative method to solve the problem of the development of national epics, is most conspicuous. Such a method may indeed be destructive of many a long-cherished hypothesis, but it is the only one that is sound. Our author's work being of a studious and scientific character, he does not dilate much on the beauty and charm of Finnish folk-song. He is far more concerned with its origin, development, and composition than with its æsthetic qualities. One singular excellence of the book, i.e., the accuracy of the Finnish quotations, will probably be appreciated by few English readers; but one unfortunate defect, the absence of an index, will certainly be felt by all.

AUBREY BEARDSLEY.

Following upon "The Eulogy" of Beardsley by Mr. Robert Ross, published in the illustrated edition of "Volpone," and shortly preceding A SECOND BOOK OF FIFTY DRAWINGS (Smithers, 10s. 6d.), Mr. Arthur Symons' well-weighed essay, AUBREY BEARDSLEY (Unicorn Press, 2s. 6d.), read in conjunction with these volumes, will be of service in enabling the reader to form a just estimate of the value of this artist's remarkable work.

He had [writes Mr. Symons] the fatal speed of those who are to die young; that disquieting completeness and extent of knowledge, that absorption of a lifetime in an hour, which we find in those who hasten to have done their work before noon, knowing that they will not see the evening.

This foreknowledge of an early end may account for much of Beardsley's more incomplete and, as it were, furtive work, and perhaps for much of that "mere gaminerie" which at one time prevented his drawings from being generally appreciated. Much of his work was always a mystery to the public and even to some other men of his profession. On this point Mr. Symons writes—somewhat cynically perhaps:—

Every artist has his own secret, beyond the obvious one, of why he works. So far as it is not the mere need of earning one's living, it is generally some unhappiness, some dissatisfaction with the things about one, some too desperate or too contemptuous sense of the meaning of existence. At one period of his life a man works at his art to please a woman; then he works because he has not pleased a woman; and then because he is tired of pleasing her. Work for the work's sake it always must be, in a profound sense; and with Beardsley, not less certainly than with Blake or with Rossetti. But that other, that accidental, insidious, significant motive was, with Beardsley, the desire to fill his few working years with the immediate echo of a great notoriety.

Mr. Symons speaks of Beardsley as "the satirist of an age without convictions," a description supported by some of the illustrations given in the Unicorn Press volume and in the "Second Book of Fifty Drawings." The latter collection contains much immature work which, although far from beautiful, is of value in that it gives some idea of the links between Beardsley's ever varying styles. Among the many hitherto unpublished drawings in this volume perhaps the most interesting is one lent for reproduction by Mr. Joseph Pennell. This is an unfinished drawing of a robed figure entitled "A Suggested Reform in Ballet Costume"; it is in the manner in which Beardsley illustrated "The Rape of the Lock," a style likely to have made the artist as much appreciated by the general public as he now is by the men who work in his own particular medium.

Immediately after the publication of the books we have mentioned comes THE EARLY WORK OF AUBREY BEARDSLEY (John Lane, 31s. 6d.), with some two hundred reproductions of Beardsley's pictures from the Yellow Book, and designs and decorations of other published books already well known to all interested in the artist's work. But Mr. Lane's collection also includes a host of hitherto unpublished drawings which are of great value to the student. There is the first drawing of "The Toilette of Salome," decoratively speaking, of far greater merit than that which appeared in the volume. There is a wonderful portrait of Miss Letty Lind in The Artist's Model which is not generally known, and a title-page to "Venus and Tannhäuser." An excellent portrait of Mr. Harland as a young man reminds us that it is already some years since the Yellow Book came and went. Some of the drawings noted in this book as "unpublished" have already appeared in Mr. Smithers' volume of "Fifty Drawings"; for example, the present book has a "Title-page ornament," "hitherto unpublished," which appears in the "Fifty Drawings" as a portrait—and a very clever one, too—of Madame Réjane; the Messalina is in both collections as well as many others. In spite of an inclination to pad out the volume with the reproduction of the whole series of title-pages for the "Keynote" books, and the inclusion of some early work utterly without distinction, Mr. Lane's volume is a remarkable monument to the gifts and powers with which Beardsley was endowed. This work contains, too, reproductions of portrait studies of Beardsley which are certainly the best that have been published. Mr. Marillier, who writes the introduction, does not appear to possess the intimate knowledge of Mr. Ross, nor the sensitivity and happy knack of phrase of Mr. Symons, but his view is a fairly just one, and his article full of information and criticism which is sound, as far as its limitations will permit. He closes his introduction by saying: "His death has removed a quaint and amiable personality from among us; a butterfly who played at being serious, and yet a busy worker who played at being a butterfly. Outwardly he lived in the sunshine, airing bright wings. Inwardly no one can tell how he suffered or strove. It is well to avoid self-righteousness in judging him. As the wise pastry-cook says in Cyrano:—

'Fourmi, n'insulte pas ces divines cigales.'"

We, however, desire only to consider him as an artist, and these books demonstrate his right to praise.

A REAL MAHÂTMAN.

Ramakrishna: his Life and Sayings. By the Rt. Hon. F. Max Müller, K.M. 7½ x 5 in., xi. + 200 pp. London, 1898. Longmans. 5/-

This sympathetic study of a celebrated modern Indian saint has been prompted to some extent by the desire to correct certain popular misconceptions on the subject of Indian asceticism. It is, in fact, a continuation of the much-debated article on "A Real Mahâtmán" which Professor Max Müller wrote for the Nineteenth Century a couple of years ago. His object, then and now, is at once "to protest against the wild and overcharged accounts of Saints and Sages, living and teaching at present in India, which had been published and scattered broadcast in Indian, American, and English papers," and at the same time to show that "behind such strange names as Indian Theosophy, and Esoteric Buddhism, and all the rest, there was something real, something worth knowing." His main point, of course, is familiar to all students of Indian religion—that these saints, Mahâtmanas, Samnyâsins, Yogins were no new invention, but a recognized phase of Brahmanical ascetism for centuries upon centuries. They are not, indeed, at the present day, precisely what they were intended to be. The men who now call themselves Samnyâsins and whom the people call Sâdhus do not go through the strict studentship, or pass the stage of the married householder, or dwell for years in the seclusion of a forest, as they should according to the laws of Manu. "They seem free at any time of their life to throw off all restraints, if need be their very clothing, and begin to preach and teach whenever and wherever they can find people willing to listen to them." In this they resemble the ancient Vratyas, and have something in common with the Buddhists, as Professor Max Müller remarks:—

It is curious to observe how the Buddhist revolt was mainly based on the argument that if emancipation or spiritual freedom, as enjoyed in the third and more particularly in the fourth stage, was the highest goal of our life on earth, it was a mistake to wait for it till the very end of life. The Buddhists were in one sense Vratyas who declined to pass through the long and tedious discipline of a pupil, who considered the performance of the duties of a householder, including marriage and endless sacrifices, not only as unprofitable but as mischievous.

Ramakrishna's marriage certainly did not entail "endless sacrifices" (though this is not the Professor's meaning), for he "forgot entirely that he had been married," and when after many years his wife recalled herself to his memory, he only allowed her the privileges of a cook. She was a woman of large soul, however, and tended her saint nobly until cancer ended his devoted career some twelve years ago. His miraculous or Yoga powers seem to resolve themselves into hypnotic influence, thought-reading, and second sight, but he laid no stress upon them, and, even in the little that is here recorded about his will-power, it is possible to recognize the traces of that "dialogic process" by which the recorders of all religions tend towards the miraculous. One of Ramakrishna's disciples has furnished much of the material for his master's biography, and though he was warned not to supply fables and tales of apparitions of goddesses and the like—

Yet even his unvarnished description of his Master discloses here and there the clear traces of what I call the Dialogic Process and the irrepressible miraculizing tendencies of devoted disciples. And I am really glad that it does so, if only it helps to teach us that no historian can ever pretend to do more than to show us what a man or a fact seemed to be to him or to the authorities whom he has to follow, and not what he or it actually was.

This sound historical axiom may be borne in mind when we read the following passage:—

No doubt it is difficult to believe all the things which the ancient Yogins are credited with, and the achievements of modern Yogins also are often very startling. I confess I find it equally difficult to believe them or not to believe them. We are told by eye-witnesses and trustworthy witnesses that these Yogins go without food for weeks and months, that they can sit unmoved for any length of time, that they feel no pain, that they can mesmerize with their eyes and read people's thoughts. All this I can believe; but if the same authorities tell us that Yogins can see the forms of Gods and Goddesses moving in the sky, or that the ideal God appears before them, that they hear voices from the sky, perceive a divine fragrance, and lastly that they have been seen to sit in the air without any support, I must claim the privilege of St. Thomas a little longer, though I am bound to say that the evidence that has come to me in support of the last achievement is most startling.

We had rather Professor Max Müller had not written the words we have italicized. His "evidence," after all, only comes to "showing us what a fact seemed to be, not what it was," according to his own doctrine, and we would carry the privilege of St. Thomas to the last extreme if the "evidence" sought to show us that a Yogin seemed to be sitting up aloft in the air. But the marvellous is not the essential thing in this book. The life of Ramakrishna is interesting and instructive in a mere human way, and his spiritual and ideal aphorisms, albeit trite and monotonous, have their value as a modern application of the Vedânta philosophy to the needs of everyday life. The professor's very sympathetic exposition of Vedânta is peculiarly attractive, and one wishes for more of it. If philosophy is to be studied historically, as it should be, it is impossible to ignore this most ancient of all the world's systems, which has still a wide influence in India. The study has a practical bearing too; for "a country permeated by such thoughts as were uttered by Ramakrishna cannot possibly be looked upon as a country of ignorant idolators to be converted by the same methods which are applicable to the races of Central Africa."

NAVAL AND MILITARY.

Sir George Pomeroy-Colley. By Lieut.-General Sir W. F. Butler, K.C.B. 9 x 6 in., 431 pp. London, 1899. Murray. 21/-

An Empire such as ours offers the most varied careers to its citizens, and the life of Sir George Colley is a striking instance of the wide range of action and of influence which is open to an able soldier. Colley, who was descended from the same Irish stock as the Duke of Wellington, joined the dépôt of the 2nd Queen's at Kinsale in 1852. He passed a brilliant examination as a cadet, and later, at the Staff College, achieved almost unique success. As a young subaltern in South Africa, he attracted the notice of Sir George Grey, and after the little Transkei Expedition he was employed as border magistrate on the Bashee river. Excessively ambitious and disappointed at missing the opportunities of the Crimean War and the Mutiny, he contemplated seeking an entry into the Prussian service where, as he said, "I believe every one is allowed a fair chance and, indeed, encouraged to show what he has in him."

Returning to his regiment, after a long absence, he took part in the China Expedition of 1860 and gained his first experience of war. A five years' staff appointment at Devonport gave ample opportunities for study, and in the autumn of 1870 Major Colley was brought to the notice of Lord Northbrook by Sir Thomas Dyke Acland as an officer well fitted to assist in the impending reorganization of the Army. "In an official paper of Colley's," writes Sir W. Butler, "I find the entire scheme of infantry organization, militia and reserve organization, recruiting, and appointment of officers laid down in clearest detail, almost precisely as those departments of army system stand to-day." The principles of the so-called Cardwell organization had, however, been previously proposed by another officer, and amidst much that was excellent the scheme contained objectionable features which justify the "growls of a still active discontent." Colley's experience and knowledge of the old regimental system was slight, and his German studies were not sufficiently qualified by an adequate appreciation of the special and peculiar military requirements of Great Britain. The brief Ashanti operations of 1874 turned mainly upon the question of transport, and Colley's experience in handling African natives proved invaluable. The successful result of the expedition was largely due to his unflinching energy in managing the line of communications. Advancement and honours followed, and at the age of 38 he was "well on the road to the highest grades in his profession." An interesting political mission to Natal with Sir Garnet Wolseley brought him into contact with the Boers, and he significantly wrote that, in Pretoria,

"As in most of the Transvaal towns, the bulk of the population, and all the principal merchants are English, and looking forward to the country coming under English rule in some form or other."

The towns, however, did not really represent the popular feeling, and Colley in his report on the Transvaal failed, as did others, to fathom the character and the sentiments of the Boer farmers.

In 1876 Lord Lytton was sent to India to inaugurate a new policy, and selected Colley as his military secretary. The time was charged with important events, and the post "was fraught with issues and possibilities of greater consequence than had perhaps ever before been attached to it." Sir W. Butler sketches in outline the views of the conflicting schools with admirable impartiality; but Colley's opinions unfortunately cannot be given, and it is not possible to ascertain precisely the direction in which his great influence with the Viceroy was employed. He is said to have been one of those "whose views of desired extension did not reach beyond possession and command of the three principal passes . . . leading from India to Afghanistan." He accompanied Captain Sandeman's mission to Khelat, and played a personal part in securing the occupation of Quetta. After the first Afghan War, he opposed the retention of Kandahar; but, in regard to several of the burning questions of this period, his views cannot be deduced from the papers here published. When Cavagnari's party was massacred at Kabul, Colley was in South Africa for the fourth time, having been summoned from India to act as Chief of the Staff to Sir Garnet Wolseley. The Zulu War was over; but the Transvaal troubles were beginning, and Colley notes that Joubert "spoke well and earnestly; maintained his unchangeable opinion that the annexation was unjust and unnecessary," and frankly avowed his opposition. In November, 1879, Colley returned to India for a few months and was appointed Governor and Commander-in-Chief in Natal and the Transvaal shortly before the dissolution which overturned Lord Beaconsfield's Government. Sir W. Butler tells the story of the disastrous campaign which ended at Majuba Hill as it has never been told before. Colley had little or no experience in handling troops, and found himself in a position of great difficulty. It is easy to criticize the military operations; but no general in similar circumstances has shown a loftier spirit than Sir G. Colley. After the actions of Lang's Nek and the Ingogo, when unreflecting censure was rife, he seems to have been anxious only for the reputations of others. "I search in vain among these papers," writes Sir W. Butler, "for a single sentence of fault-finding, of censure upon subordinates, or of ungenerous language towards his enemies." This could not be said of many commanders to whom fortune has been kind. The book is exceedingly interesting throughout, and the author has succeeded in presenting a striking picture of a singularly attractive personality and of a notable career.

A Sailor's Life under Four Sovereigns. By Admiral the Hon. Sir Henry Keppel, G.C.B. 84 x 5 1/2 in., 340 + 339 + 350 pp. London, 1899. Macmillan. 30/- n.

The reading of the three volumes of autobiography which Admiral Keppel publishes under the name of a Sailor's Life leaves us with one regret. It is that the Admiral's memoirs were not prepared for the press by some such judicious friend as that Richard Sympson who edited the Travels of his cousin, Captain Lemuel Gulliver. Mr. Sympson, we remember, has told us in his brief preface to the reader, that "this volume would have been at least twice as large, if I had not made bold to strike out innumerable passages relating to" various matters not necessary to be recorded. These three volumes would have been about half their size if they had passed under the supervision of some Richard Sympson. There is much of the kind of matter which was undoubtedly suppressed in the voyages of Captain Gulliver—as, for instance, "Off the Dogger Bank we caught a lot of cod-fish. On August 4 we came into Peggy's Hole, North Shields." Other passages have not even the excuse that they are "in the style of sailors." "I read," so the Admiral records, "that in the beginning of 1818 the following Whigs dined together in compliment to Mr. Coke, at Wyndham, near Quidenham." A string of names follows. In another place Admiral Keppel notes that an American Presbyterian service heard in China was not at all like the service of the Church of England; while there are "innumerable passages" like this:—"Having been invited by Sir Charles and Lady Mary Fox to dinner at Addison Road, sent to Greenwich for clothes. Wife dining with the Dalrymple's." It is also to be kept in mind that parts of these memoirs cover ground already occupied by the Admiral's published account of his services against the Malay pirates, when he was captain first of the Dido, and then of the Moander. In short, there is a great deal of "skip" in these three volumes.

Yet for the reader who has some understanding of the art of skipping, and who also has some interest in the history of the Navy, there is not a little which will be both new and interesting. Admiral Keppel is one of the very few survivors of the old service, and, unlike many veterans, he has a singularly vivid memory for those details of daily life, and even of dress, about which it is commonly so difficult to get information. When he left the Royal Naval College at Portsmouth, the old school founded early in the last century by the elder Byng, and joined the Tweed, the Navy was exactly what it had been under Rodney, Howe, and Nelson. His chief at the College, Captain Loring, was a veteran of the war time who had made himself famous by suppressing a desperate mutiny in the Syren frigate in the West Indies. She had come out from Bantry Bay "in a thoroughly demoralized and mutinous state," being, no doubt, full of United Irishmen pressed into the Fleet. They laid a characteristic plot "to secure their new captain and officers, and join the pirates, who were then to be found in most parts of the West Indies," but were fairly beaten by the resolution of Loring. In Admiral Keppel's first years of service he had among his messmates some less fortunate survivors of the great war. These were the Masters' mates whom the Admiralty did not promote, but gave them the option of serving on. The duties of these elderly gentlemen were mostly nominal; they were styled mates of the hold, of stores, &c. They seldom appeared on deck except on Sundays, when they took their week's exercise. Their uniform was a blue coat in shape like our now plain evening dress, anchor buttons, and a small white cord edging, white pantaloons, Hessian boots, cocked hat, and sword.

Details of this kind may not attract many readers; but they do give glimpses of the old vanished life of the Navy. Others there are of a grimmer kind, as when the Admiral records that he attended a Court-martial in 1826. It was on the captain of the Ariadne. He was tried for having purchased a slave negress at Zanzibar and taken her to sea. "She mysteriously disappeared off the coast of Africa." He was dismissed the service. This officer appears to have executed the scheme of the wicked captain in Shadwell's "Fair Quaker of Deal," who plotted to abduct a young lady, reflecting that he could always throw her overboard if he was tired of her, and say she destroyed herself "in a calenture."

We need hardly add that there is a great deal more in "A Sailor's Life" than these reminiscences of the Old World, yet it is, perhaps, they which give its chief value to the book. The Admiral's later services are recorded elsewhere by himself, and others, and the newer times are familiar enough. And there is this to be said, that his memoirs do thoroughly deserve to be called "a sailor's life." Even in their most pillar-to-post and jolty passages they do convey by many and unconscious touches a picture of the type called "sailor" as he was seen, studied, and adapted to the stage by T. P. Cooke—who, by the way, was one of Admiral Keppel's acquaintances.

Memoirs of the days of the Peninsular War are not too common, and Mr. Sturgis has done good service in giving to the public this fascinating "autobiography." Robert Blakeney joined the 28th Regiment from his Galway home in 1804 at the age of fifteen, and in the next ten years saw enough campaigning for a lifetime. In 1828 he left the army, married a Venetian lady, and settled down to a peaceful career in the beautiful Ionian islands where he wrote the story of his fighting days. His experiences of war were rich and various. The inglorious attack on Copenhagen in 1807, the disastrous retreat under Sir John Moore ending with the wonderful battle of Corunna, Tarifa, and the too-little remembered action of Barossa, Moya, Molinos, and the terrific storming of Badajos, the Pyrenees, and the Nivelle—such were the scenes in which the young Irishman played a gallant part. From such sources as these reminiscences Lever drew his inspiration. The original of Charles O'Malley must have been another Robert Blakeney. The charm of the book lies in its simple, boyish style, in the little bursts of enthusiasm for some military hero, and in the "natural gaiety of heart" which rose superior to hardships.

War to Blakeney was a game serious and engrossing, plunging at times into tragedy, but brightened by amusing interludes, and by good comradeship. The vivid account of the retreat to Corunna recalls the reminiscences of "Riflemen Harris," and shows how the shaken discipline was restored so that the sorely pressed troops were able to inflict a heavy defeat upon their pursuers. There is not in history a finer instance of the reassertion of full fighting power by an army occupying a bad position and numerically far inferior to the enemy before whose advance it had been compelled to undertake a demoralizing retreat. The memoirs contain a stirring account of General Graham's brief Andalusian campaign in which La Peña and his Spaniards signally failed to distinguish themselves. The 28th Regiment suffered very severely at Barossa, and Blakeney tells a charming story of a young drummer who, at a critical moment when it was necessary to collect a few men to capture a howitzer, "said that were he not afraid of being obliged to pay for his drum, he also would take a musket." As is justly remarked, it was natural that the boy should be willing to join in the excitement of a charge, "but that he should stand calmly calculating the price of a drum when hundreds of balls were passing close to his body is scarcely credible." After witnessing the horrors of Badajos, and returning for a short time to England, Blakeney joined the 36th Regiment and fought through the campaign in the Pyrenees, ultimately receiving a severe wound in the attack of a redoubt above the Nivelle. This ended his war experiences; but he had later adventures, and there is an interesting account of the grand review of the allied armies in Paris after Waterloo.

These were not the days of Victoria Crosses and newspaper correspondents. Blakeney had frequently distinguished himself by acts of gallantry which he treats as ordinary incidents; but although he received from the Horse Guards the promise of a brevet majority as soon as "a favourable opportunity offered," he remained a captain after 24 years' service. Disappointment pressed heavily upon him. A pension for the loss of an eye was granted and revoked; but the hardest fate of all was to be ordered at Mullingar "to fall in with a squad of young officers" to re-learn the goose step under the tuition of a sergeant "armed with a colossal pair of widely yawning compasses." This, after hard fighting over half Spain and carrying a musket ball in the leg for fourteen years, proved the last straw, and Blakeney determined to retire. The old order was changing; the heroes of the Peninsula were quickly forgotten, and "a crowd of Green Park martinets rushed into the service, who, looking upon every distinction gained by others as a reflection on themselves," began to tamper with old customs. This, like many another bright and promising military career, ended prematurely and with a sense of ingratitude. The memoirs are throughout delightfully fresh and vivid, while one great lesson is deeply graven upon their pages. The British Army owes its real glories to the old regimental esprit de corps which inspired officers and men, which made a British battalion the most formidable of fighting units, and which modern reformers have frequently chosen to ignore.

AN AMATEUR HERALD.

The Right to Bear Arms. By "X" of the Saturday Review. 8x5½in., xvi.+183 pp. London, 1899.

Elliot Stock. 6/-

The anonymous author of this sprightly little volume is one of those useful critics who have, within the last eight or ten years, done much to draw the attention of the general public—whose interest in the matter has been considerably quickened by the "Book Plate" collecting craze, genealogical and antiquarian societies, and other kindred means—to the principles which underlie the whole question of Armorial Bearings, and their use and abuse, in the present day.

Hitherto it has been nearly impossible for even the interested amateur in heraldic or genealogical matters to obtain a plain and detailed statement of what constitutes the right to bear Arms, how it comes that such a right can be substantiated, and by what means the authority for dealing with such matters comes into the hands of the officials of the Colleges or Offices of Arms of the three Kingdoms. By the publication of this treatise these difficulties have been swept away. In the plainest possible language, at each step appealing to original documents, which are usually quoted in full—both Latin and English being given when a translation is necessary—the writer demonstrates that the right to bear Arms can be derived only from the Crown; that the Crown has directly delegated the exercise of much of its powers in these matters to various officials in London, Edinburgh, and Dublin; and that none but these officials can or do legally exercise any authority in the matter of Armorial Bearings or heraldic honours; and that, furthermore, such authority is exercised within strictly defined limits, which the Sovereign alone can override. These facts cited cannot be gainsaid, and most of the ever-recurring trouble as to such matters has its root in ignorance of them. Few people are so constituted as to derive pleasure from the use and display of badges of honour, to which they know they cannot show a title; but many are content to accept what has been done by their parents as being unquestionably correct. Thus through carelessness or indolence, a fictitious claim to Armorial Bearings becomes, in many families, a sort of family tradition, to be fought for as strenuously as if the honour claimed had a regular and legal origin. Some of the so-called "heraldic stationers" or "heraldic offices" are much to blame in producing the state of affairs which, in "X's" eyes, calls for such a work as this. The temptation to mix up the office and work of a herald or King of Arms with the office and work of a herald painter or engraver is evidently a strong one, and until the law steps in to enforce the difference—which it is not, probably, likely to do—the unscrupulous "heraldic offices" will continue to do a more or less flourishing trade in "finding" Arms and Crests for all sorts of people who have no genuine claim to Armorial insignia. But, with this trade "X's" little work will certainly interfere; and even those who—as the old phrase runs—are "in contempt" of heraldry in every shape and form cannot but agree that this is as it should be.

"X" disclaims all official recognition or authority, but in spite of this—or, perhaps, because of this—he has certainly managed to discover and array a very formidable series of documents on which to base his conclusions. The Record Office yields some of its most interesting treasures. A grant of a crest by Richard II., and the celebrated "Agincourt Grant" of Henry V. are set out in full; as well as the "Flodden Augmentation," and the Letters Patent of Charles II., by which respectively the Howard descendants of the victor of Flodden bear the mutilated shield of Scotland on their own Arms, and the Duke of Norfolk inherits the right to the office of Earl Marshal of England. Each successive Duke is also personally invested with this right by the Sovereign who, on his succession, hands to each Earl Marshal the baton or staff, which is the outward symbol of his office—a circumstance which has escaped our author's notice. The formalities of a heralds' "visitation" are also described, and illustrated by transcripts of the various documents incidental to these inquisitorial progresses, and the volume concludes with a brief recapitulation of the powers and privileges of the Scottish and Irish Offices of Arms. "The Right to Bear Arms" is certainly a book to be read and studied. It is briskly written and, in spite of its subject-matter, nowhere dull, while the facts and conclusions dealt with and arrived at are marshalled with skill and, in places, even with brilliancy. "X" has done much to unveil the truth as to matters Armorial, and will receive the thanks of all who genuinely care about these and kindred matters.

OTHER NEW BOOKS.

Now that the "new humour" has become passé there is a cry for a new humourist. The latest attempt to fill this long-felt want comes from America, where the advent of "Mr. Dooley" in the Chicago papers has been welcomed far and wide. We understand that MR. DOOLEY IN PEACE AND WAR (Grant Richards, 2s.) is written by Mr. F. P. Dumme, the editor of the Chicago Journal. Coming freshly week by week, these papers, giving in quaint fashion the point of view of an acute observer who poses for the occasion as an Irish-American saloon keeper, must certainly have been extremely entertaining. But, transplanted to our shores, and ceasing, by the hurried flight of time, to be intensely topical, we doubt if these papers will obtain a very wide vogue in England.

Martin Dooley is described by the author as "a doctor of philosophy" who lives in Archey-road "fornish th' gashouse and beyant Healey's slough, and not far from the polis station." To illustrate his manner let us listen to him in the article, "On our Cuban Allies."

Gin'ral Shafter [says Mr. Dooley, who is nothing if not personal] is a big, coorse two-fisted man fr'm Mitchigan, an' whin he see Gin'ral Garshy an' his twenty-five gallant followers, "Fr-ront," says he. "This way," he says, "step lively," he says, "an' move some iv these things," he says. "Sir," says Gin'ral Garshy, "d'ye take me f'r a dl ray?" he says. "I'm a sojer," he says, "not a baggage car," he says. "I'm a Cuban patbrite, an' I'd lay down me life an' the lives iv ivry wan iv th' eighteen brave men iv me devoted ar-rmy," he says "but I'll be dam'd if I carry a thrunk," he says. "I'll fight whiniver 'tis cool," he says, "an' they ain't wan iv these twelve men here that wudden't follow me to hell if they were awake at th' time," he says, "but," he says, "if t'was wurrk we were lookin' f'r, we cud have found it long ago," he says. "They se a lot iv it in this counthrey that nobody's usin'," he says. "What we want," he says "is freedom," he says, "an' if ye think we have been in th' woods dodgin' th' savage corrypondint f'r two year," he says, "f'r the sake iv r-rushin' yer laundbry home," he says, "'tis no wondher," he says, "that th' r-roads fr'm Marinette to Kalamazoo is paved with goold bricks bought be th' people iv ye'er native state," he says.

And so on in a vein of humour that, although fleeting, is very real. "On Diplomacy," "On War Preparations," on "A Letter from the Front," Mr. Dooley is very funny, and he deals out many a home truth such as can only come from the observer who stays at home. In the pages devoted to the affairs of peace Mr. Dooley expresses himself on every kind of subject, from the Currency Question to Golf, in a style that will make many readers laugh and an unsympathetic minority yawn.

One clearly has no right to express dissatisfaction with a book because its author has not achieved a result at which he was not aiming. Yet in reviewing Mr. Salisbury's translation of Dr. Karl Dändliker's SHORT HISTORY OF SWITZERLAND (Swan Sonnenschein, 7s. 6d.) one is faced by a difficulty. The public to which Dr. Dändliker was addressing himself hardly exists out of Switzerland. He wrote for schools, and his book has all the qualities and all the defects of a school book. It is complete, accurate, well arranged. It contains synoptical and chronological tables, sub-headings in black type, and other aids to memory useful to those who are preparing themselves for examinations. It is a book to "get up" laboriously, section by section, in readiness for such emergencies. In England, however, the emergency of having to pass an examination in Swiss history is one which a practical man is justified in neglecting; and what is wanted here is a history of Switzerland so written that we could read it for our pleasure, as we read our Gibbon, our Motley, and our Macaulay. It would be a difficult book to write. The constant shuffling of the Cantons introduces complications which impose a terrible strain upon the memory; to remember them all would be almost as trying as to remember the tabulated results of a month's play at Monte Carlo. Yet a master of the art, allowing himself space to turn round in, would find plenty of picturesque material to manipulate, and might produce a volume as fascinating as the "Rise and Fall of the Dutch Republic."

This element of the picturesque is what one misses from the beginning to the end of Dr. Dändliker's books. He has crowded his pages with facts and names and dates, but he has drawn no impressive picture of any striking scene, and no lifelike portrait of any historical character. He proves at great length—and very properly—that there was no such person as William Tell. But he makes nothing of Calvin—though there was a great chance here; the inimitable Scheuchzer, who proved that there were dragons in the Alps, is only a name to him; he notes Konrad Gessner as a naturalist, but does not mention that he invented mountaineering in the sixteenth century; de Saussure is dismissed in a line; the name of Escher von der Linth only occurs in connexion with his canal and there is no word of his connexion with Alpina, that interesting pioneer among Alpine journals which flourished at the time of the Napoleonic wars. "The lofty peaks of the Alps were scaled, measured, and described" is the only sentence that takes notice of the extensive mountain explorations that began in the middle of the eighteenth century and occupied the energies of the best men of science of the period; Fatio de Duillier, Altmann, Gruner, Jean André de Luc, and Bourrit are not so much as named. From the point of view of students whose only ambition is to satisfy examiners, the omissions may be of no particular consequence—though, of course, we cannot be sure of that without having the papers in front of us; but the enumeration of them shows that, from the point of view of the general reader, Dr. Dändliker's history of Switzerland leaves a great deal to be desired. For the purposes of such a reader, the history of Switzerland still remains to be written.

Of the many people who are interested in Blue-books comparatively few have the time to read them, the money to buy them, or the space in which to store them. To such, the POLITICIAN'S HAND-BOOK (Vacher, 6s.) will be eminently useful. It is a digest of the year's diplomatic correspondence, Parliamentary papers, treaties, consular reports, and other official documents "arranged alphabetically and, where possible, grouped under a general heading." Consultation is facilitated by a sufficiency of cross references, such as "Fashoda: see Egypt Valley of the Nile," "Flash Point: see Petroleum (Select Committee)," and "Usury (Committee on): see Money Lending." The compiler is Mr. H. Whates.

There may be a few people who wish to read about the water supply of the metropolis for their pleasure; there certainly are a good many who require to read about it for their instruction. Both classes of students will find their wants provided for in THE LONDON WATER SUPPLY (Longmans, 6s.), by Mr. Arthur Shadwell—a book full of facts lucidly and attractively presented. The earlier chapters relate the history of the water companies from the year 1682 when Peter Morrys, the Dutchman, "obtained permission from the Corporation to pump water from the Thames into the City by means of water-wheels placed in the first arch of London Bridge and driven by the Tide." The later chapters discuss the questions at issue between companies and ratepayers (county councils intervening). On the whole, Mr. Shadwell seems to hold a brief for the companies, though his admiration for them is very properly tempered by his solicitude for the public health. His book is a valuable compendium of information on the subject of which it treats.

Miss Beatrix F. Cresswell's DARTMOOR AND ITS SURROUNDINGS (Beechings, 6d.) is a notable little guide-book. It contains a good deal more than sixpennyworth of useful information, pleasantly put, with a great number of photographs and a large and lucid map, and is, in fact, a perfect marvel of cheapness.

THE MONK.

I, Stephen Garth, of Orne,
Though bred of fighting folk,
By craven priests was sworn
To bear the monkish yoke.

God built me straight and true,
Lithe sinew and strong limb;
I strive to draw and hew,
And toil my toil for Him;

To labour and to pray,—
Though heart and spirit bleed,
Held bound from day to day
With chain of craft and creed.

At cease of evensong
I pace the chancel's gloom,
And pause, where shadows throng
About my kinsmen's tomb.

Beneath the carven stone,
Rest warrior sire and son:
Death gathered in his own
Through siege and sally won.

I, last of all their name,
The heir of all their might,
Must still the lust of fame
And quench the fire of fight.

The man within me cries—
"Wrench thou thy bonds apart!
In sudden strength arise
And free thy bursting heart.

"Who fight with tongue and pen
Know not the end of strife:
Go! take thy place with men,
And grasp the sword of life.

"Without thy cloister wall,
The nations rise and reel;
And empires tower and fall
Beneath the stroke of steel.

"Without thy prison bars
The tide of battle rolls,
And flings to burning stars
The red unshriven souls.

"Better to live and strive
About the sounding world,
Than tread thy tomb alive—
Thy father's banner furled.

"Better in sudden fray
To yield the panting breath,
That falter day by day
Before the siege of death.

"God built thee straight and true,
Lithe sinew and strong limb;
Go! win thy life anew,
And wield thy sword for Him!"

Among my Books.

POETRY.

"Among my books" I count, I think, my poets highest. Not that they are the oftenest consulted, or that this their high appraisal lowers the value of their lesser rivals. Row upon row I have of philosophies, sciences, histories—dictionaries of facts, by which to spell out the book of fate. But these are my arms, weapons with which to fight my way through life. When I can doff my armour, when the Quadi are defeated or the Marcomanni destroyed, like the immortal Emperor, I can retire to my tent and commune with myself or hold high converse with the mighty dead.

And of poetry there is for this high appraisal high precedent. Few will feel disinclined to agree with Matthew Arnold: "In poetry . . . our race, as time goes on, will find an ever surer and surer stay"; or with Wordsworth, who saw in poetry "the impassioned expression which is in the countenance of all science." Are these the ex parte statements of poets, and are less interested witnesses desired? They are in court. "Poetry is more philosophical than history," said Aristotle, the analyst; and Schopenhauer, the philosopher, agrees with him. "Historic unity," says Hegel, "is something less profound than the philosophic or the poetic." "L'idée est plus réelle que le fait," avers the thoughtful Amiel, more critic and philosopher than poet.

Why?

Is it not because the poets, too, used these philosophies, sciences, histories as dictionaries for the book of fate, as weapons for the fight of life, then—summed up the results of the lesson and the struggle? It is the results that we seek. How they fought, what they fought, with what armour they were indued, what turned the day in their favour—all the great poets we take to be victors—this is what we like to know. And the poet tells us; for he, of all men, opens his heart to us—his heart, and, accordingly, all hearts, for there is in each man something of all men—in the great man, much. No other writer opens his heart to us. The historian narrates; the philosopher evolves; the man of science investigates. The poet "sees into the life of things"—himself among the rest.

This introspectiveness differentiates the poet. But there is another thing which also differentiates him—spontaneity. He is constrained to speak. An inward force impels him. He is εἰθεός, the "God-intoxicated" one; and, to raise the hackneyed phrase to a higher plane, when he is under this Divine influence he utters truth, ἔκφρων though he be. And may we not query whether there is not hidden here some sort of mystic answer to the question, now so vexed, as to the morality or immorality of certain tendencies of so-called art—namely, that only that is true art which is the outcome of a "frenzy" that is "fine," an afflatus that is Divine, an ἐκφροσύνη that is essentially εἰθεός?

But the poet does more than see into the life of things. He creates. He is the ποιήτης, the maker. It is this which supereminently differentiates him from the historian, the philosopher, the man of science. These record; he fashions. He knows all science, all philosophy, all history, and from these he makes a new synthesis. He is above and beyond them all. They are of the earth, earthy. He rises to "those eternal regions where the owl-winged faculty of calculation dares not ever soar"; he "breathes in worlds to which the heaven of heavens is but a veil."

And I have felt
A presence that disturbs me with the joy
Of elevated thoughts.

What science will explore that presence; what philosophy probe that perturbation; what history evaluate that attitude?

I kiss your cheek.
Catch your soul's warmth. I pluck the rose
And love it more than tongue can speak.

What science will explain this? Poetry has at least done its best to write out feebly, and it may be vainly, the score of that "still sad music of humanity"; science can only count the number of vibrations per second.

What proves to us the existence of beauty, harmony, sympathy, friendship, love? Not reason, or intellect, or ratiocination, or research; but, surely, imagination, emotion, feeling, faith. We do not love, or worship, or admire, or sacrifice by means of science or philosophy; these are the functions of poetry, religion, art; and poetry, religion, art are forms of imagination, emotion, feeling, faith.

The essence of the poet's fashioning is form. The most mysterious truth in this tide of mystery is that the most stable thing in this fleeting phantasmagoria is form—the most evanescent, the most subtle, the most delicate, the most intangible, the thing furthest removed from what goes by the name of solid fact. Of the wrecks and shards of the ancient world, what has come down to us? That only which possessed perfection of form—epics, torsos, friezes, lyrics, dramas—the works of artists, of those who gave form to matter and fact, beautiful form and therefore permanent form. It is form that lives. The old adage should be altered: it is form that is great and will prevail.

For only by Eye-gate and Ear-gate is the city of Mansoul to be assailed. It is impregnable save by these portals. Fast immured on this whirling world, speeding through space we know not whither, sits each of us poor human folk; bound to this petty planet, yet conceiving things whereof eye hath not seen nor ear heard. We live, each, in solitary confinement; crouching in lonely gloom, yet dreaming an "incommunicable dream." Soul gropes after soul—in vain. No human being ever got at the inmost soul of another, were that other the spouse upon his breast, the child upon his knee. But, let come there one who knows how subtly to enter, to conquer, to release, to console: who knows how to whisper his dream; him we worship, him we love. And he is the poet.

The mind of man is peopled [writes the latest and most delightful descender on Style] like some silent city, with a sleeping company of reminiscences, associations, impressions, attitudes, emotions, to be awakened into fierce activity at the touch of words. By one way or other, with a fanfaronnade of marching trumpets, or stealthily, by noiseless passages and dark posterns, the troop of suggesters enters the citadel to do its work within. The procession of beautiful sounds that is a poem passes in through the main gate, and forthwith the by-ways resound to the hurry of ghostly feet, until the small company of adventurers is hell-nigh lost and overwhelmed in that throng of insurgent spirits.

Most often, however, these insurgent spirits make friends with the suggesters. It is as if mankind warred against some common, unseen, unknown, and spectral foe, yet found no way to league against it. Huge and ghostly forces hedge us round, cloud our view, damp our hope, scatter pain and anguish, poignant grief and lasting sorrow, like hail-stones from the seeming beneficent blue. A propinquitous and sympathetic brother-in-arms is a welcome ally indeed. To him we listen, if so be he has aught to tell. Well, to communicate aught, recourse must be had to form. Therefore it is that form is all in all.

And necessarily and naturally. We know of things only through their appearances. No thing-in-itself can ever be known to us. Truth cannot exist until it is enunciated. Inchoate idea is not communicable till, in a phrase of Amiel's, it is épaissi, "coarsened" into speech.

And, deeper mystery among mysteries, only if the coarsening be beautiful does it last. Who shall resolve that riddle?

Why is it that "the eternal idea of beauty has haunted the human race," as Hegel held? It is vain to ask. True, a tree blooms, brings forth its fairest flowers to produce seed. But why, for what ultimate purpose, should it at all live, produce, propagate? What, of all life, is the ultimate goal? When we can answer that, we shall be able to say why man seeks beauty and truth; why he evolves; why he develops; why he aspires; what made him emerge from the ape; what makes him love, marry, fight for hearth and home, form communities, make laws, and try, poor soul, to abide by them.

And of form in this sense neither science nor philosophy nor history knows anything. Science may investigate the ends of the earth and give us in a single generalization the key to the universe; we put it in our mental pocket and forget how it was fashioned. Philosophy may unravel the meshwork of thought, and cut by a creed the riddle of existence; we learn the trick and do not recollect how it was arrived at. History may ransack the course of emergent nations and hit upon a clue to human progress; we peruse the ingenious inquiry and neglect to apply the rule. The poet—the poet soars above things and thoughts and men, surveys them, views them sub specie æternitatis. Philosophy and history and science deal with the finite and the relative. Poetry is unconfined, illimitable. She concerns not herself with thoughts or things or men. She deals with Man: plumbs the depth of his passion, ascends to the height of his aspiration, weighs his weal and his woe. It is not her mission to investigate phenomena or concoct theory. Her mission . . .

But here I find myself stopped. Who has defined poetry? No one. The poets themselves, as was to have been presumed, have failed us here. Of what avail is Matthew Arnold's "criticism of life"? or Wordsworth's to—arouse the sensual from their sleep

Of Death, and win the vacant and the vain
To noble raptures?

or Shelley's "to familiarize the highly refined imagination . . . with beautiful idealisms of moral excellence"? These take us but little on our way. Better almost is William Watson's simple acquiescence in ignorance:

I follow Beauty, of her train am I.

He who would determine the mission of poetry must first determine the mission of man, of man sitting here on this speck in space, dreaming the incommunicable dream.

What if the mission of poetry be—the attempt to communicate that dream, to believe in it, to prove it true!

LOVE IN THE LIBRARY.

[A BROWN STUDY.]

The Man of Books sat alone in his study. A literary litter lay around him. But one other chair besides that on which he sat was unburdened with it, and that was pushed in a corner as if, its recent work being suspended, its emptiness was now a reproach against it. The Man of Books was uneasy, and on his knee lay a neglected volume. He glanced up at a row of books above the empty chair, and it seemed to him as if a well-known form was again there, for was there not something golden and glinting just by where her hair would have been? It was so, indeed, yet the golden thing was but the gilding on an old book's back, as he acknowledged to himself presently when the letters became clear to his searching eyes and he read the words, "Hypnetoromachia di Polifilio." It was the famous dream of love.

"Bah!" was the exclamation of the Bookworm, and the echo had a metallic ring in the corners of the room.

His eyes wandered to the table, where two books lay open, as if they had been placed there in the owner's moody restlessness. By a curious chance the two volumes were a little vellum volume of Michael de Montaigne and the "Confessions of Jean-Jacques."

What brought them there? he wondered grumpily. Then it seemed to him that the pages of one of the volumes moved rustlingly, bearing the while a look of greater intelligence than mere paper and pasteboard usually do. What was it gave the inanimate leaves this curious appearance, or was it but fancy? But before the Book-lover could answer himself the little volume was again as still as dead sheepskin should be.

But who shall limit the mute sympathy which a man may awaken among those truest of friends on his library shelves? The Bookworm was thinking, and he continued aloud, as if to the rows of tomes that lined the walls.

"Why should I not follow their examples," he said, "and make a confidant of blessed paper? Yet do I not wish, like Montaigne or Rousseau, to impart all my griefs and joys to the vulgar world; and if I speak only to printed paper it will not give away my secrets. It will take no more impressions.

"When she was here—"

A guttural sound of "Ugh!"—or as who should say "Who?"—was distinctly heard from among a row of fat duodecimos. The Bookworm suspected Aristophanes or one of the German metaphysicians, but the question, if such it was, was absurd, and, as silence followed, he continued his strain:—

"When she was here! Ah, I tell you, best of friends and most lovable of comrades, you are nothing without her. You—"

Crack! Something split somewhere in one of the rows of volumes. Apparently the air was very dry to-night, and the Bookworm thought with regret of some damage, perhaps, to an early Elzevir. He proceeded, however, with more confidence now, for he was warned to his subject.

"Ah, yes; I say it to your faces. How feeble and futile is, after all, the hold which books have upon the heart compared with that of a woman's love. Great as ye are, ministers of wisdom, ye are but dead and dark things. She was life and light personified. Ye need the key of knowledge often to solve your enigmas. She was clear as a day in June. Ye are dumb until the eyes search your hidden meanings. In her every movement was music—though it is true that the eyes followed her as the fount of their refreshment. Great as are the things ye have taught me, I have learned more wisdom from her innocent babble than from reams of scriptures, and more love from her bright eyes than from centuries of sonnets and canzonets. And, as I watched her deft arms and fingers among the pots and pannikins, the line of grace and beauty became to me a thing revealed and manifest. Only such matters as lie between your two covers, each of you, do ye know; and of the world beyond that pool ye are innocent as the babe unweaned. But as to that fair and open book, her soul, albeit I had read so oft in it, yet was it still full of uncut pages, into whose virgin sweetness and fair illustrations I had not yet dipped. She was a very Mirror for Majestie, a Paradise of Dainty Devices, upon whose fair and broad margins no stain had come. Then what a binding! Her every act was an Emblem of sweetness. She was Beatrice and Heloise in one. Never was book written that could compare with her!

"Still it must be confessed that she was not loving or patient of a library, and sometimes in the matter of you, my treasures, she was somewhat of a trial to me. She did not appreciate, nor even understand, what was within you—her admiration was, as a rule, restricted to those of you who had pretty covers, especially if they looked new. She was never stirred by my favourite poets, and she never dallied with the most exquisite of the essayists. I believe that Marlowe's mighty line was as indifferent to her as Tupper; she knew no difference between Lamb and Epictetus, Jonson and the Jansenists, Horace and Augustine. Petrarca might sing his sweetest, and Walton chat his pleasantest, and still she was capable of going on, like Werther's Charlotte, cutting bread and butter. The Passionate Pilgrim was no more a matter of enthusiasm to her than Little Bo-Peep. At the sight of one of Grolier's superb bindings she has exclaimed that it would make a fine 'stuff' for some base use or other; while she has taken up that treasure, the 'De Veritate,' gingerly between forefinger and thumb and, sniffing at it from afar off, has commented on its 'mustiness.'

"Nay, I verily believe that had I suddenly sprung upon her the information that I had found in an old binding half the lost Alexandrian library, or had unearthed an example of pre-Noachian copper-plate, she would not have met me with laughing incredulity, she would not have sustained the too sudden shock naturally attending so mighty a revelation; it would have made no difference to her, and she would have continued discussing to herself—for I believe she never did anything else—her laces and frills. Ever subordinating folios to frocks and fripperies, Stottards to stockings, first editions to fancy embroideries, catalogues to cates, plates to puddings! No; she was no bas bleu, Babette.

"Even in my own modest ventures up the steep hillside of poesy or on the wide campaign of prose—I speak in this august presence with, I hope, becoming modesty"—and here the speaker bowed his head, half fearing some demonstration; but the books only listened attentively, with an occasional rustle like that of a lady's dress; and so he looked up and continued—"in my own small efforts she showed no more absorbed interest. She wondered why I wasted so much paper; she deemed it a weariness of the flesh to keep on building up in a commonwealth that was already so overcrowded; she thought with commiseration and almost with impatience, as of a self-inflicted fever, of my traffickings with those grim people, editors and publishers, at the mere mention of whose names her dimpled mouth pouted.

"Yet was she often enough my only reader, and upon her I would watch the effect of my productions (even as Molière did with his housekeeper) in an endeavour to learn—as do seldom we do—whether that which I had attempted I had achieved. As thus—if the smile that never left her face (and now never leaves my heart) grew a trifle more pronounced than was its wont, then should I know that I had made some point in humour for which I had striven ; if, on the other hand, I noticed her look down her nose and blink twice or thrice, then it was evident to me that some pathetic passage 'told.' It was on account of this sensitiveness of hers to the slightest impression that I never revealed to her my more powerful writings—"

"—fearing that they would have too great an effect upon her. Ah ! I may have been altogether mistaken.

"At other times, however, as I have hinted, all was lost upon her, and she would ask me to explain—and what more dreary task than dissecting one's witticism ? Or she would say that she 'must not waste any more time'—forsooth—or 'would it not do on another occasion' ; but the smile that accompanied such remarks disarmed resentment. Ah, if she were here now !"

Thus again the solitary man, as he glanced at the rows of books, that now seemed almost alive. Then he heard plainly a harsh, cracked voice, a trifle smothered :—

"To love her was a liberal education—like loving Prue."

It was the "Tatler" speaking ; but this, which on another occasion would have delighted, now served merely to irritate him, and he said, "Bother Prue !"

Whereat there was a half suppressed giggle from a row of modern yellow-backs on a top shelf—mostly novels by authors with pseudonyms, that had once been the flippant companions of days and nights of travelling, and were there now only on sufferance. He looked at the shelf reprovingly, but straightway another remark followed—

"She is better with the angels," said the first volume of Adelaide Ann Proctor.

This was very much like a reflection, and he contradicted it ; "She is not with the angels."

"Then has some other man — ?" broke in an elderly, modern voice, but was immediately cut short. The voice issued from a shelf where lay a set of Thackeray in an édition de luxe, and it occurred to the Man of Books that the great novelist, whom some accuse of "being hard" on women, was uttering some cynicism.

The speech that interrupted this remark was declaimed in a quaint, old-fashioned style. It came from Ann Radcliffe, and was, "Hath some villain then bewrayed her ?"

There was another titter from the modern novel shelf, above which was heard a Scotch voice muttering :—

"He dearly lo'ed the lasses, O !"

This was too much, and the Man of Books was about to jump up when another remark reached him in very old crabbed speech :—

"Peradventure patience then were better, for assuredly will she come back."

It came from an ancient dusty, parchment-covered pamphlet entitled "Ye Goode Manne hys Comforte."

He reached down the work, and as he did so the volume that was on his knees fell to the floor with a thud. It was the "Vita Nuova."

Hastily rubbing his eyes, and looking around with reassurance at the grave and silent books, the dreamer dusted his pamphlet and sat down to read it.

FRANKFORT SOMMERVILLE.

Notes.

In the fifth of his series of lectures on "Law in Taste," in which the Oxford Professor of Poetry endeavours to lay down rules which may help us to recognize good English poetry, he proceeds partly by negatives. For instance, it is wrong to conclude that "If a poem is popular it must necessarily contain the element of the universal." Nor, on the other hand, is it permissible to insist that "singularity in expression is an indication of that character which is the sign of genius." Singularity of expression may, of course, be accidentally associated with genius, as it was with the genius of Robert Browning. But it can not be the differentia ; or we should be obliged to find genius in Ossian and Festus no less than in the obscurities of Mr. Meredith.

Professor Courthope bases his standard on the complexity of the factors which make up our national character and on the interaction of the principles of Catholicism, the Reformation, and the Renaissance. He measures a given poem "in its relation to English poetry as a whole," and considers whether it leaves us the impression that "if Chaucer, or Shakespeare, or Milton, or Tennyson had been dealing with the same subject, they would have conceived it in the same spirit and with the same broad view of the hereditary conflict between the principles of ideal thought." It is probably (in spite of its vagueness) as good a rule as we could have. It is, in fact, an analysis of the methods which the best critics always do, however unconsciously, adopt. But the idiosyncrasies of the individual temperament will always prevent a rigid application of it. As Carlyle has pointed out, the first feeling aroused by the contemplation of a work of genius is more often one of repugnance than of pleasure. We have to get used to it before we can judge it truly, and then we judge it truly by instinct, only referring to the canons to prove that instinct has guided us aright. But the critic of a new work, having to make up his mind in a hurry, easily falls into the mistakes which afterwards become a byword. One suggestive corollary, by the way, from the Professor's dictum is that a work which does not contain complex elements—which is, for instance, purely pagan, or purely devotional—cannot be ranked as a classic.

The interest in Mr. Rudyard Kipling's works in France has been very noticeable of late. M. Henry Davray's edition of his first Jungle Book, translated by M. Louis Fabulet and Le Vicomte Robert d'Humières, has been received by French critics with something like enthusiasm and has had a considerable sale. The same translators are at work on a version of the second Jungle Book, which is to be published serially in the Revue de Paris, and afterwards in book form by the Mercure de France. We refer elsewhere to M. André Chevrillon's study of Kipling's works. Translations of other contemporary English books are also giving rise to considerable comment in Paris, notably that of Mr. Wells' "Time Machine." The scientific possibility of such a machine was discussed at length in the February issue of the Mercure de France.

The Newspaper Society's Monthly Circular for March contains an interesting discussion of the subject of copyright in news. News, it is pointed out, is protected in New Zealand and in Western Australia ; and it might have been added that, as we lately mentioned, the attempt is now being made to protect news in Ceylon. What means are feasible for giving it adequate protection in England ? The suggestion offered by the Circular is that the subject should be treated quite apart from the question of copyright, and that news should simply be brought "within the common law which prevents any person from unfairly appropriating to his own use that which is the property of another." Against this proposal the principles of abstract justice have nothing to say ; but in practice it would probably lead to a good deal of unprofitable litigation. In a country like England, with its numerous concurrent organizations for the dissemination of news, the difficulty of deciding whether a given person, at a given moment, had or had not exclusive property in a particular statement of fact would generally be enormous, and would often be insuperable.

We have spoken before of the unfair advantage which papers which are registered as newspapers have over papers not so registered, in the matter of postal rates. A pamphlet on "Unjust Postal Rates Affecting Periodicals," reprinted from the People's Friend, of Dundee, illustrates the grievance by some rather striking figures :—

exactly one ton, and to send these copies by post even in Britain would require £37 10s. Taking one of the sixpenny weeklies as a standard of comparison, the weight of 18,000 copies of an ordinary issue, considering each copy only 18 ounces, is nine tons, and this goes through the post in Britain also for £37 10s. or at the rate of £4 3s. 4d. a ton. Thus the poor man is charged for postage £37 10s. for carrying one ton, whereas the rich man gets nine tons carried for the same money.

Without going so far as to accuse anybody of the crime of setting class against class, we certainly feel that the facts cited indicate the desirability of further and speedy postal reforms.

Judging from the extracts published in the French newspapers, the metrical version of Othello, furnished by M. Jean Aicard for the recent representation of the tragedy, has, at least, the merit of strict and often most ingeniously achieved fidelity. Whether, however, it will convince any hitherto unbelieving English reader that the French Alexandrine is an adequate vehicle for the poetry of Shakespeare is doubtful. No one, of course, could expect the passion of the third act or the terror of the fifth to be capable of transference to any other language from that in which the jealous agony and the sombre resolve of the deluded Moor are immortally enshrined. But in a passage of pure rhetoric, such as the address to the Senate, one would have hoped for somewhat more impressive results than M. Aicard has succeeded in compassing.

Take, for instance, the passage—no doubt the most difficult in the speech, but still containing no insurmountable barrier for the translator—in which Othello refers to his "travel's history."

Wherein of antres vast, and deserts idle,
Rough quarries, rocks, and hills whose heads touch heaven,
It was my hint to speak. . . .
And of the Cannibals that each other eat;
The Anthropophagi, and men whose heads
Do grow beneath their shoulders.

Here, where the rude vigour of the original saves its quaintness from declining into the absolutely grotesque, it is disconcerting to meet with a rendering like this:—

Alors j'eus à parler d'antres sur les rivages,
De stériles déserts, de carrières sauvages,
Et de monts qui touchaient de leur cimes le ciel.
Et je parlais encore de ce pays cruel
Où l'homme se nourrit avec la chair humaine
Et de ces gens lointains de taille herculéenne;
Dont l'épaule remonte au dessus de leur front.

The close of the speech is certainly rendered with much felicity:—

She loved me for the dangers I had passed,
And I loved her that she did pity them.
This only is the witchcraft I have used.

could not be more neatly turned than by

Elle m'aima pour les périls qui j'ai couru,
Et moi, moi, je l'aimai pour avoir vu ses larmes,
C'est tout: voilà, seigneurs, ma magie et mes charmes.

Only the intensely matter-of-fact character of the earlier lines makes the "witchcraft" seem as mysterious to us as it did to Brabantio. John Wellington Wells, who travelled "in magic and spells," was hardly a more prosaic sorcerer.

Tolstoi's new novel, "Résurrection," which is translated from the original manuscript by M. Teodor de Wyzewa, at the author's request, and is to appear simultaneously in Russian in a necessarily incomplete form owing to the censorship, will be published without abridgment by the Echo de Paris, the first instalment being announced for March 25. For the first time in twenty years Count Tolstoi has decided to become simply an artist unaffected by any "moral" preoccupations. The novel in question belongs, indeed, to what he calls to-day "bad art," since it is nothing but a story, and "too literary in its form," as he recently wrote to a friend, "to be a work of truly good and useful art." He has been keeping it by him for some time in manuscript, and now decides to publish it for the profit of the Christian colony of the Dukhobortsi, the Russian Brook Farm sect now experimenting in Canada. A Russian paper, the Niva, paid 15,000 roubles for the right of publishing even the truncated edition of the novel. During the past year Tolstoi has spent almost all his time on this work, becoming once more absorbed in the problems of artistic creation which so many years ago gave us "War and Peace." He must feel that he has been tempted of the devil, but contents himself with the thought that, after all, he has been doing evil that good may come.

M. Maurice Barrès, the appearance of whose recent publications, "Amateur d'Ames" and "Stanialas de Guaita," Literature recorded the other day, has brought out in Le Journal a sort of belated preface to these two experiments in style which is a curious illustration of the dangers which beset an ambitious artist whose work is not yet, and, indeed, never can be, popular. He says complacently, "I have written nothing which better corresponds to my conception of a work of art than this 'Amateur d'Ames.'" The author of the "Déracinés," however, has not the self-confidence which either civic courage or artistic probity require, for he reveals, further on, that the famous "Appel au Soldat" and "Appel au Juge," which the admirers of the "Déracinés" awaited, cannot now see the light. Why? Simply because another novelist, M. Quesnay de Beaurepaire, has, in his new rôle of délateur national, begun to publish revelations on the Panama episode, which, with Boulangism, was to be the subject-matter of these sequels of the "Déracinés"; or, in other words, because M. de Beaurepaire, after having been castigated in M. Barrès' book, has now become his coadjutor—the French Government would call him his accomplice—in the League of the Patrie Française. After all, much of the "Déracinés" was pamphleteering, and if recent events are likely to restore to us Barrès and Lemaitre, the writer and artist, we need not complain.

Theatrical partisanship is becoming so fierce in Vienna that the appearance of the author of a new piece in response to "calls" has lately proved the signal for unseemly demonstrations. Herr Hermann Bahr, himself a dramatist, the brilliant literary editor of Die Zeit, proposes to abolish the custom of calling the author altogether, on the ground that it prejudices the sober judgment of the public on his play. Several leading dramatic authors have entered into a solemn compact with Herr Bahr never again to show themselves to the audience at a première, among others Paul Lindau and Ernst von Wildenbruch. The latter is of opinion that the ordeal must be a positive torture to all sensitive artists, and points out that nothing destroys the illusion of a historical play so much as the appearance among Greeks, Romans, or Medieval Knights of the "painfully-modern black-coated author, anxious, dazzled by the lights, awkwardly bowing his acknowledgment of applause." In support of the view that even the most distinguished dramatists do not appear to advantage on such occasions Ludwig Ganghofer recalls the first performance of Fulda's Das Verlorene Paradies at the Burg Theater, a serious piece received with due gravity, till the author appeared before the curtain in Heller Hose (light trousers), when all Vienna forgot to take Fulda's drama seriously any longer in laughing at his trousers.

The various small but valuable collections which Messrs. Sotheby sold last week served to mark the increasing demand there is for early printed English books and first editions. Amongst the chief books sold were "Through the Looking Glass," Lewis Carroll, first edition, in sheets, author's own copy, £14 10s.; "A Decree of Starre-Chamber, concerning printing," the excessively rare first edition of 1637, £20. This decree was reprinted in America for the Grolier Club in 1884, and copies of it have been sold in that country for nearly 200 dollars. It has also been reprinted in this country, in Professor Arber's excellent reprint of Milton's "Areopagitica," and copies of it may often be secured here at prices much lower than those paid in America. Forster's "Life of Dickens," 1872-74, three volumes extended to six by extra illustration and the insertion of 205 autograph letters, £202; the scarce first edition, 1850, of the Poems of J(ohn) R(uskin), £22; Herrick's "Hesperides," fine copy of the first edition, 1648, £50; "Tales of My Landlord," by Sir Walter Scott, first edition, 1816, £25. Included in the week's sale was also a fine series of eighty-three autograph letters, for the most part unpublished, by Sir Walter Scott, which fetched £305. Earlier in the week a series of ten letters from General Gordon, relating chiefly to Egyptian affairs, sold for £31, a very satisfactory figure. The finest books, however, came in the lots sold on Friday and Saturday, the most important being Goldsmith's "Deserted Village," first edition, 1770, slightly imperfect, £13 15s.; Milton's "Paradise Lost," first edition, 1667, £43 10s.—this was a copy with the second title page, and it secured a record price, though copies with the first title pages have been sold for £80—Gervase Markham's "The Gentleman's Academie," 1595, a reprint of the "Books of St. Albans," £16; Rudyard Kipling's "Echoes by Two Writers," first edition, 1884, £21 10s., and "Departmental Ditties," first edition, 1886, £8. The latter illustrated the fact that it often takes but two persons to make an auction, for earlier in the week, on Wednesday, a similar copy of the same book fetched as much as £14 15s.

Amongst the books from foreign presses the chief was a magnificent Verard, "Heures de Nostre Dame," circa 1488, which sold for £188. This is a high figure, but the demand for good copies of the work of the first French printers is stronger now than it was at the time of the Asburnham sale, when we first drew attention to the subject. There were also some good specimens from the early English presses, the most notable being Caxton's "Caton," usually assigned to 1484, £360. Of perfect and imperfect copies of this book only thirteen are known. It is a book of only 80 leaves, and, therefore, the price was high, considering that the copy was slightly imperfect. Lettoun and Machlinia's "Vieux Abrégement des Statutes," 1481, fetched £107. The chief interest in the books of these printers is their rarity. A whole decade often passes without one being seen in the auction room. The "Shephardes' Calendar," the rare print by Pynson, fetched £67; while among modern books came a good copy of the first edition of Walton's "Compleat Angler," first edition, in the original binding, £161, and an excellent copy of Shakespeare, the third folio, £260.

American Letter.

SUGGESTIONS OF A PATRIOTIC PLAY.

The other night I sat through a play which I wished so much to find better than it was that I had a sense of personal injury in the failure of my benevolence. It was the work of a dramatist whom I had always hoped good things from, and who is not yet too old to do them, but who had handled one of the most exalted episodes of American history with a very suppressed feeling for its sublimity and beauty.

It was an incident of the War of Independence, and had the measure of noble tragedy in the fate of the young rebel, who, when he came to be hanged as a spy by the British, regretted that he "had only one life to give to his country." But in compliance with the theory of the American playgoer that he goes to the theatre to be amused, the dramatist had provided so many reliefs to the tragic motive that one was not sure at all times that the motive was not comic. In these circumstances I did not find sufficient compensation in the strong patriotism with which the different sides were unmistakably characterized. The virtues were all in blue turned up with buff, and the vices were in scarlet coats; though once, when one of the enemy spoke with an Irish accent, in pity of the American prisoner, I saw that the British uniform might sometimes be buttoned round a feeling heart.

The time was when this would have gone farther with me than it did; but what interested me more than its comparatively faint effect with myself was its apparently inadequacy with the audience generally. I wondered how much or how little a change in the popular mood toward England might have to do with the result. I have had my doubts whether there is any such change; but I could not help thinking that it might be an unfavourable moment for a play dealing with an American hero hanged by the British as a spy, now when there has been so much talk, at least, about a rapprochement of the two great Anglo-Saxon nations for the exploitation of weaker peoples. I fancied that the time had been, not more remotely than the time of the Venezuelan difficulty, when its patriotic appeals would have stirred certainly the galleries more; and I had to ask myself whether the old grudge was really beginning to die out. As such grudges go it is rather early for it to die, but, perhaps, not too early. You really never can be sure about the end of such a grudge. There was a very curious and interesting psychological moment after the defeat of the South in the Civil War, when the two sections seemed to draw near each other in the common memories and the mutual respect of the men who had met in battle, and the grudge between them seemed dead. Then there came another psychological moment, a generation later, when it appeared that the grudge had been merely waiting to get its second wind in the animosity of the belated non-combatants; and then this, too, passed in the patriotic effusion evoked by the recent war with Spain. Both of the first moments are long past for Englishmen and Americans, and yet, according to the expectation of life in a grudge between hereditary enemies, ours should be still in its prime. If we continued to fall upon one another's necks in mere sentiment, its end might be hastened, but it would certainly be hastened much more if we were to be united in war against a common enemy; though there would always be the question whether the game was worth the candle. I suppose it is still doubtful whether it was worth it in the case of France and England when they sank a grudge which had lasted some six centuries in their alliance against Russia. What is certain is that this grudge seems really gone; Frenchmen and Englishmen may still heartily despise one another, but they no longer hate in the old way. In favourable circumstances it might come to some such effect between America and England. We might sink our old grudge in a common cause against a common enemy, and come out no longer hating, but merely despising one another. I do not deny that this would be difficult; Englishmen lend themselves readily enough to the hatred of others, but it is not easy to despise them. Something might be done to bring them into contempt by the fondness of our upper classes, but how far this would go one really could not say; I doubt if it would tend largely to produce a psychological situation.

In the meantime we seem to have a present condition in which we can no longer appeal confidently to the old Revolutionary ardour of the popular audiences. During the past year they have become so used to seeing the American and English colours blended, and the portraits of the Queen and the President shown side by side in the cinematograph, and to hearing "God Save the Queen" and "Yankee Doodle" played together by the orchestras, that they are not so secure of their emotions as they once were. At any rate, I think that the day of the patriotic drama is past, and I am not altogether sorry. I have a fancy, which it might be better not to own, that in its literary expression patriotism has never been very interesting. Patriotic song, patriotic fiction, even patriotic oratory, are each distinctly inferior to things in that sort which appeal to us not as Americans, or Englishmen, or Frenchmen, or Russians, or Spaniards, but as civilized men.

For my own part, I confess that patriotism in people of other nationalities is extremely distasteful to me. I cannot rejoice in their victories, which they make such a din about, and I find most of their monuments ridiculous; their material prosperity and territorial expansion are matters of indifference. I suppose this is the case with some aliens regarding their own national self-love and its modest proclamations; they may not think our Americanism is the best thing in us; they may put our common humanity before that, and expect greater things from it; and from their point of view I was able to console myself the other night, when our rancour against the English no longer seemed as great as it had been. The test was not very searching, but the result—unless it was mostly an illusion of mine—was suggestive. If the reunion of the Anglo-Saxon peoples were to replace the old grudge with memories of good done together for the whole race—say, work given to every man that needed it, instead of war, which no man needs—that would be fine. But if in the malice of destiny a double jingoism threatened to substitute itself for the old grudge—well, one might yet regret the old grudge.

W. D. HOWELLS.

FROM THE MAGAZINES.

The public which feeds upon periodicals is as greedy of some new thing as the Athenians of old ; and every magazine editor knows the value of an article boldly sounding a discordant note in the concert of praise with which some new book is greeted. One or two such reviews of "Aylwin," which appeared some little time after that book had appeared, savoured rather of the desire for originality than of any real criticism, and although a good many readers who like a story that "carries you on" undoubtedly "stuck" here and there in "Aylwin," the consensus as to the fine quality of the work remained unshaken. There is something of the same bid for novelty in the remark of a writer in Blackwood, that Sir George Trevelyan's first volume on the American Revolution "contains in every chapter and almost on every page a wrong view of every important event in one of the most interesting and most familiar periods of our national history." This thesis is cleverly supported in an article headed "Sir George Trevelyan as an Historian." The points at issue are, to some extent, matters of opinion—but there are also points of detail on which Sir George is certainly unsatisfactory. The truth of the matter seems to be, as we pointed out when we reviewed the book, that Sir George Trevelyan is essentially a biographer, and a brilliant one, rather than a historian, and that in turning his Life of Fox into a history of the American revolution he adopted a course of very doubtful wisdom. Mrs. Charles Bagot, whose father served with Nelson, and whose uncle brought to London the news of Waterloo, gives us, under the title "Bygone Days," some of those personal reminiscences about historical events which are always welcome. Here are two anecdotes of the so-called "Iron" Duke :—

Lady Mornington told me that when she went to see the Duke of Wellington after the battle of Waterloo, and congratulated him, he put his hands before his face and sobbed, saying, "Oh, don't congratulate me ! I have lost all my best friends."

Lady Westmorland, my husband's aunt, asked me one night to go with her to her box at the opera, as my husband was on guard that night. The Duke came with us, and Lady Westmorland told him that I was very frightened of him, so he took my hand and held it throughout the first act of the opera, which only made me still more shy !

"The Sins of Education" is an amusing dissertation on the familiar theme of the "illiterate literature" read by "the hastily educated." The heirs of the Education Act of 1870 are, of course, not all they were expected to be, and the periodicals and books which attract them are not ideal ; but there is a good deal to be said on the other side, and we would rather see this clever writer level his spear at the so-called "Society" papers studied by classes who were well educated long before the days of school boards. There is in Blackwood's also a good paper on Hodson of "Hodson's Horse," putting forward the most favourable view of his chequered career.

Mr. W. H. Hudson, F.Z.S., whose delightful book "Birds in London," we reviewed last spring, has an article in Longman's, bearing the same title, which brings his observations up to last November, and the article forms a supplementary chapter to his book. Wood pigeons have fully acquired town habits. There is a good-sized beam tree on the island at the east end of St. James' Park and the wood pigeons, having discovered that its orange-coloured fruit is very eatable, Flocked to the tree in numbers to feast on it ; but the long, slender boughs, bent down with the weight of the terminal bunches of fruit, made it impossible for them to perch in the usual way to feed ; and they were forced to suspend themselves heads down, like parrots or tits, while picking the berries. A prettier or stranger sight than this tree, laden with its brilliantly coloured fruit and a score or two of dove-acrobats clinging to its drooping branches, could not well be imagined.

Miss Foxcroft has an article of some interest on Catherine of Braganza, the wife of Charles II., whose name is still revered in Portuguese annals as a capable and successful Regent ; for she was called as a widow to play a more important part in life on the illness of her brother, the reigning Sovereign, than she had played as the neglected wife of an English King. Mr. Rider Haggard's "Farmer's Year" keeps up its interesting character and deals with May, the month in which our forefathers used to picnic in the open and dance about poles wreathed with flowers.

March will sarch ye ;

April will try ;

May will tell ye

Whether ye'll live or die.

he thinks is now an appropriate rhyme for the month.

In the Pall Mall Magazine Mr. G. S. Layard continues his series of articles on "Suppressed Plates." He deals chiefly with the suppressed "Fireside Scene" in "Oliver Twist." It has been generally thought that when Dickens rejected it Cruikshank at once began to etch a new one. An impression of the picture, however, which belonged to Mr. Bruton of Gloucester, showed that a good deal of added work was put into it after all the impressions which had displeased Dickens were struck off. And here is an interesting point about the Plate of "Rose Maylie and Oliver at Agnes' Tomb" which was substituted for it. In the 1845 edition Rose has a light dress, and in the 1846 edition a black dress, though clearly it is the old plate used over again. But at the Bruton sale

There was sold a proof of this plate with Rose Maylie in the black dress, and this is a proof before letters, an impossible nut for the amateur to crack who does not know that the lettering of plates may be stopped-out or burnished away or covered up for the striking off of misleading impressions ; from which the moral may be drawn that it is better to believe in proof impressions after letters where they are well authenticated, than to presume that a proof is before letters merely because those letters do not appear.

Mr. C. D. Gibson gives us sketches in Egypt illustrated in his usual masterly way, and among other interesting and well illustrated articles are "Puviss de Chavannes," by Marie L. Van Vorst, and Mr. T. A. Cook's "Among the Pines at Arcachon." Mr. A. T. Quiller Couch brings to a close his meditations "from a Cornish window," and will be succeeded by Mr. W. E. Henley, who is to contribute a monthly Causerie under the title of "Ex Libris."

The latest of the magazines of the United States to make a home in England is the American Critic, an illustrated monthly review of literature, art, and life, which Messrs. Putnam's publish in New York, where the current issue is No. 860. The first of the English edition of this periodical is full of interest to all readers on this side of the Atlantic ; indeed, the contents deal largely with English subjects. "Thackeray at Charterhouse" gives a number of reproductions of the novelist's very early sketches, some queer manuscripts and some lively details as to the fight with Venables when Thackeray's nose was broken. There is to be more Thackerayana in the next number. There is an article on Lewis Carroll ; a paper on Mr. Lee's "Shakespeare" by Dr. W. J. Rolfe, and an admirable review of "The Open Question"—with dozens of other interesting notes and articles and reviews. Among the latter is the only piece of work in the number which seems to us to be foolish and uninformed ; this is a criticism of Mr. Kenneth Grahame's "Pagan Papers"—which we presume has just been republished in New York by Mr. Lane.

The first edition bears the date 1894, and from the title page it appears that it was published by Stone and Kimball of Chicago at the same time. The writer of the review, however, approaches Mr. Grahame as a new man "who," as he elegantly expresses it, "was not behind the door when cleverness was being doled out to the rising generation of Scotchmen." But the critic speaks cheerfully of the future of this writer and ends on a hopeful note:—"Let him turn the gods out to grass, and go, himself, into the shafts. Then we shall see what we shall see." Can it be that in New York they have not heard of "The Golden Age" or "Dream Days?" Hardly, as we see Mr. Lane advertises these books in the present issue, where, by the way, Mr. F. B. Money-Coutts is mentioned as the author of "The Revolution of St. Love the Divine." The drama is dealt with very fully in the "American Critic" and there are poets; among them Mr. Robert Loneman, who sings of us:—

IN ENGLAND.

This is the England, this is the earth,
That gave majestic Milton birth;
This is the olden golden clime
Of lofty prose, of lilting rhyme;
Here Poesy's pure soul was won
By the sweet strains of Tennyson;
For him her eyes knew no eclipse,
And he might kiss her lyric lips;
This is great England; here was wrought
The noblest monument of thought,
That man e'er builded up to God
Out of his bosom's sacred sod,
For this the soil, and this the clime,
That gave a Shakespeare to all time.

We welcome the new magazine, which is sure to prove of interest to all bookish persons.

In the Sunday Magazine Dr. Wells has one of the most interesting of his sketches of the East in "Child Life in Ancient Egypt," excellently illustrated. He says:—

Egypt stood midway between Christianity and classical Paganism. If any one essayed to portray child-life in ancient Greece or Rome, he would find that a very few pages could contain all the references to his theme. Their poets, painters, sculptors, do not notice the child; or, if they do, it is not for his own sake. Scholars assure us that not one book for children was ever written by a Greek or Latin author. They had fairy tales, but these were for old people. The "classics" therefore scarcely deserve the title of "humanity" or litteræ humaniores: classical culture was childless. Love of, and reference for, the child are among the most beneficent of the "Gesta Christi." The outcast child has been found by the handmaids of modern literature; but he was never neglected by those who carved Egypt's monuments and wrote its books of papyrus.

The reverence for childhood in Egypt had in it something akin to the Christian feeling. Isis and her child Horus were the chief of all the gods of Egypt. Their worship lingered in the "Holy Island of Philæ" down to 453 A.D., though the worship of their other gods had disappeared long before that date. Isis and Horus represented the sacredness of motherhood and childhood.

Unlike the practice of Sparta, Athens, and Rome, child-murder was almost unknown in Egypt. The illustrations showing children's toys and pictures are of great interest.

The most notable thing in Temple Bar is Mr. Fraser Rae's article on "Sheridan's Sons," which is by way of being an appendix to that writer's "Sheridan: a Biography," and gives some particulars which he has learnt since the publication of that work. He gives an interesting and delightful picture of the relations between the sons and their father, and illustrates it by a good many extracts from letters, some of which are now printed for the first time.

The Butterfly, a tastefully printed monthly, starts on its new career under good auspices and in an elegant yellow cover. Its contents are light—almost slight—but distinctly readable, and among the contributors of some very interesting pictures are Mr. Raven Hill, Mr. M. Greiffenhagen, Mr. Manuel, Mr. Joseph Pennell, and Mr. Edgar Wilson.

Obituary.

"A. K. H. B."

All who are interested in letters will have noted with deep regret the sudden death, through the accidental taking of poison, of Dr. Boyd, sometime Moderator of the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, known to literature by his initials "A. K. H. B." He was a pupil at King's College, London, of Frederick Denison Maurice and, after being called to the Bar, took orders. The main part of his life was spent in the important incumbency of the collegiate church of St. Andrews. He began his literary career as a contributor to Fraser's Magazine, and soon became one of the most popular, if not one of the greatest, of the English essayists. He was best known, perhaps, by "The Recreations of a Country Parson," followed by "The Graver Thoughts of a Country Parson." It was felt to be proper, if unusual, for a country parson to think; and when investigations proved that Dr. Boyd thought justly, and could express his thoughts with propriety, and an air of freshness which excused the absence of profundity, his reputation was assured. He was never over the heads of his readers, but he expressed the ideas of the average man far better than the average man could express them for himself; and he had a pleasant, cheery, anecdotal manner by which criticism, was, as a rule, disarmed. Carlyle, it is true, pointed out his limitations sardonically, saying "You may pour and pour but you will only get one cup"; but then in Carlyle's view to be entertaining was no excuse for being shallow.

In his later years, Dr. Boyd wrote several volumes of reminiscences, "Twenty-five Years of St. Andrews," "St. Andrews and Elsewhere," and "The Last Years of St. Andrews." These achieved much popularity, and deserved it by reason of their anecdotal contents. The author was a good raconteur and had plenty of good stories to tell. The tone may occasionally have been tart; but where is the volume of literary reminiscences of which this cannot be said? In all Dr. Boyd published about thirty volumes. His literary talents are inherited by two of his four sons—by Mr. Frank Boyd, who edits a theatrical paper, and by Mr. Charles Boyd, who was lately acting as Cape Town Correspondent of the Daily Telegraph, and is now private secretary to Mr. Cecil Rhodes.

MISS SARA SOPHIA HENNELL.

The death of Miss Sara Sophia Hennell on Tuesday, at the age of 86, revives interesting memories of the literary history of the century. Her brother, Charles Christian Hennell, wrote an "Inquiry Concerning the Origin of Christianity," which set the excellent example of stating the sceptical position without acrimony, and was translated into German with a preface by Strauss; her sister-in-law, Mrs. Charles Hennell, began the translation of the Leben Jesu, which George Eliot completed. Her eldest sister, Mary Hennell, contributed to Knight's "Penny Cyclopædia." Another sister, Caroline, married Charles Bray, the author of "The Philosophy of Necessity." She herself, after winning a prize offered for an essay on "Christianity and Infidelity," undertook the task of analysing Butler's "Analogy" from the rationalist point of view. Her contention was that that great work made for scepticism rather than for faith, and her arguments made so much impression that when, thirty-seven years after their appearance, Mr. Gladstone wrote his "Studies Subsidiary to Butler's Work," he judged it necessary to reply to them at length.

Most of Miss Hennell's life was passed at Coventry, where she died. Here, through Mr. Charles Bray, who was a merchant of the town, she made the acquaintance of George Eliot, then Miss Evans, and an intimate and lasting friendship sprang up between them. The friendship is understood to have had an important influence on Miss Evans' religious beliefs, which were at that date reasonably orthodox. It is noticeable, however, that Miss Evans did not inform Miss Hennell that she was the author of "Adam Bede." On the contrary, she wrote to her to ask whether she was aware that "the author is Mr. Liggins, the son of a baker, of no mark at all in the town."

Miss Hennell has left a book, not quite finished, about her brother Charles.

M. XAU, the founder and editor of the French Journal, died at the end of last week. As a writer he had made no particular mark, but he had great talents for organization. Summoning to his aid such collaborators as François Coppée, Catulle Mendès, Armand Silvestre, Georges d'Espèrès, and Léon Daudet, he produced the brightest and most literary, if not also the best informed, of the French halfpenny papers. Though a Jew, he sided, like Arthur Meyer, against Dreyfus; and, though an Anglophobe, he persuaded his readers to invest their money in English securities. Many of M. Zola's later novels ran serially in his columns.

The death is also announced of M. ALBERT BATAILLE, of the Figaro, as the result of a chill caught at Rome, where, in his capacity of Vice-President of the Association of Parisian Journalists, he was making arrangements for the forthcoming Press Congress.

Correspondence.

THE CONSOLATIONS OF TRUTH.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—Dr. Gairdner, if I understand him rightly, holds that there is always satisfaction in knowing the truth, even where the truth is painful; and that we know truth from falsehood only by this satisfaction. I, on the other hand, deny the first proposition, and contend that we know truth from falsehood only by sense and reasoning.

I admit that to know the truth is usually satisfactory. There seem to be at least three cases in which this is so. The first is where there is a pure intellectual pleasure without any evil results; as when Newton found that the moon gravitates to the earth like a stone or a ball. The second is where the truth informs us of a means to some desirable end; for example, it is satisfactory to know that there are still some kitchens in which meat is roasted before the fire. The third is where the knowledge of the truth gives immediate pain, with the expectation of better results; and it is with such knowledge that any man will have a tooth out for the sake of his health, and a hero or a martyr will die in a good cause. But there is yet another case of knowing the truth which is not at all satisfactory, either as an end or a means. There are other ends in life besides truth, and to know a truth is not satisfactory when it interferes with some greater satisfaction. It is not satisfactory to know that you are in momentary danger of shipwreck, or that you are in a railway accident, or that you are sliding down a mountain with a precipice beneath, or that you have just taken poison instead of medicine, or, if you are a murderer, that the jury has found you guilty and the judge is putting on the black cap. I confess I cannot understand what satisfaction wretched men can have in knowing such evil truths, or how they can be strengthened by knowing them, or what obligation there is to face such knowledge if they can avoid it. In fact, the love of truth is limited by the other ends of man.

As, then, the knowledge of truth is usually, but not universally, satisfactory, I concluded in my previous letter that satisfaction is not, as Dr. Gairdner supposes, the criterion of truth, and I urged that the criteria of truth are sense and reasoning from sense. Dr. Gairdner, in his letter of last week, objects that these criteria are inadequate. My reply is that, properly understood, sense and reason are adequate to all we know, that is, to all we judge to be real with certainty sensible, mathematical, or moral. By sense I did not mean merely the five external senses, as Dr. Gairdner supposes when he takes me to refer only to the "bodily senses." In conformity with philosophical usage, I included internal sense, or consciousness, the sense of one's own operations, and the instance I gave, the feeling of being ill, belongs to this internal sense. I mean by sense any direct perception, without inference, of anything real; and in this meaning the old theory holds, omnes sensus veri sunt. Fallacy lies not in sense, but in inference. Under reasoning from sense I meant to include all inferences—fallacious, probable, or certain; but I also meant to contend that, when we infer logically from sense, reason is the source of all our knowledge beyond sense.

Dr. Gairdner objects that "a flash of inspiration has often revealed to the scientific inquirer some great truth." If by inspiration he means hypothesis, I freely admit its use; but rejoin that a scientific hypothesis to account for facts is only a result of probable reasoning from those facts; and, secondly, that, so long as it is a hypothesis, we only suppose a truth, and do not know it till we make reasoning certain without hypothesis. Moreover, science, in its most fundamental and surest parts, contains much reasoned knowledge without hypothesis. For this and many other reasons I am glad to call, or recall, the attention of your readers to that beautiful example of a literary scientific style—the Sidereus Nuncius of Galileo. When that great observer excogitated his telescope, from the impressions it conveyed to his senses he was able by his reason to infer, first, that the number of fixed stars is far more than had appeared to the naked eye; secondly, that the moon has not a smooth surface, but is rough and uneven like the earth; thirdly, that the Galaxy is not a milky way but a crowd of stars; fourthly, that the nature of nebulous stars is different from what had hitherto been believed; and fifthly—quod omnem admirationem longe superat—that the planet Jupiter is accompanied by satellites, of which he found four—without any hypothesis.

Here is a great example of scientific discovery, which gave the highest satisfaction to an ardent lover of truth. But am I not right in saying that Galileo knew that it was all true, not because he was satisfied, but because his reason could make no other inferences from his senses assisted by the newly invented telescope?

I remain, Sir,

Yours faithfully,

6 March, 1899.

THOMAS CASE.

"THE FOURTEENTH CENTURY."

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—I hope I may be permitted to reply to one or two points in your elaborate criticism of my work on the literature of the fourteenth century. I do not complain of this criticism as unfair. I am sure you do not mean to be unfair. Put in another form there is hardly a sentence that I am not prepared to accept. I fear, however, that, great as may be your good will, it would not be in accord with precedent to suffer an author to recast a notice of his work.

You say that my book is neither science nor literature, but amorphous. Granted; but it would have been more acceptable to my feelings, more "gracious," if you had spoken of it as a manual of instruction with a literary flavour. That was my aim, and I should have been glad to think that I had succeeded. As to the value of the book as an authority, wherever information has been obtained at second-hand, every effort has been made to draw from the latest and best sources. Of course, as has been conceded in my preface, an attempt of this sort, even if successful, is not the kind of thing on which it is possible, save for the Freemans, to found a reputation.

I am flattered by your remarks on my "Dante" section. But I ask to be allowed to make one correction. When I wrote rhapsody, I assuredly did not mean rapture, but the lyrical element, where it exists, in epic composition. The context shows that quite clearly. Rhapsody, however, is so often, nearly always necessarily, used in a bad sense that this employment of the term amounts to an innovation. Not an unconscious innovation, but, in the circumstances, I ought perhaps to have defined and illustrated more than I did. It would have been easy. Perhaps, if the publishers give me a chance, I may show that my inexperience is not so profound as to confuse rapture and rhapsody.

With reference to my "dreadful little vulgarisms," they prove, what I knew before, that it is perilous to jest. Your reviewer is not only just but humane. Let him reflect on the burden of a whole century of European art and non-art compressed into a small volume, and then, as he has already done in the main, he will excuse blemishes—and even "dreadful little vulgarisms," if they make for cheerfulness. I intend no disrespect to my able, and probably distinguished, critic, when I add—if it is not too cliché—

"Let the galled jade wince; our withers are unwrung."

I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

Tiverton, North Devon, March 6.

F. J. SNELL.

Authors and Publishers.

The promoters of the Alfred Memorial have agreed upon the issue of a book upon the Life and Work of the King, to be issued early this spring, when the committee will appeal to the public for support in this national object. The book will be probably entitled "Alfred the Great." It will be edited by Mr. Alfred Bowker, the ex-mayor of Winchester, by whom the movement was originated. The introductory chapter will be the address delivered by Sir Walter Besant at the first meeting held at Winchester. It will also contain chapters on the Saxon Laws, by Sir Frederick Pollock; on Alfred as King, by Mr. Frederic Harrison; on Alfred as Educationist, by the Lord Bishop of Bristol; on Alfred as Captain, by Professor Oman; on Alfred as Writer, by the Rev. Professor Earle; on Alfred as Geographer, by Sir Clements Markham; and on Saxon Art, by the Rev. W. J. Loftie. It is hoped to get the book ready soon after Easter. It will be published by Messrs. A. and C. Black.

"Jonathan Wild," which has now been published in Messrs. Constable's luxurious edition of Fielding, completes the issue as far as the novels are concerned, though there are still two volumes of miscellanea to follow. Judged by the number of reprints, it is the least popular of all Fielding's romances. The present edition seems only to be the third, whereas there have been eight editions of "Amelia," twenty-two of "Joseph Andrews," and twenty-four (to say nothing of fifteen translations) of "Tom Jones." After Fielding, the same publishers will reprint the works of Smollett, and probably also those of Sterne.

Mr. Stephen Gwynn contributes the new volume to the Highways and Byways Series, published by Messrs. Macmillan, and in it will conduct his readers to Donegal, Derry, and Antrim. He will be seconded in his literary tour by Mr. Hugh Thomson, who, on this occasion, appears for the first time as an illustrator of landscape.

Mr. J. M. Robertson is about to publish "A Short History of Freethought, Ancient and Modern," the subject-matter of a course of lectures delivered by him at South-place Institute.

"A History of the Chateau de Versailles and Trianon," by M. Pierre de Nolhac, Conservateur du Chateau de Versailles, the author of the two well-known works on Marie Antoinette, is in preparation. It will be illustrated with 240 photographic plates and many smaller illustrations. The complete work will form two large volumes, but it will appear in monthly parts, the first of which is about to be published.

A new edition of some of the more popular volumes of the collection known as "Bentley's Favourite Novels" is being brought out by Messrs. Macmillan at the price of two shillings a volume. Two of Miss Broughton's earlier stories and two by Miss Fothergill have been issued. Other volumes of the series and also of some novels selected from Messrs. Macmillan's own list will be published in couples twice a month.

A declaration of policy from the libraries strikes a blow at the proposal to publish novels first in the sixpenny and then in the six-shilling format. If this is done, the publishers have been informed, they must not expect six-shilling copies to be taken by the libraries, as the libraries propose to buy the sixpenny copies and bind them for themselves.

Mr. S. T. Freemantle, formerly with Messrs. George Routledge, and latterly with Mr. John C. Nimmo and Messrs. Skeffington, has commenced business as a publisher on his own account at 217, Piccadilly, W.

Mr. Augustine Birrell, M.P., will take the chair at the annual dinner of the Incorporated Society of Authors, which is to be held on May 4th.

Messrs. Longmans announce "England in the Age of Wycliffe," by G. M. Trevelyan, Fellow of Trinity, Cambridge, for publication next week.

Messrs. Horace Marshall and Son announce a new volume of Dr. Joseph Parker's "Studies in Texts," forming the third of a series of six volumes.

Mr. Arrowsmith has in the press a "Life of Robert Raikes," the founder of Sunday schools, by J. Henry Harris. It will contain a photogravure plate of Raikes and other portraits.

The quarterly to be edited by Lady Randolph Churchill has not yet been given a name. It is understood that this new adventure, which is to cost one guinea net, will be first published by Mr. John Lane in June.

On the ashes of the defunct trilingual review Cosmopolis a new bilingual periodical has arisen, entitled Deutsche-Französische Rundschau (Revue Franco-Allemande). It is published in Munich.

A Russian revolutionary paper, called "On the Eve," has appeared in London, founded by a group headed by an ex-naval officer who distinguished himself in the Servo-Bulgarian war, M. Hesper Serebriakoff. Its object is to combat the domestic policy of the Tsar's Government.

A translation into English verse of Wagner's Parsifal will shortly be issued to subscribers. The translator is Mr. A. Forman.

Messrs. Oliphant, Anderson, and Ferrier have secured the British copyright of Mr. Sheldon's latest book, "One of the Two," and they also announce a presentation edition of "In His Steps."

A monograph on the ancient topography of Troy, by Professor Placido Bianco, of the Italian School of Smyrna, will be shortly published in Florence. The title will be "Schliemann et Homère."

The Cambridge University Press is publishing a new work on fermentation from the pen of Prof. Reynolds Green, forming a volume of the Biological Series now appearing under the editorship of Mr. A. E. Shipley, of Christ's College.

We understand that Mr. W. J. Stillman's "Union of Italy" is just going into a second edition.

Mr. J. Eveleigh Nash has written a theological work bearing the striking title, "Adam's Grandfather."

Sir Harry Johnston and Mr. F. C. Selous are among the contributors to the volume on the "Great and Small Game of Africa," shortly to be published, at five guineas, by Mr. Rowland Ward. Mr. H. A. Bryden will edit the volume.

Mr. Tegetmeier has in the press a work on the "House Sparrow," considered in relation to agriculture and gardening. The work, which will be published by Messrs. Vinton, contains the opinions of all the most important ornithologists and agriculturists on the importance of this bird, and concludes with practical suggestions for lessening its numbers.

Mr. Arlo Bates, the author of "The Puritans," which has recently been published here by Messrs. Constable, has a volume of verse now in the press which will be published by Messrs. Houghton during the spring, and is called "Under the Beech Tree." A few of the poems have been published in Harpers and the Century, but for the most part they are new.

Messrs. Putnams have now in preparation a "Commemoration Edition" of Mr. Samuel Harden Church's "Life of Cromwell." This edition—the fifth—will be got out in connexion with the three hundredth anniversary of the birth of Cromwell, April 25, 1899, and will be copiously illustrated with portraits.

Messrs. Putnams also announce the following books for the spring:—"History of the Territorial Expansion of the United States," by Mr. Charles Henry Butler; a second volume of the "History of the People of the Netherlands," by Professor P. J. Blok, of the University of Leyden, translated by Miss Ruth Putnam; "Bismarck and the New German Empire," by Mr. J. V. Headlam, M.A., Fellow of King's College, Cambridge; and "Oliver Cromwell and the Rule of the English Puritan," by Mr. Charles Firth—both in the Heroes of the Nations Series; "A Life of Paul Jones," fully illustrated, and embodying material not before presented, by Mr. James Barnes; and "A Century of American Statesmen; a Biographical Survey of American Politics from the Inauguration of Jefferson to the close of the Nineteenth Century," by Dr. Moses Coit Tyler, in four volumes.

A work on "The History of the Parish of Preston" will shortly be published for subscribers by Mr. James Clegg, of Rochdale. The author, Lieut.-Colonel Fishwick, F.S.A., has made use of much unpublished matter in the Record Office, the British Museum, and the Diocesan registries of Chester and Richmond, as well as of local material. The town of Preston was of great importance during the Civil War and the rebellions of 1715 and 1745, and its history provides a curious study in the development of local justice and parliamentary representation, and in the social and economic importance of the Convent and the Guild.

M. Felix Alcan announces for publication between the 15th March and the end of April, in his "Library of Contemporary Philosophy," "La Justice par l'état," by M. P. Lapié; "Tolstoi, penseur Moraliste," by M. Ossip Lourié; "Principes d'une sociologie objective," by M. Ad. Coste; and "L'Instabilité Mentale," by M. Duprat; in his "Library of Contemporary History," a volume by M. Vallaux, entitled "Les Campagnes des armées françaises;" in his "Scientific International Library," "La Nature Tropicale," by Costantin, and "La Géologie Expérimentale," by Stanislas Meunier; in his "General Library of Social Sciences," "Les Transformations du pouvoir," by M. G. Tarde.

Two more notable novels of which sixpenny reprints are in course of preparation are "Adam Bede," published by Blackwood, and "Esther Waters," published by Mr. Walter Scott.

Mr. Crockett's new novel, "The Black Douglas," will be published shortly by Messrs. Smith and Elder.

Messrs. Longmans are publishing a novel by Mrs. Wilfrid Ward, to be called "One Poor Scruple."

"The Realist: a modern Romance," is to be the title of Mr. Herbert Flowerdew's new novel, which will shortly be issued by Mr. John Lane.

A second series of Mr. Cutcliffe Hyne's Captain Kettle stories will be published by Messrs. Pearson in the Autumn. Mr. Hyne has also completed a novel dealing with the Island of Atlantis, and the Universal Deluge. The name of the hero of this romance is Deucalion, but the name of the heroine is not Pyrrha; and the story is said to have been suggested to the author by certain geological studies which he pursued at the University of Cambridge.

"Through a Keyhole," overheard by Cosmo Hamilton, is the title of the new book which the author of "The Glamour of the Impossible" is now completing.

A Vice-President of the Royal Asiatic Society.

" . . . Sir William Hunter predicts that America will continue the process of elevation in the British Indian history which has never yet been written, and which we have been waiting for."— calm judgment. Many of the materials collected have hitherto been unknown, and the result of the examination is to set in a wholly new light many episodes in some of the best known parts of Indian history. We should add that the narrative has its lessons, weighty and opportune, and the author strongly presses one or two of them on the statesmen of his time."—The Times.

THE SENSE OF HUMOUR.

There is perhaps no deadlier affront which can be offered to a man of intelligence and education than to deny him the possession of a "sense of humour." Such a man will confess more readily to almost any other form of intellectual or even moral shortcoming. He will admit that art says little or nothing to him; that he has no appreciation of poetry; that the mystical element in religion, or even that the spiritual side of life in general imperfectly appeals to him. In other words, he can easily resign himself to being regarded as suffering from total or partial blindness to some of the most beautiful objects of man's inward vision, so long as you will not charge him with being unable to "see a joke." It is not necessary just now to attempt any complete analysis of this psychological peculiarity. Possibly it arises from the revolt of the human sense of dignity against any accusation which tends to make the object of it ridiculous. A man without a sense of humour becomes himself provocative of the mirth of his fellows; whereas most other deficiencies excite only the pity, or it may be the repugnance, of one's fellow men, either of which is easier to bear than their derision. But, be the explanation what it may, the fact at any rate is a thoroughly well observed one. The charge in question is universally and indignantly repudiated by men, though women have been always expected, and hitherto have for the most part meekly consented, to plead guilty to it. At last, however, in the current number of a monthly magazine, a sufficiently wrathful protest has been raised against it by two writers of the latter sex, who indeed have had the spirit to carry the war into the enemy's country, and boldly to head their article "The Sense of Humour in Men." It must have cost them some self-restraint not to point the obvious innuendo of this title with the "epigram" of a note of interrogation.

It is far from our intention to enter the lists with these two lady contributors to the Cornhill. Perhaps, however, we may be forgiven for incidentally pointing out to them that their insensibility to any element of the comic in the mere fact of their collaboration, and their unconsciousness of the still more patent absurdity of an attempt to repel the charge of a deficient sense of humour with so desperately serious a weapon as that of angry diatribe, are in themselves indicative of precisely those limitations which have given colour to the calumny. But the two most notable points in this highly acidulated essay—as indeed in most discussions of the same subject—are, first, the neglect to distinguish between intellectual apprehension and emotional enjoyment of the humorous, and, secondly, the singularly narrow construction which they place upon the word itself. They write as if "jokes," in the sense of verbal pleasantries, were the sole expression and embodiment of the quality of humour, and as if all the articulate utterances of man could be sharply and definitively divided into "jokes" and "not-jokes." And they persistently confound the ability to "see" jokes with the capacity of being amused by them. The latter capacity, of course, is quite accidental and irrelevant to the particular question we are now considering. That one hearer may be moved to laughter by a sally which leaves another hearer unamused does not necessarily prove any inequality of appreciative power between the two. It is as often as not a mere matter of temperament or even of passing mood. Or, again, it is, no doubt, perfectly true—to take a point which our two essayists labour with somewhat superfluous persistence—that some forms of the humorous excite in some natures and not in others emotions antagonistic to, and victorious over, any tendency to mirth. Thus there is nothing at all anomalous, though they seem to think so, in the existence of the "man's jokes" at which women feel no inclination to laugh. "I see what amuses him," the ladies put it, "but you don't really expect us to laugh at that." Well, if they do see what amuses him, that is all that is required to prove their sense of the humorous. The organs through which that sense is exercised are no doubt intimately connected with the nerve-centres which govern the "reflex action" of laughter; but there is no ground for absolutely identifying the two.

The physical response to humour, however, is not of the essence of the matter, and hence the degree of amusement, as measured by such physical response, which we derive from one another's jokes, is hardly worth serious investigation. Moreover, the inadequacy of the conception of what is included under the word humour detracts largely, as we have pointed out, from the value of most such discussions. As long as humour is considered solely as an affair of "jokes," or, in other words, as the distinctive quality of sayings or writings deliberately designed by the speaker or writer to exhibit that quality, a perception of its existence is no great test of the hearer's or the reader's sensibility to the humorous. The emission of a joke either by the tongue or the pen is usually to be recognized by other signs than its intrinsic facetiousness. Its recognition in print is sometimes facilitated by typographical aids, and in conversation it is often, so to speak, italicized by the circumstances of its utterance. But humour in its truer and wider significance is not a sort of "extract" distilled from the products of thought and observation; it is a pervading ingredient in phenomena which is apt to be precipitated in the most unexpected ways—an aspect of the relations of things to each other which, at one moment invisible, may at the next be brought into view with all the suddenness of the sun-ray which, at the slightest change in the spectator's attitude, is flashed back upon him from some light-reflecting point in a landscape. It is in the instant perception of this new object of mental vision that the true sense of humour consists; and the presence of that power of perception in some persons, its total absence in others, and the widely differing degrees of rapidity and keenness with which it manifests itself in different people, are continually being illustrated in the daily converse of life. We use the word "perception" advisedly, and as intended to include the process of intellectual recognition which here, as in the case of the physical vision, has to follow and complete the mere sensorial impression. And, just as the unobservant man continually "fails to see"—as people loosely say for "fails to notice"—objects which are nevertheless perfectly pictured on his retina, so on the brain-tablets of the humourless man do the comic relations of objects and ideas depict themselves without being recognized for what they are.

The inability to recognize them is, of course, not absolute in any one. There are certain simple rudimentary incongruities of thought and thing which leap to the view almost of the child. They could hardly miss being "seen," these jokes of Nature or accident, any more than some huge and grotesque object could escape notice in the foreground of a landscape. But once we get away from these "gross-as-a-mountain, open, palpable" specimens of the humorous, and pass to those finer and subtler examples of it with which, for such as possess the power of perceiving them, the world abounds, we do undoubtedly find the faculty in question distinguished as between individuals by infinite gradations of efficiency, and ranging from the lowest point of dulness to the highest point of acuteness. At what level on the scale the two sexes respectively stand is a question which we gladly resign to the two indignant essayists above referred to, merely remarking that, if they wish to convince rather than to rebuke, they will have to set about their work in a different way. There is, however, one remark which it is obvious to make, and which is founded upon universal experience—namely, that, of the two sexes, women are, in appearance at any rate, very much the unreadier to recognize the existence of the humorous side of serious things. Possibly their inability—or, if not their inability, their obstinate refusal—to effect the almost instantaneous mental readjustment which it is necessary to make in passing from the serious to the humorous side of things has been misconstrued; and women have in consequence been taxed with not "seeing" elements of the comic which in fact they do see but decline to notice. It is not improbable that an error of this kind forms the original basis of the venerable gibe at the Scotch on their supposed lack of humour. The Scottish mind refuses to readjust itself at a moment's notice to the lighter view of any subject upon which it is seriously bent; sometimes it impatiently resents even the demand for readjustment. But this defect at bottom, if we come to examine it, is not mental but temperamental. In the Scot, as in the woman, it merely argues a certain inelasticity of mood, but in neither case does it call for anything so serious as a surgical operation to correct it.

It has long been known that the British Museum contains the best collection in the world of tracts and pamphlets bearing on the French Revolution; and it is satisfactory to learn that the whole 48,579 of them have now been classified and catalogued by the indefatigable energy of Mr. G. K. Fortescue. The satisfaction, however, is, to a certain extent, tempered by the feeling that the Museum authorities have been an unreasonably long time in setting about, and putting through, this important bibliographical task. They acquired the great bulk of the pamphlets as long ago as 1817; the two supplementary collections came into their hands in 1831 and 1856. The first lot, at any rate, might therefore have very well been ready for Carlyle, who, indeed, complained of their inaccessibility in his evidence before the Royal Commission in 1849. As a matter of fact no student has yet had proper facilities for taking a bird's-eye view of them. Knowing this, we cannot wonder that Mr. Herbert Spencer once pointed to the operations of the British Museum to illustrate his theory of the invariable inferiority of public to private enterprise. The reasons for this slow progress are, no doubt, mainly of a financial order; and it really seems a pity that the State cannot be more liberal to the Museum. A niggardly policy is the less justifiable because the amount needed is quite small. In the case of such things as Naval Estimates a few thousands a year are neither here nor there. In the case of a library they may make all the difference between absolute and only comparative efficiency.

Whilst the German Emperor is talking of our "great common race," and recognizing the possibility of co-operating with England in the task of civilizing Africa, it is a pity that there should be no closer literary rapprochement between the two nations. The publication of English translations of Hauptmann's plays by Mr. Heinemann, of which two more, The Weavers and Lonesome Lives, have just appeared, is, we hope, a sign of a growing curiosity about living German writers, for whom the drama is at present the chief vehicle of expression. But Englishmen undoubtedly take much less interest in German than they do in French and Scandinavian current literature. Perhaps one explanation is that German does not flourish in the school class-room. Taught properly, it is quite as easy to learn as French, and both on commercial and literary grounds there is a good deal to be said for giving it a place before French in the school curriculum.

The want of sympathy is reciprocal, but we are not sure that the Germans—although they did think, or, at any rate, spoke as if they thought, that Mr. Kipling was an American—do not know more about our literature than we do about theirs. Herr Paul Heichen's biography of Dickens, just published, is, for instance, a remarkable production. Dickens has revived a good deal of late in his native country. Two or three new editions of his novels and sketches are in course of publication; the history of the illustrations to them has been well threshed out; and the one plot which he conceived as a consistent and dramatic whole has once more found its way on to the boards in the extremely well staged and acted performance now running at the Lyceum under the title of The Only Way. But Herr Heichen's book shows that Dickens is quite as much alive in Germany. It follows upon a complete translation of the novels; and it contains, in a bibliographical appendix, some striking facts about the vast mass of Dickens' matter in German books and periodicals, and about German "Dickens Societies." One chapter on "Mit Dickens durch London" is a very creditable piece of topography to have emanated from a foreigner.

The news from Canada makes it clear that the real Canadian authors have no wish to see copyright proposals made in their name by the alleged Canadian Society of Authors. In particular, they protest against the suggestion that the Canadian Minister of Justice should embody the views of the Society in a despatch to the Colonial Office as an authorized exposition of the wishes of Canadian writers; and they demonstrate, in letters to the Canadian newspapers, that the Society is far from being such a representative association as it claims to be. The Canadian authors with whose names the world is most familiar—such authors as Mr. Gilbert Parker, Mr. Grant Allen, Mr. James Barr, and Mr. Robert Barr—are not connected with it; while the men who are most prominent in its counsels have, in most cases, only an indirect or remote connexion with literature. The Chairman, for example, is primarily a politician. Another prominent "author" is the Canadian agent of an American publishing house, and a publisher, in a small way, on his own account. A third is a librarian. Others are school-masters or professors. It is to be hoped that the Colonial Office will make a note of these facts in case the threatened despatch should ever reach them.

In order to do justice to every one, we will admit that there is one real grievance from which Canadian printers and publishers suffer. As the law at present stands, an English reprint of a book first issued in Canada might be imported into the Dominion to their detriment. It is not a very actual grievance, for the reason that the number of books worth reprinting which make their first appearance in Canada is not very large. Still, there the grievance is, and there is no denying that it ought to be removed. Authors (whether English or Canadian) are not responsible for its existence, and would be the last people in the world to put obstacles in the way of its removal.

Life, Writings, and Correspondence of George Borrow. Derived from Official and other Authentic Sources. By William I. Knapp, Ph.D., LL.D., late of Yale and Chicago Universities. With Portrait and Illustrations. 2 vols. 9 x 5½ in., xviii. + 402 + 406 pp. 1899. London: John Murray. New York: Putnam. 32/-

The peculiar people called Borrowians, who in ever increasing numbers and with no decrease of enthusiasm continue to keep up the cult of George Borrow, have found their vates sacer at last. Hitherto this unique and fascinating personality has been seen through a glass darkly, or rather has been swathed about in a mist of mythos—for rarely has any man been more lied about—and, in the absence of evidence that could be verified, his career has been assumed to be such an enigma as to warrant the use of constructive fiction in dealing with his life's story. But, thanks to the great National Dictionary and its influence, we live in the age of severe biographical science, and, accordingly, Professor Knapp has presented us in these two volumes with a life picture of his hero such as only literary portraiture can supply—inasmuch as the pen, far more completely than the brush, enables us to see a man from all sides and stript of all disguises.

Of Professor Knapp it is not enough to say that he is by nature and temperament a Hero-worshipper, and that he has thrown his whole heart—we might almost say his whole life—into this extraordinary book. He is something more than any ordinary critic could describe him. How can we speak adequately of a man who is at once an Idealist almost to the point of mysticism, and as stern and cold and pitiless a critic as ever set himself to edit a scarcely decipherable palimpsest? For well-nigh fifty years this American scholar and teacher—a master of many tongues, himself a wanderer, qui mores hominum multorum vidit et urbes—has been possessed by the conviction that he had a mission in life, and that that mission was to make George Borrow known unto men. It is really quite a pathetic story that he tells us;—"how the enthusiasm for linguistic and gipsy studies with which he (Borrow) inspired my youth has never suffered any decline these fifty years, or allowed my love for his memory to grow dim"; how, "during a long residence in the Peninsula, his lines of travel were trodden over by me many times"; how "eventually I secured his papers, the correspondence of half a century and more, his notebooks of travels, his manuscripts, and the scattered remains of his library"; how finally he crossed the Atlantic, giving up a lucrative appointment in the University of Chicago because

It came to be more and more patent to my mind that the life could only be written in Norfolk, and that, too, after a considerable sojourn in its metropolitan centre. There would be something in the atmosphere of Norwich that would disclose Borrow.

Three years in Norwich—collecting, inquiring, following indefatigably the smallest clues, spending money freely in journeying to and fro, accumulating a mass of documentary evidence regardless of cost, till one wonders how any purse could have borne the drain. At last, putting what must have been a painful restraint upon himself in withholding so much and saying so much less than he would have loved to say, he has produced these two volumes, of which it is no exaggeration to say that they constitute one of the oddest curiosities of which the history of authorship can tell.

You may call this monomania if you like. But if so, are there not some who, in view of the rarity of such absorption by an idea, and the value of the results arrived at, will be inclined to say, "Then Vive la manie!" The outcome of all this devotion of a life-time to a self-imposed task is the publication of two volumes containing such a monograph on Borrow as his most ardent worshippers could desire to possess, and by the help of which we are able to follow every step in his romantic career from his birth in 1803 to his lonely death in 1881.

George Henry Borrow was sprung from a Cornish family of the yeoman class. His father, when a mere lad, got into a scrape at Menheniot Fair by knocking down the headborough of the town during a free fight that was going on; and, finding it advisable to make himself scarce, he enlisted in the Coldstream Guards in 1783, turned out an excellent soldier, was transferred to the West Norfolk Militia as Sergeant-Major of the regiment in 1793, and found himself stationed at East Dereham, where he married the daughter of a small farmer, Ann Perfrement by name, a descendant of one of those Huguenot families who migrated to East Anglia after the revocation of the Edict of Nantes. The regiment was continually moving from place to place, and in 1803 the sergeant-major had become adjutant with the rank of captain, and was settled for a while at Dereham again, where George Borrow was born. Captain Borrow's duties were concerned with recruiting for the Army; he never saw foreign service, but his wanderings up and down Great Britain and Ireland were incessant. Professor Knapp has followed the track of these nomads from place to place till they finally took up their abode at Norwich in 1816: the captain, his wife, and two sons, of whom George was the younger. During a boyhood singularly resembling that of Sterne the mysterious George had, literally, been picking up his education as he could get it. The father never omitted to send his boys to school wherever he was stationed; and we find them at one time at the Grammar School of Huddersfield, at Edinburgh High School in 1813, then at Clonmel, in Tipperary, where George "began the study of Greek" and learnt to speak Irish. Finally he entered at the Norwich Grammar School under a scholar of some eminence in his day, the Rev. Edward Valpy, and here he had among his schoolfellows a number of lads whose names are written on the roll of fame; among them Sir James Brooke Rajah of Sarawak, Sir Archdale Wilson of Delhi, Professor Lindley the botanist, and, in some respects the most illustrious of them all, the venerable sage, Dr. James Martineau, who still survives. Borrow could never have been high in the school. In fact he appears to have been nowhere. How could a lad with such antecedents have been anything but erratic? Such boys settle to nothing. He had a memory which was extraordinary, and could pile up all sorts of scraps of information; they were always ready at call, but it mattered little whether they were pulled out for use by the heads or the tails. There were gipsies on Mousehold-heath. Young Borrow prowled about among their tents, learnt to talk Romany, sang the Romany songs, spent his spare afternoons with them and his very few spare pence—for that exceedingly frugal father of his was not likely to give his younger son too much pocket-money to squander—and soon became an expert (as we phrase it now) in gipsy lore. One day in 1819 the lad of sixteen took it into his head to do what in those days was no uncommon thing for a youth to do—he ran away from school. He was brought back, flogged, then removed by his father, and articled with an attorney at Norwich for five years. During these years he was an omnivorous reader, dabbled in Anglo-Saxon, Welsh, and Danish, and apparently really learnt German of William Taylor, who by this time was sinking into a wicked old sot, but who has left his testimony to the fact that Borrow never forgot anything and never needed to be told anything twice. Just as he completed his articles, Borrow's father died. There was a small provision for the widow; there was nothing for the sons. George was left to his own resources. He was just twenty-one. Standing six foot three in his stockings, big of bone, subtle of brain, ready of speech, quick of eye, perfectly fearless, passionless, and unemotional; what was to become of the young Hercules? The answer might have been guessed from a review of Professor Knapp's microscopic scrutiny of his boyhood. For "the boy is father of the man," and from such juvenile antecedents as his it would have been odd indeed if there had not been evolved a character and a career at once bizarre, provokingly out of the common, and yet nothing more than was to be expected.

The youth made a plunge and started for London; he would live by literature! Unhappy lad! He made the horrible mistake of thinking he was a poet. He always believed he was. He never could have earned ten shillings a week by writing doggerel for a blacking merchant. He narrowly missed Chatterton's fate; but he earned a trifle by writing a tale. Then he fairly turned gipsy. It was a mere passing freak, however, and no more. In 1826 he is at Norwich again, printing his Romantic Ballads—poor stuff, but bringing grist to the mill. The craze for acquiring new tongues never ceasing, his fame as an extraordinary linguist began to spread. But how he lived during the next few years not even Professor Knapp can discover quite to his own satisfaction.

At the end of 1832 Borrow's connexion with the Bible Society begins. He fell among the Evangelicals; and certain good people in Norfolk took him up. Among them was Mrs. Clarke of Oulton, a widow of thirty-six or thereabouts, whom he afterwards married. The Society wanted a "Polyglott gentleman" who would engage to learn the Manchou-Tartar language in six months and then proceed to Russia and bring out a translation of the New Testament. Borrow offered himself, was accepted after a week's examination "in various Eastern languages," and found his métier at last. In little more than two years from this time—which years he spent in Russia—he had not only learnt Manchou but had actually printed the four Gospels in that language. The critics, and some of them very competent critics too, pronounced the work a wonderful performance, and Borrow's name became known all over Europe. At this time he was capable of translating at least thirty languages. In 1836 he was doing work for the Bible Society in Spain, where he was piling up materials for his two memorable books, "The Bible in Spain" and the "Gypsies in Spain." His wanderings in the Peninsula Professor Knapp has followed almost step by step, tracking him about as a detective tracks the rogue he is sent to "shadow." It is an exciting romance in its way, this Spanish experience. Borrow had much to complain of at the hands of the Bible Society. On the whole it seems pretty clear that he was not fairly treated. The evidence laid before us in the first volume justifies the biographer's verdict that "No man ever had a cleaner portfolio." On the 23rd April, 1840, his seven years' connexion with the society came to an end, and on that day he married Mrs. Clarke at St. Peter's, Cornhill—getting with her a small landed estate of four or five hundred a year.

Professor Knapp has made a mistake in not ending his first volume with this incident, for with it the romance of Borrow's life closes. The remaining forty years were spent in writing books, and publishing them, and earning the solid fame which has been bestowed upon him ungrudgingly. The second volume is the chronicle of a fairly industrious, and certainly a brilliant, literary career, with an elaborate commentary and a mass of illustrative matter which all true Borrowians will delight in and be grateful for.

As for the second volume, the general reader will hardly find it excitingly attractive. Borrow's literary and domestic life offered very little that his biographer could make exceptionally interesting; it was relieved by very few incidents that were not trivial and commonplace. His books did not improve as their author grew older. He fiercely resented any criticism that was not laudatory. He shrank from the gaze of the public—rather preferred to pose as a mysterious sage, had very few friends, and apparently did not improve upon acquaintance; though upon some of those who consorted with him he produced a profound impression. Among these were FitzGerald, who wrote him an occasional letter, and Mr. Theodore Watts-Dunton, who has celebrated in a fine sonnet his last meeting with his friend on Blackfriars Bridge in 1874.

Professor Knapp has not ventured on more than a bare recital of facts and discoveries. He leaves to others—and perhaps wisely—anything like a critical examination of Borrow's place in English literature. During the next few months we shall hear enough of that from those who are not likely to claim too little for the author of "Lavengro."

Aspects of Religious and Scientific Thought. By the late Richard Holt Hutton. Selected from the Spectator, and Edited by his Niece, Elizabeth M. Roscoe. 7½ x 5 in., 415 pp. Macmillan. 5/-

Readers of many kinds, and of many varieties of theological and philosophical opinion, will welcome this volume of selections from the articles contributed over a long series of years to the Spectator by the late Mr. R. H. Hutton. There was probably no English writer of our day, not being himself a divine or a professor of divinity, whose essays on religious subjects, and especially on that branch of them which comes into closest contact with scientific thought and inquiry, were read with more attention than those which, amid the continual pre-occupations of editorship and political controversy, this earnest thinker and accomplished writer contributed week by week to that review which for so many strenuous and successful years he assisted to conduct. Of a deeply religious temperament, Mr. Hutton was at the same time a man of fearless speculative habit, and one who never shrank before any of the difficulties with which that habit brought him face to face; nor perhaps was there ever a seeker after truth who in every line of his writings gave stronger evidence of his firm conviction that the truth would make him whole. His niece, Miss Elizabeth M. Roscoe, who has edited the volume, has been assisted in her pious work by Mr. Hutton's co-editor and intimate friend, Mr. Meredith; and the papers which they have selected for publication are certainly among the most characteristic writings of their author. We confess that we do not quite comprehend the principle upon which, after selection, the essays contained in "Aspects of Religious and Scientific Thought" have been arranged. Their arrangement is defiant of chronology—we pass from 1875 to 1889, and back again to 1873, in the first half-dozen essays—yet without conforming to any discernible rule of classification by way of subject. For many theologians, as perhaps for still more philosophers, this disregard of dates might have disconcerting results; but Mr. Hutton's opinions were calculated to stand it as well as any man's. They underwent no—or no transforming—developments from first to last, and the author of "The Materialist's Stronghold" in 1874 addresses us unchanged alike in convictions and in method in "The Great Agnostic"—the searching but sympathetic criticism, written shortly after Professor Huxley's death, of his intellectual character and scientific writings.

This is, indeed, a typical piece of the author's work, marked with all the precision of reasoning and decision of tone that distinguished his theological criticism, yet full also of that curious and rather pathetic wistfulness which seldom fails to reveal its presence here and there in all Mr. Hutton's writings. His analysis of that famous apologue of Professor Huxley's in which the life of man was likened to a game of chess played against an unseen antagonist, relentless, but "always fair, just, and patient," is most effective; and his exposure of the inconsistencies of language and thought into which the Agnostic fatalist is betrayed by the exigencies of his allegory could hardly have been better done. "There," he writes:—

you see Professor Huxley in his full force. But whence was that force derived? At least as much from the want of logic, with which his emotions coloured his conceptions, as from the courageous scepticism in which the passage abounds. Professor Huxley professed to know that the hidden antagonist who does not even hesitate to checkmate his human opponent for not knowing the rules of a game which he has generally had no opportunity of learning is "always just, fair, and patient." How could Professor Huxley be an "Agnostic" if he knew as much as that? Is it true Agnosticism to assume anything of the kind? What can be less like Agnosticism than to depict the unseen antagonist as "an angel who plays for love, as we say, and would rather lose than win?" The whole idealism of the picture would have vanished if Professor Huxley had held to his Agnosticism, and had told us that we do not know whether the hidden player is a fair player or even a player at all, or only an automaton without a mind and without a purpose—perhaps fair, just, and patient, but quite as probably incapable of so much as thought or feeling of its own—a thing to which fairness, justice, and patience are qualities as inapplicable as they would be to the stone wall against which a man breaks his head, or the prussic acid by which he stops the action of his heart. Nothing seems to me clearer than that Professor Huxley borrowed from a religion which he thought wholly unproved his description of the unseen player in the great game of life.

To how many elaborate philosophies of negation, constructed quite unconsciously out of the materials of affirmative creeds, would this admirable analysis apply!

The volume is perhaps a little overweighted with the eternal controversy between Faith and Scientific Materialism. The latter word, in fact, or one of its derivatives, actually enters into the titles of no fewer than four distinct essays in the volume, and is of the stuff and substance of at least half of the remaining fifty. That circumstance, however, is not to be regretted, as the borderland between religion and science is undoubtedly the region in which Mr. Hutton's dialectic appears to the best advantage. Unlike many upholders of the Spiritualist as against the Materialist theory, he had a thorough grasp of his opponents' principles and an exceptional power of imaginatively realizing their conceptions; and this lends a breadth to his reasonings which favourably distinguish them from those of the polemical theologian who has devoted no more study to the scientific position than will enable him to apprehend it, as it were, from the outside. As an advocate of Theism, in the everlasting cause of Theist versus Agnostic, Mr. Hutton is one of the best equipped and most effective of disputants; as a champion of Anglicanism, especially against so redoubtable a representative of Nonconformity as Dr. Martineau, he appears to less advantage. The rôle of a defender of the principle of authority against that of private judgment does not sit quite easily on him; and the paper in which he discusses and combats the great Unitarian's book on "The Seat of Authority in Religion" distinctly strikes one as "protesting too much." It impresses us rather as the work of a man who, having formerly held and subsequently abandoned the opinions he is now opposing, is still haunted by a suspicion that they are perhaps sound, and attempts to make emphasis of manner do duty for firmness of conviction. This disquietude is less noticeable in his criticism of Dr. Martineau's address to the students of Manchester New College in 1881, where, too, he earns our warmest gratitude by the quotations which he has made from it. There is no admirer of great literature who will not be glad to be reminded of the magnificent passage cited by Mr. Hutton on pp. 197-199, one of the noblest that ever came from the pen of a writer, who, so far as a Classic can be compared with a Romantic, stands side by side with Mr. Ruskin as one of the two greatest living masters of English prose.

Of poetry Mr. Hutton was, as we all remember, an almost too appreciative critic, his prompt and perpetual recognition of new poets exposing him at times to the good-humoured raillery of his literary brethren. But if his standard of poetic importance was, perhaps, not sufficiently exacting, his sense of poetic quality was fine and true. In his generous eagerness for the discernment of early promise, he may have ranked many young poets somewhat higher than their merits or their power warranted; but we cannot recall an instance of his classing any one as a poet who had not a genuine title to the name. He was perhaps a better judge of the matter of poetry than of its form, and, naturally enough, the poetry of thought appealed to him more strongly than that of passion or imagination; but, within the limits imposed upon him by temperament and mental habit, his eye and hand were very sure. It is perhaps a pity that the scope of this volume was not so extended as to admit some of Mr. Hutton's papers on strictly literary themes; for those actually contained in it, such as the essays on "The Modern Poetry of Doubt" and the theology of Tennyson and Browning, deal only with the religious aspect of their respective subjects. Even, however, as so restricted, they are highly interesting and testify eloquently to their author's penetrating insight into the tendencies of modern poetry as regards its treatment of the religious instinct in man. It is when he exchanges the function of criticism for that of speculative prophecy—and of prophecy unsupported by any of the prophet's unquestioning force of conviction—that he becomes here, as elsewhere, in like circumstances, so pathetically futile. Thus, after dwelling justly enough on "the consensus of the higher poets of our day in a frank and sad confession of doubt, with an undertone of faith," he concludes:—

It seems to me to show one of two things—either that we are on the eve of a long and uncertain era of spiritual suspense—scepticism qualified by a yearning hope—or that the way is preparing for a day of clearer and more solid trust than the world has yet known.

The prophet, that is to say, is prepared to stake his prophetic reputation on the prevision of one of two things: either that we shall continue to be as sceptical as ever, or that we shall not. "If the jury thought the witnesses worthy of credit, they would believe them; and if they didn't, why then they wouldn't." It may seem unpardonably flippant to quote this parallel passage from the charge of Mr. Justice Stareleigh in the memorable case of "Bardell v. Pickwick"; but the comparison irresistibly suggests itself. Nearly thirty years have passed since this "prediction in the alternative" was delivered, and certainly the poetry of the day, from that of Mr. Watson downwards, shows much more distinct signs of a scepticism not always "qualified by a yearning hope" than of a "clearer and more solid trust." But Mr. Hutton, it will be seen, has so made up his book that on either event he "stands to win."

BIRDS.

Birds. By A. H. EVANS, M.A., Clare College, Cambridge. Being a volume of the "Cambridge Natural History." 9x6½ in., xvi. + 635 pp. London, 1899. Macmillan. 17s. n.

It was, we suppose, inevitable that the "Cambridge Natural History" should include a volume on Birds. This, frankly, presents itself to us as the only raison d'être of the book before us. Mr. Evans, in his preface, tells us that "he has essayed the difficult and apparently unattempted task of including in some six hundred pages a short description of the majority of the forms in many of the Families, and of the most typical or important of the innumerable species included in the large Passerine Order. Prefixed to each group is a brief summary of the Structure and Habits, a few further particulars of the same nature being subsequently added where necessary, with a statement of the main Fossil forms as yet recorded." Further, this book represents its author's attempt "to meet a need which he believes to be somewhat widely felt"; he hopes "that the work may be of real use not only to the tyro in ornithology, but also to the traveller or resident in foreign parts," who may need "the aid of a concise account of the species likely to cross his path." We fear these hopes will not be realized.

It must be obvious at the very outset that the author has addressed himself not to a "difficult," but to a hopeless task. There is either no need for a book of "short descriptions," or, if there is, it had better be left unsatisfied; for short descriptions are very apt to end in fog. This book is either too large or not large enough. You cannot push a scientific work up to the verge of the popular and leave it there. You must needs go further or do less. Mr. Evans might either have expanded his volume into two, and made an attractive book, or have condensed it into smaller space and given us a book exhaustively instructive if rigidly exact.

The weak point—a point in the very premiss it seems to us—lies in that idea, description. Not description but differentiation is, surely, what we look for in an ostensible guide to determination of forms. Your differentiation may turn upon structure, or habits, or distribution, or all three, but differentiate you must, as far as may be, and a hundred times so if you are writing for the "tyro" or the "traveller in foreign parts." Absolute differentiation is often impossible. Had our author's description been even narrowed down to such characteristics as more or less closely tended to identification, the work would have had a distinct claim to usefulness ; but what is the case ? Take the Pigeons :—

Omitting the abnormal Didine Birds, the habits of the members of this group (sic) are fairly uniform. . . . Wood Pigeons towards winter and Passenger Pigeons when nesting—not to mention other instances—gather in large flocks ; in some cases, however, the parties only number about half a dozen, and more solitary habits are by no means uncommon. The flight is strong, rapid, and direct, though the Ground Pigeons remain a comparatively short time upon the wing, and some species prefer to run unless forced to rise, Oena being an especially good walker. . . . Every member of the Family perches, and many delight to bask in the sun.

Perhaps we are hypercritical, but is it careful to use the word group (even with a small "g") of a Family ? Again, "delight to bask in the sun." Is this to separate them from Apteryx or from what ? Is it worth while, when every fraction of space is precious, to waste it over generalisms which tell nothing distinctive and to omit characteristics (such as, in the case of the pigeons, methods of drinking and of feeding young) which are far more definitive ? Or, again, of the three predicates of the mocking bird, "the movements are energetic but graceful, the flight thrush-like," one is an exact comparison, one demands an unexpressed standard of relation, while the other is clearly a question of taste.

Take the Great Bustard (Otis tarda):—"In spring the pugnacious cocks strut around the hens, swelling out their plumage, and inflating the gular pouch when it is present ; the head meanwhile is thrown backwards, the wings droop, the tail is usually erected and outspread, and booming or crooning utterances with leaps diversify the performance." But most of this would do just as well for a turkey cock or a male capercaillie, to mention no other birds. Yet the male great bustard, at these periods of display, changes its form into one which is absolutely unrecognizable when seen for the first time. It actually reverses certain feathers, so that we might more fairly cite an analogy in the spring-bok antelope. Nor under the account of Syrnhaptes paradoxus (Pallas's Sand-grouse) is even so much as a hint given of a habit so unexpected, so unique, that there is, as far as is known, nothing at all like it in the whole range of bird-life. When the young are hatched the male bird twice a day grinds his breast against the ground until the feathers are all crumpled, and then dips it into water. The young satisfy their thirst by sipping the water off the old bird's breast feathers. One can quite understand how, in the arid regions where these birds breed, such a means of conveying water to the young may be most necessary. Why not mention the fact ? It is perfectly well ascertained. Of the Sub-family Viduinæ we read, "The former group (sic) includes the long-tailed Widow birds, the red-beaked Waxbills, and so forth" (the italics are ours). "And so forth !" Just so ; but the book is not written for customers of Mr. Cross, of Liverpool, but—well, it is issued, at any rate, under the ægis of Cambridge.

But, having said thus much, it is a pleasure to turn to comment which, if less dissatisfied, is not less convinced and sincere. The classification—in the main that of Dr. Hans Gadow—is admirable, and proceeds so far as the divisions up to Families are concerned, from the Ratite Birds upwards, in correct morphological sequence. We should have preferred the Corvidæ put at the summit of the Oscines, but Mr. Evans has here followed Dr. Stejneger, and has otherwise quite fairly disarmed criticism. The general account prefixed to the Orders and Sub-Orders is excellent ; the illustrations, drawn for the greater part by Mr. Lodge, are admirably characteristic. In a serviceable introduction the author has shortly dealt with feathers, colour, moult, structure, and the leading facts of migration. The book, as a whole, is a reflection of conscientious and accurate labour, and to have worked through the provinces of so many specialists, must have left its author a veritable encyclopedia of ornithological lore. The accuracy of the work is beyond all challenge ; we have not been able to find in any part of its subject which falls within our own experience or information a single slip or misstatement of fact ; and this, when the area and detail of such a book is considered, is in itself no limited tribute. All we do feel is that, in the face of such works as those of Professor Newton's "Dictionary of Birds," of Mr. Bedard's "Structure and Classification," of Professor Fürbringer's "Untersuchungen zur Morphologie und Systematik der Vögel," and of Dr. Stejneger's volume of the "Standard Natural History," this work was not necessary, and that, while there was, and is, room for a bird book on quite different lines, that chance has been missed. This work is too obvious, so to say, and too little suggestive. Beyond all doubt that book of which Mr. Evans speaks has yet to be written—the book which shall serve as a guide and hand-book to the tyro and the worker in foreign lands. In our judgment two things are required of such a work—first, that it shall be suggestive and shall point to definite and clear lines of inquiry upon variations in plumage from region to region ; upon eggs and their colouring (which Mr. Evans has practically left out) ; upon nestling plumage ; upon migration ; upon changes of plumage, not only by moult, but by loss of the tips (the barbicels) of the feathers ; upon island forms and kindred phenomena. Secondly, that it shall contain characters, in a compressed and tabulated form ; on the model, for example, of Colonel Irby's excellent little Key List of British Birds, giving recognizable and, so far as may be, eliminative distinctions. All this should be accompanied by a key to distribution in its main features, and it might be printed in the smallest diamond type. Such a book would serve the double purpose of a guide to observation and of a reliable key to determination of forms, and should be accompanied by maps of geographical distribution and charts of migration lines.

Popular books on the wonders of bird life are common enough, but they are not often written by so learned an ornithologist as Mr. Bowdler Sharpe, and they too often treat the subject only as a storehouse of curious tit-bits to tickle the fancy of the dabbler in natural history. Mr. Sharpe's WONDERS OF THE BIRD WORLD (Wells Gardner, 6s.) is thoroughly popular in style, but it is conceived in a scientific spirit. It lays great stress on method, and on accuracy of completeness and observation, and indicates the lines on which further investigation might be made, such as the difficult question of migration, in which Mr. Sharpe, together with the late Mr. Seebohm, made many original observations in Heligoland. Much of the matter, such as the chapters on gigantic birds, on wonderful nests, on mimicry, and on the cuckoo, is familiar enough to those who have paid any attention to birds, but both here and elsewhere the author keeps in close touch with the scientific principles of classification, of anatomy, &c., and is conversant with the latest results of observation. The book is well illustrated by Mr. A. T. Elwes.

Mr. Sharpe is also responsible for a SKETCH-BOOK OF BRITISH BIRDS (14s.), a large-sized volume (10×7½ in.), with the text printed on very shiny paper, and published by the S.P.C.K. The letterpress is described by the author as "a few notes as a running commentary" on little highly-coloured pictures of the birds, accurate but not artistic, drawn by Messrs. A. F. and C. Lydon. The information, especially as to the song and flight of birds, is necessarily very scanty.

REPRINTS.

The Tatler. Edited, with an Introduction and Notes, by George A. Aitken. Four Vols. 8½×5½ in. London, 1898. Duckworth. 7/6 each Vol.

One is always glad to welcome an old friend, more especially if he comes to us so well introduced and so respectably clad as on this occasion. In this new edition of "The Tatler" Mr. Aitken has gone for the foundation of his text to the duodecimo edition issued in 1710-11, "revised and corrected by the author." At the same time it is not a mere reprint of that issue which is here furnished, since, as Mr. Aitken explains in the preface, constant use has been made of the original folio sheets (published between the dates April 12, 1709, and January 2, 1711) of the "Lucubrations of Isaac Bickerstaff." The notes, if not so full as those given in the editions of Nichols (1786) and Chalmers (1822), are quite to the point. Many of them, of course, owe their existence to these earlier annotators; but Mr. Aitken has shown himself a judicious selector, and all his own notes are valuable. The introduction is good and furnishes a succinct account of the origin of the journal, with a fairly acute estimate of the merits of the contributions by Steele and Addison. It is pleasant to read once more, as may be done in Steele's preface, of that writer's high opinion of Swift's literary genius and of its peculiar quality, especially of "Dr. Swift's pleasant writings, in the name of Bickerstaff," meaning by that the funny Partridge pamphlets. It was not very many years after this preface was written that Steele had another tale to tell about his friend. We notice that Mr. Aitken speaks of a "shoemaker's shop" as the place where Swift first saw the name of Bickerstaff. We had always thought that it was obtained from the sign of a blacksmith's or locksmith's. Partridge himself was a shoemaker. The portraits prefixed to each volume are excellently reproduced, although we are of opinion that the one of Swift would have gained by being photographed from the original painting by Jervas rather than from the print by Fourdrinier. The index completing the fourth volume is a capital example of what an index should be. Altogether, both the editor and publisher may be complimented on having produced an edition of "The Tatler" which is likely to remain the standard edition.

Eighteenth Century Letters—Johnson, Lord Chesterfield. Edited by R. Brimley Johnson. With an Introduction by George Birkbeck-Hill. 7½ x 5¼ in., xl. + 244 pp. London, 1898. Innes. 6/-

We wonder what Johnson would have said had he been told that a selection from his letters would, towards the beginning of the twentieth century, be issued in a volume with one from those by Lord Chesterfield. If there possibly could be an attitude towards life which the writer of the "Rambles" detested more than any other it was that assumed by the author of the so-called "Chesterfield's Letters to his Son." Dr. Birkbeck-Hill has the sense of humour to be himself tickled by this untoward combination. "What a coalition!" he exclaims, as did Garrick when he heard that Johnson and the dissipated Beauclerk were companions. And we echo the exclamation. And yet, different as were the points of view of the two writers, they were both alike in their sincerity and in the earnestness which characterized their expressions of what appealed to them as truth. But to say this is to speak of them as workers in literature—not as letter-writers. In the latter sphere Chesterfield was incomparably Johnson's superior. We must confess that we are not sorry to have this combination, and our negative appreciation is made a positive pleasure by Dr. Birkbeck-Hill's very charming Introduction. It is lengthy, but brightly written and with a fund of information excellently suited to the readers for whom the selection is intended. The selection itself is fairly representative and will give a good impression of Chesterfield's power, at any rate. Perhaps it was not quite fair to Johnson to make him stand this test.

Many people, who have been interested in the Browning letters just published, will be glad to refresh their memory with AURORA LEIGH, just published as one of the Temple Classics (Dent, 1s. 6d. n. each), under the editorship of Mr. Buxton Forman, which has a fit companion in MEN AND WOMEN, by Robert Browning, another new volume of the same series. The first two of ten volumes of NORTH'S PLUTARCH, edited by Mr. W. H. D. Rouse, are also published. In the "Temple Scott" Series (Dent, 1s. 6d. n. each), come ST. RONAN'S WELL and RED GAUNTLET, with "Bibliographical Notes" by Mr. Clement Shorter, who calls attention to the light thrown upon the period of the latter romance by Mr. Lang's recent books, "Pickle the Spy," and "The Companions of Pickle"; and in the "Border Waverley" (Nimmo, 3s. 6d. n. each) we have QUENTIN DURWARD, ST. RONAN'S WELL, and PEVERIL OF THE PEAK, the illustrations to the two latter being, we think, the best in the series. Messrs. Dent's "Temple Edition" of Dickens is continued by NICHOLAS NICKLEBY in three volumes (4s. 6d. n.), with a bibliographical note by Mrs. Walter Jerrold.

Messrs. W. Thacker begin a new edition of Whyte Melville's works with RIDING RECOLLECTIONS (10s. 6d. n.), a book never likely to lose its interest for horsemen. The volume is well printed and is bound either in cloth or calf, and in the latter case with gilt edges to the pages which, when bent over on the hand, reveal a coloured picture of a landscape with riders. Sir Herbert Maxwell has been very wisely selected as the editor of the series. He contributes a short biographical introduction to the present volume, in which he expresses a regret which every one must share, that John Leech never illustrated Whyte Melville. Perhaps Mr. Hugh Thomson, who has drawn twelve illustrations for "Riding Recollections," is as good a modern substitute for Leech as could be procured. Sir Herbert Maxwell points out the essentially wholesome character of Whyte Melville's novels, admitting that they do not rank high in the class which the cant phraseology of the day calls "human documents," a term applied, to quote Sir Herbert's definition, "to stories of the failure of energy and commonsense to steer a character through ordinary temptation and the results of puzzle-headedness." That these novels are not losing their popularity is shown by the simultaneous publication of Messrs. Ward Lock's Whyte Melville novels which has now reached its fifth volume with MARKET HARBOROUGH AND INSIDE THE BAR (3s. 6d.), illustrated by Mr. John Charlton.

Herman Melville is an undeservedly neglected writer. His descriptions of whalers and South Sea Islanders have a very genuine ring. We welcome, therefore, a reprint of his TYPES in Blackie's School and Home Library (1s.), and hope that "Omoo" and "Moby Dick"—the classic of whaling—are to follow. Another addition to the same series is SELECTIONS FROM ADDISON'S "SPECTATOR." The selection adopted is that made by the estimable Mrs. Barbauld in 1804, and the volume is announced as "with an introduction by Mrs. Barbauld," though, as a matter of fact, it only contains a portion of that lady's introduction, incorporated in a preface by Mrs. Herbert Martin. The general get-up of the School and Home Library is wonderful for the price.

We have received the first three volumes of a new edition of the works of Francis Parkman (Macmillan, 8s. 6d. n. each). Like that other great American historian, William Prescott, Mr. Parkman accomplished his self-imposed task in the face of great difficulties arising from weak eyesight. For a long period he could not read or write continuously for more than five minutes. Yet, by diligence and perseverance, he wrote twelve volumes (of which the first appeared in 1865) on the relations of France and England in North America, and his books are not likely to be soon superseded. The volumes before us are PIONEERS OF FRANCE IN THE NEW WORLD, THE JESUITS IN NORTH AMERICA, and LA SALLE AND THE DISCOVERY OF THE GREAT WEST. The others are to follow shortly. In their new format—enriched in some cases by the addition of fresh matter—they will be a welcome accession to our libraries.

The second volume of the "Eversley Shakespeare" (Macmillan, 5s.) contains The Taming of the Shrew, The Merchant of Venice, The Merry Wives of Windsor, Twelfth Night, and As You Like It. Professor Herford's introductions hit the happy mean between excess and defect of erudition.

Messrs. Constable's "Whitehall Shakespeare" is continued with Volume X., containing Julius Caesar, Hamlet, and Othello, and Volume XI. with Lear, Macbeth, Timon, and Pericles.

We have received a reprint of the second edition of the MEMORIES OF FATHER HEALY (Macmillan, 3s. 6d.). It is a book full of entertaining stories, and well deserves this proof of its popularity.

THE NATIONAL GALLERY.

Pictures in the National Gallery, London. With Descriptive and Critical Notes. By Charles L. Eastlake, late Keeper and Secretary. Illustrated in photogravure, &c., by Franz Hanfstaengl. 16x12in. Munich, London, and New York, 1899. Franz Hanfstaengl. £9 9/-

The volume for which Mr. Charles Locke Eastlake has written the descriptive text, and Mr. Franz Hanfstaengl prepared more than two hundred gravure reproductions of the leading pictures in the National Gallery, will be welcome to all interested in the history and progress of Art. So far as we are aware, no work of importance illustrating our national collection has been published since Jones' "National Gallery" sixty years ago; and during the last fifty years the gallery has nearly doubled its structural area and multiplied its contents eightfold.

Since the spring of 1896, parts of the present work have been issued from time to time, but it is only on looking over the collected volume that an appreciation of the permanent value of the work can be gained. Each school of painting, with the exception of the English, is here dealt with chronologically, and the reproductions of the pictures chosen to illustrate each school and period are so arranged as to enable the student to judge of both the wealth of the collection and its lacunæ. It is generally admitted that it lacks some examples of notable masters, especially of the Umbrian and Lombard Schools, and also of modern Continental masterpieces, but, except in Venice itself, no European gallery contains so many treasures of Venetian art.

The high standard of excellence hitherto maintained, with a few unlucky exceptions, in the choice of pictures acquired for the National Gallery makes it difficult to select typical specimens for special notice. The author's notes are limited to the "Foreign Schools," and of some 900 examples in the Gallery nearly 200 have been reproduced in photogravure and collotype. To have exceeded that number would have been impossible in a single volume even of this portly size; and the result, as a whole, shows, we think, a wise eclecticism. The volume is divided into twelve parts, and care is taken to maintain the classified order in which the pictures themselves were arranged—with so much advantage from an educational point of view—some years ago, beginning with the earliest examples of each school of painting, and presenting them, as far as possible, in chronological sequence. In the literary part of his work Mr. Eastlake has avoided controversial questions as to authenticity. We gather that he has accepted the latest "attribution" of each work as given in the official catalogue, except in those cases which are manifestly open to doubt. Biographical notices have been omitted as beyond the purpose of the work, save where the incidents of a painter's career or his habits of life have tended to influence his choice of subject or mode of treating it. Mr. Eastlake has clearly condensed his text as much as possible, each picture rarely occupying more than half a page. His comments may here and there seem a little obvious; but a book of this class is not intended for cognoscenti. For the non-professional general reader we can hardly conceive a more satisfactory and pleasant volume, and both Mr. Eastlake and Mr. Hanfstaengl are to be congratulated on the success of their efforts to produce a selection of pictures which shall give a general idea of the national collection.

OTHER NEW BOOKS.

MUSIC.

Mr. H. E. Krehbiel's book, MUSIC AND MANNERS FROM PERGOLESE TO BEETHOVEN (Constable, 6s.), adds to our knowledge of such opposite artists as the poet Gray and the librettist Da Ponte. With the help of an autobiographical pamphlet written by the librettist of Don Juan, and hitherto "unmentioned by all who have written on Da Ponte so far as can be learned," Mr. Krehbiel sheds some fresh light on the vagabond life of the Italian in America, struggling with his creditors, as a musician, a professor of Italian literature, a distiller, a bookseller, and a tobacconist. The author also gives us some amusing selections from the well-known diary kept by Haydn when in England. But perhaps the most attractive of Mr. Krehbiel's curiosities is the notebook of MS. music compiled by the poet Gray while travelling in Italy with Horace Walpole. Mr. Austin Dobson in his essay on Gray's library in "Eighteenth Century Vignettes" alludes casually to this notebook, the contents of which are now carefully described by Mr. Krehbiel. "The music (he says) consists almost exclusively of operatic airs from the composers who were the chief glory of the Italian schools of the eighteenth century." The notebook in which these songs are elaborately scored is perhaps chiefly remarkable as illustrating the immense capacity of a genius for taking pains upon a holiday. It is even a little ironical that the author of "The Elegy" should have undergone so much labour lest he should forget music of so transitory a kind as much that is contained in this collection. The really great opera writer of the time—Handel—is not mentioned. Mr. Krehbiel has not in every case done justice to his materials. In his reminiscences of the Mozart festival at Salzburg, of the Beethoven museum at Bonn, and of Goethe's theatre at Weimar he omits much that might have been said as to the bearing of these places upon the history of art, in his anxiety as to the size and the financial regulations of the theatres of Goethe and Mozart. Nor is the ascertainment of the exact moment when Da Ponte set foot in America a matter of breathless interest. In short Mr. Krehbiel's book, though it is stuffed with information, and evinces some critical discrimination, might have been still more attractive in the light of such copious material.

IN VOICE AND VIOLIN (Chatto and Winchus, 5s.) Dr. T. L. Philipson's reminiscences of Italian opera and the virtuosos of a bygone age carry the reader back to a time when singers ruled over composers, when opera was Italian, and stage contrivances were far more elementary than they are now. Madame Malibran bitterly complains because Balfe refuses to transfer the chief baritone song in The Maid of Artois, "The Light of Other Days," to her own part. Rossini insists upon reading the score of one of Wagner's operas upside down. The bass in Robert le Diable, being annoyed with the tenor because he will not sing fast enough, stamps—unfortunately upon the trap-door—and passes prematurely to the nether regions. Dr. Philipson's book is full of stories of this kind. They are seldom hackneyed, and on one of the few occasions where he tells an old tale, he modestly omits the end. But here the whole is better than the half:—

An organ-grinder was murdering an air from La Cenerentola when Rossini (the composer of the opera) and a friend happened to pass. He stepped off the boulevard, went up to the man, seized the handle of the organ, and turned it to the proper time the air should be played. Then slipping a five-franc piece into the man's hand, he told him never to forget to play the air slowly just as he had heard it.

Dr. Philipson omits to add that for ever afterwards the organ-grinder had the words "Pupil of Rossini" written large upon his instrument.

Our author, whose opinions date back as far as his reminiscences, naively extols the bête noires of the modern musician. To point out the beauties of La Sonnambula, "the most beautiful by far of all lyric dramas," would, in his opinion, be as superfluous as to "eulogize the poems of Dante or the plays of Shakespeare." This, of course, is absurd; but fortunately Dr. Philipson does not often allow the temptation to dogmatize to interfere with his gift of story-telling.

IN OLD SCORES AND NEW READINGS (The Unicorn Press, 5s. n.), so many and utterly different artists in turn press Mr. J. F. Runciman for a place in his new Elysium that the strictest impartiality is necessary. Mr. Runciman, with his essentially twentieth-century way of looking at things, is, perhaps, the last person to take a calm survey of musical history. Impatient of old authorities, such as Burney, and restless with reticent composers, such as Spohr and Brahms, he is, in fact, a Siegfried among critics. His treatment of some composers of great genius, whose works, being little performed at this moment, cannot speak for themselves, is highly misleading. He has not caught the spirit of those delicate composers who kept their individuality while following in the footsteps of Mozart. Of Spohr he only notes the "pedagogic gravity" and the fact that he is "very old." In Weber he, indeed, discovers the picturesque, but he fails to appreciate the note of humanity and the dramatic instinct. His music, he says, "never moves in step with the drama" of his operas. Surely "The Power of Sound" and the symphony in D minor show Spohr to have been as much a poet as a pedagogue, while the greatness of Weber's Der Freischütz rests even more upon the subtle play of varying human emotion in the music than upon its pictorial beauty. But Mr. Runciman is more trustworthy in dealing with composers such as Wagner and Tchaikowsky, who suit his own temperament. His criticism of Gounod is full of individual thought. Still even here his unhistoric mind shows itself in his tendency to take the modern theory of dramatic music as a touchstone in historical criticism. It is, after all, a very open question whether the Wagnerian device for securing dramatic unity in stage music by weaving the drama together in a web of "leit-motiv" is an advance upon the Mozartean method. Perhaps some future Siegfried may arise, equally confident in the devices of his own generation, and trample upon the "leit-motiv" itself as an elaborate convention. We only trust he will be as amusing as Mr. Runciman.

SCIENCE.

Mrs. Awdry's EARLY CHAPTERS IN SCIENCE (Murray, 6s.), despite the number of popular scientific books in the market, deserves a warm welcome from all teachers of the young. Mrs. Awdry, when she joined her husband, Bishop Awdry, in Japan, gave her manuscript to Professor Barrett, of the Royal College of Science for Ireland, who has edited and in some parts rewritten it; and the different portions of the book have been revised by other well-known authorities. It is designed to fill in England something like the place occupied in France by M. Paul Bert's well-known "First Year of Scientific Knowledge," but it is far less technical than that work. English scientists have long ago learnt how to present their learning in an attractive form, and so far, of course, Mrs. Awdry breaks no new ground. What is valuable about her book is its comprehensiveness. She divides it into two parts, "The World of Life" and "The World of Experiment," in the first leading the student from simple illustrations to a knowledge of the main facts about the classification, the reproduction, and leading characteristics of animals and plants, and in the second, within the compass of 140 pages, setting forth with great lucidity the laws which govern the forces of nature, and giving an insight into physics, chemistry, and electricity. The illustrations are models of clear, careful, and unconventional work. The book is quite elementary and does not, for instance, in the first part, even get so far as to include a reference to the phenomena of evolution. But we know of no work so likely to be useful as an introduction to science for quite young people. We only hope that Mrs. Awdry may eventually be able to utilize her faculty for simple exposition by adding chapters on astronomy and geology.

VOLCANOES, by Professor T. G. Bonney (Murray, 6s.), is the latest addition to the Progressive Science Series. Any reader who, attracted by the title, expects the volume to prove a satisfactory substitute for fiction is destined to be disappointed. Of Vesuvius, of Krakatoa, of Kilauea—no less than of the Puy de Dome, the Riesengebirge, and the Eifel—Mr. Bonney writes with the passionless composure of the man of science, whose business is to state and investigate facts, not to draw lurid pictures of horrible catastrophes. From this point of view, the loose and inaccurate Michelet is far better reading. But, though Mr. Bonney's style is bald, his book is a valuable repository of encyclopædic information. It tells us all that it is strictly necessary to know about every volcano, extinct or active, in the world, and those who wish to know more are referred to the best authorities in footnotes for which they will be grateful. Those who already know the facts and wish to learn Professor Bonney's theories may confine their attention to Chapter VI. There, the part which water plays in eruptions, and the means by which it may be supposed to get access to the subterranean furnaces which turn it into steam, is discussed, together with other problems. The magnitude of the field which still awaits investigation is well explained on the last page:—

He who would evolve order out of our present mental chaos on this branch of the subject must be at once an accomplished chemist and a mineralogist, a physicist, and a mathematician, a practised worker with the microscope, and a field geologist of unusually wide experience; in fact, he must, I fear, be an impossible creature, for there are questions, and this is one of them, which cannot be solved by the most diligent student of books, or by the most industrious worker in a laboratory; they demand far more toil than can be crowded into the three score and ten years of human life.

The book is a valuable one, though, as we have suggested, it is too closely packed with facts to be very easily readable by any but deliberate students.

IN THE DISCHARGE OF ELECTRICITY THROUGH GASES (Constable) Professor J. J. Thomson has given us one of the best books of the kind we have yet seen. Although not professedly "popular" in his treatment of it, Professor J. J. Thomson deals in a straightforward and intelligible manner with a subject which has ever possessed a great attraction for amateurs—the Geissler or vacuum tube. In these days of huge mathematical treatises, full of ill-arranged matter, it is a relief to find that at least one of our leading exponents of science can imitate Faraday in his judicious blending of bold generalization with beautiful experimentation, and in his lucidity, conciseness, and method. Professor Thomson is not content merely to collect facts; he loves to theorize thereon, and in doing so he leaves upon the reader's mind the feeling that his inductions are those of a man who has so long lived among and pondered over the phenomena described that he has attained a sort of scientific second sight.

From the most blasé attendant at popular science lectures the weird glow of the vacuum-tube in the darkened room evokes at least a passing spasm of admiration and curiosity. For the scientific investigator vacuum-tube work has all the charm that an unknown continent possesses for the explorer. Matter in the vacuum-tube is not only vastly simplified but very communicative. The cathode rays, Lenard rays, and Röntgen rays that are generated in or by a rarefied gas exposed to the electric discharge tantalize and torment the philosopher with vivid glimpses into the very constitution of matter. The student of yesterday was taught to regard the "atom" as one and indivisible. To-day, Professor Thomson can conclude his monograph with the revolutionary dictum that "the results of this investigation thus support the view that in the corpuscles in the cathode rays we have matter in a finer state of subdivision than the ordinary atom." In other words, we have in the vacuum tube when it is exposed to the electric discharge the very material out of which the atom or elementary body can be manufactured, and thus we are led by way of Prout, Norman-Lockyer, Mendeleëf, Crookes, and J. J. Thomson back again to Hermes Trismegistus, Roger Bacon, and something which bears a striking resemblance to the universal solvent and the transmutation of metals.

SOUND: A Text-Book of Physics, by J. H. Poynting and J. J. Thomson (Griffin, 8s. 6d.). Notwithstanding the epoch-making discoveries of von Helmholtz, embodied in his well-known work "Sensations of Tone," and the painstaking researches of Lord Rayleigh, which are to be found, for the most part, in his treatise on "Sound," the science of Acoustics still remains in a somewhat unsatisfactory state. The general principles and fundamental laws are known and have long been known, but their detailed application to the explanation of many every-day phenomena is beset with difficulties. This, no doubt, is due in a large measure to the fact that in acoustics we are concerned in nine cases out of ten not merely with bare sound, but with musical sounds. Now, our perception of light, as distinct from that of colour, is a comparatively simple sensation, and as colour phenomena form but a subsidiary section of the science of Optics, the science as a whole is not seriously hampered by the backward state of our knowledge with regard to sensations of colour. Moreover, Light is closely allied to the still more beautiful science of Electricity and Magnetism, and, both on its own account and through these allies, a study of Optics offers to the investigator a vast field of profitable practical application. Acoustics, on the other hand, is mainly concerned with musical sounds, and the perception of these, like the perception of colour, varies so widely from individual to individual as to render the formation of reliable general opinions almost impossible. Again, Sound stands somewhat apart from and out of the beaten track of general physics; its study does not visibly lead either to fame or fortune. The effect of all this is very noticeable on passing from a good modern text-book dealing with Light or with Electricity and Magnetism to a good modern text-book on Sound, such as the present one. The authors state that their work is intended chiefly for students who wish to study the subject experimentally, and who are not equal to much in the way of mathematics. This admirable aim has been fulfilled. The authors are not content merely to state a given law in the shape of an academic formula, but they state it clause by clause, instancing as they go appropriate practical examples, so that when they finally sum it all up in an algebraical equation the symbols have gained a real meaning. Whenever an everyday phenomenon can be quoted by way of proof, it is quoted in preference to a laboratory experiment. The work is not intended for popular consumption, but it may, nevertheless, be recommended to any one desirous of possessing an easy, up-to-date standard treatise on Acoustics.

IN THE LAST LINK: OUR PRESENT KNOWLEDGE OF THE DESCENT OF MAN (Black, 2s. 6d.) Professor Haeckel confidently looks forward to the twentieth century for the universal acceptance of the theory of transformism enunciated by Lamarck in 1809, and fostered and matured by Charles Darwin about fifty years later. Meanwhile, under the editorship of Dr. Gadow, he gives us a pleasing little volume containing the subject-matter of his address at the International Congress of Zoology at Cambridge. In it he does not profess to deal with the whole theory of descent, but concerns himself with a critical examination of "our scientific knowledge of the descent of man, and of the different stages of his animal pedigree."

Adopting the Huxleyan thesis that the structural differences which separate man from the gorilla are not so great as those which separate the gorilla and the lower apes, he lays before us a clear résumé of the accumulated evidences of modern science in its support. The objection of anti-Darwinians that palæontology does not furnish fossil organisms to fill the structural gaps between living species is met in the second chapter. Although the author considers the objection capable of a simple answer we are not sure his explanation will satisfy opponents like Professor Virchow. The feature which invests the book with a popular interest is the description of the "missing link"—an ideal constructed from three fossils discovered in Java by Dr. Dubois in 1894. Evolutionists are naturally exultant over the exhumation of fossil remains pointing to the existence, during the Pliocene period, of a group of catarrhines which supplies the long-sought link in their theory of man's descent. The book also contains a series of biographical sketches of German scientists whose energies have been devoted to the subject. This admirable synopsis of the most interesting question in biological science will be specially welcomed by those who have neither time nor patience to grapple with the enormous literature treating of evolution.

EDUCATIONAL.

New school-books fall thick as autumn leaves. They all, or nearly all, seem better than the books of our youth; but it is just a question whether some of them are not too good—too concise and too scientific—to produce the best results. The question particularly obtrudes itself in connexion with Mr. G. W. C. Oman's ELEMENTARY HISTORY OF GREECE (Rivingtons, 2s.). It has facts enough to satisfy Mr. Gradgrind himself; in a very brief compass it lucidly presents all that is essential in Greek history; it is evidently written with a keen eye to the satisfaction of examiners. But boys cannot possibly be interested in it, and it is hard to believe that they will remember it as some of them used to remember the more discursive Greek histories of old time. Still, it is a short and thoroughly safe summary, and invaluable for reference.

For "cram" purposes, also, the third part of Mr. G. Carter's HISTORY OF ENGLAND (Relfe, 2s.), embracing the period from 1689 to the Diamond Jubilee, will be found clear, concise, well-arranged, and generally accurate. But surely an examination candidate would be expected to know the method adopted for the passing of the Army Purchase Bill in 1871, which is not explained by Mr. Carter? And who is "Lord Cavendish," who became Irish Secretary in 1882?

Mr. L. W. Lyde adds to the three volumes he has already published in "Black's School Geography" a GEOGRAPHY OF AFRICA (A. and C. Black, 1s.)—a neat and concise volume based on the principle, which we think sound, of including no map in the volume, and of avoiding an excessive variety of type. Maps, especially if they are larger than the page, are very awkward, and necessitate keeping the book open in two places at once. They lead, moreover, to a neglect of the atlas, which is regrettable. It is a pity, by the way, that in his necessarily brief reference to the antiquities of Egypt, Mr. Lyde does not refer to the papyri, the discovery of which is in some districts the chief feature of interest. Papyrus manuscripts might almost be ranked amongst "products" of the Fayum.

Miss Nellie Dale's ON THE TEACHING OF ENGLISH READING (Dent, 2s. 6d.) is a very lucid and intelligent practical hand-book for those whose pupils are quite young children. Miss Dale has had much experience with the best methods of interesting children in their reading lessons, and other teachers will certainly profit by going carefully through the exposition of her methods—her appeal to children's love of colour by the new and ingenious use of colour to indicate the distinction between letters, and to their love of movement by continual action of some kind on the part of the child at different points in the lesson; the encouragement she gives the children to personify the sounds and the words they learn and regard them as "friends" with human characteristics answering to the importance and the irregularity of their use; and her insistence on the children themselves forming words from letters, and then stories to bring in the words. The prettily illustrated "Walter Crane Readers," "Steps to Reading," "First Primer," "Second Primer," and "Infant Reader" (Dent) are intended to be used with Miss Dale's book.

Mr. E. E. Speight continues his "New English Series" with a WORDSWORTH (6d.) and Charles Lamb's ADVENTURES OF ULYSSES (Horace Marshall, 10d.). The object of this series is to interest teachers in elementary schools in the teaching of English literature, and the "Temple Reader," first published a year and a half ago, has proved admirably suited to its purpose. That was a miscellaneous collection; the later volumes take some special author, or book, or class of poetry—"Tales from the Northern Sagas," for instance, is to be the next volume of the series. Board school teachers labour under many disadvantages in their attempt to teach English literature, particularly the difficulty of time and the rigid system of examinations. And even Mr. Speight's assistance cannot make a schoolmaster teach it to profit, if he has not the requisite knowledge and intelligence to start with. But the plan of these books is, to our thinking, as good a one as can be devised. Besides being well printed, cheap, and with the matter well selected, they differ from many other books of the kind in being absolutely without notes. All teachers know how fatal notes may be when put into the hands of the pupil; and their absence will also stimulate the teacher to rely on his own researches. Besides the text, there are only illustrations—wisely confined to reproductions from well-known pictures and portraits, or from drawings on vases, &c.—and in the case of the "Temple Reader" a few well chosen quotations from well-known writers bearing on the authors from whose works examples are given; with introductions by well-known men of letters, as Professor Dowden, Dr. Caird, Sir George Birdwood, all of whom have shown much interest in Mr. Speight's undertaking. The "Wordsworth," to which Dr.

Caird writes an introduction, is a very judicious selection, but we hope that in future volumes of selections Mr. Speight will supply an index or a table of contents. We feel sure the teacher will find the want of it. These little volumes should certainly be widely known, and might well be used not only in elementary schools, but in high schools and "preparatory" schools.

Mr. J. C. Nesfield's MANUAL OF ENGLISH GRAMMAR AND COMPOSITION (Macmillan, 2s. 6d.) is for advanced students. It might serve as a text-book for that course of "Rhetoric" which Sir Walter Besant recently prescribed as an important part of the "preparation" of the literary aspirant. The earlier pages deal fully with such subjects as parsing and analysis; a later section shows us how to write a good prose style appropriate to the matter in hand. The reporter who has mastered its precepts will see that he must reconsider his position about many things. The precept Simple facts to be told in simple terms will warn him against speaking of the fire as the "devouring element," or of an elephant running amok as a "devastating pachyderm." He will also learn exactly what is wrong with his grammar when, describing a trial trip on a Thames steamboat, he writes "Still forging ahead, the sun set behind the chimneys," and why he should not say, "The French Government has our heart-felt sympathy, and which is also extended to the French people." The book is one that should be of great service, provided that the people who most need it can be got to study it.

Several new editions of the Greek and Latin classics deserve a word of mention. Mr. T. E. Page's edition of ÆNEID XI. (Macmillan, 1s. 6d.) is, perhaps, the best of them. Mr. Page's notes are always suggestive, and he does not commit the fault of giving more of them than an intelligent boy can conveniently digest. The brief introduction is admirable, and includes, by permission, Tennyson's Ode on the Nineteenth Centenary of Virgil's death. In the Cambridge Series for Schools and Training Colleges we have ÆNEID XII., XENOPHON ANABASIS IV., CÆSAR DE BELLO GALLICO III., and CÆSAR DE BELLO GALLICO IV. (Cambridge University Press, 1s. 6d. each). Cæsar is edited by Mr. E. S. Schuchburgh, Xenophon by Mr. G. M. Edwards, and Virgil by Mr. Arthur Sidgwick. Mr. Sidgwick, of course, is a brilliant scholar, but he hardly shows here Mr. Page's powers of attractive presentation, and Mr. Page's introduction is not less learned than his. In the matter of notes Mr. Sidgwick approaches the irreducible minimum. Mr. P. B. Halcombe's edition of the MEDEA (Blackie, 1s. 6d.) is arranged on a new principle. It gives the iambs in Greek and the choruses in English—a plan which is likely to commend itself to those who are teaching Euripides to beginners. There is a vocabulary, and there are notes. Mr. A. F. Hort's edition of the HERCULES FURRUS (Rivingtons, 1s. 6d.) is also intended for juniors. To meet their views the editor has omitted, "besides the choric songs, part of the prologue, most of the concluding dialogue between Hercules and Theseus, and a few other short passages." Thus helped, the juniors will be able to get through the play in a term.

The Cambridge University Press publishes annotated editions of RICHARD II., edited by Mr. A. W. Verity, and of the LAYS OF ANCIENT ROMÉ, edited by Mr. J. H. Flather (1s. 6d. each). The former is not quite such a monument of erudition as were the Clarendon Press Shakespeares; but, for that reason, the excellent notes given are more likely to receive the distinguished consideration of students. With regard to the latter, we doubt the necessity of an introduction explaining that the stories told in the lays are absolutely untrue. Maxima debetur, &c.; the beautiful illusions of the young should be respected. An edition of Book V. of THE FAERIE QUEENE (1s. 6d. n.), is published by Messrs. Constable. It contains an introduction and a glossary by Kate M. Warren. CHILDE HAROLD (two vols., 1s. 9d. each) is added to Messrs. Macmillan's "English Classics." The introduction and notes are by Mr. Morris, of the Melbourne University, and explain everything that needs explanation, as well as a good deal that does not need it. Such annotations, for instance, as "Note the alliteration" strike us as supererogatory.

In the modern language department we have Dent's SECOND FRENCH BOOK (Dent, 1s. 6d. n.), by S. Alge and Walter Rippmann. It contains easy reading exercises, and an easy consecutive story, "La Tâche du petit Pierre," by Madame Bigot. The story is illustrated.

Mr. Walter Rippmann's HINTS ON TEACHING GERMAN (Dent, 1s. 6d.) is intended to be used with "Dent's First German Book," to which it contains a running commentary. A further "German Reader" will be published about Easter, and a commentary to it will be included in the "Hints." More than half the present book, however, is devoted to an exposition of the "Reform" method of teaching German, the method which does not make grammar or even translation the centre of instruction, but endeavours to make the pupil think in German, by connecting in his mind with German words not the English equivalents, but the ideas they represent, and for this purpose pictures are largely used. Those who seek guidance in the method will derive much help from Mr. Rippmann's little book.

A batch of cheap educational books, in the "Rapid" Series, comes from the house of Sir Isaac Pitman and Sons. GERMAN SHORTHAND (1s. 6d.) is the most expensive of them—no doubt because German shorthand is a branch of study which leaves a good many earnest seekers after knowledge cold. FRENCH BUSINESS LETTERS (6d.), with copious marginal notes in English, will be useful to nearly every one. Many of us who read our Zola, and even our Mallarmé, without difficulty, do not know that notre honorée is French for "your esteemed favour," that an "overdrawn" account should be rendered à découvert, or even that obligations are the same things as "debentures." GERMAN BUSINESS INTERVIEWS (1s.) supplies analogous information to students of commercial German; while TIT BITS IN GERMAN (6d.) shows, in a rough-and-ready way, how jokes may be made in a language which is not generally believed to lend itself very readily to the purposes of the humourist. A literal as well as a free translation is given of each joke treated, and it not infrequently happens that the literal translation is the more entertaining of the two. As, for example:—

Stranger (to the barber-apprentice): Thunder-weather, now cut you me already for-the-second-time. If you not better shave can, will from you your customers soon away-stay.

Apprentice: Oh, no, the customers dare I indeed not yet at-all shave, but only the strangers.

Messrs. Pitman also issue annotated editions of LE BOURGEOIS GENTILHOMME (1s.) and DER NEFFE ALS ONKEL (6d.).

In the Siepmann Series, designed to widen the range of French authors studied in English schools, the editors issue a work representative of the French Romanticism of the early part of the century in Alfred de Vigny's CINQ MARS (Macmillan, 2s. 6d.), or, rather, an abridgment of the second part of that romance, edited by Mr. G. G. Loane.

THE OFFICIAL YEAR-BOOK OF THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND (S.P.C.K., 3s.) contains a preface optimistic in tone, but, perhaps, not unduly so, and, as usual, a mass of tabulated and statistical information concerning the work of the Church. Figures are quoted showing the amount of voluntary contributions to Church work in 1897. The grand total was £5,919,701 9s. 10d., of which sum the salaries of lay helpers and church expenses swallowed up £1,200,271 8s. 7d., while foreign missions got £280,702 14s., home missions £137,164 15s. 3d., and the poor £527,868 13s. 9d. The very exhaustive and complete character of this publication is well known. There is only one point we should like to see more completely dealt with, and that is the list of religious societies. There are, undoubtedly, some societies existing for devotional and other purposes which do not here find a place; and the reason, we presume, is that facilities are not given for obtaining information about them.

THE CLERGY DIRECTORY (Phillips, 4s. 6d.), of which the twenty-ninth annual issue now appears, has not suffered by a change of editorship. It does not, of course, lay itself out for the full personal information supplied by Crockford, but it contrives to pack into small compass an immense amount of information as to the clergy, the parishes, and the patrons. We cannot help thinking it a pity that, while it gives a list of American Bishops, it does not provide also a list of the Bishops of the Colonial Church.

Twin fringes round the lake are seen,
'Twixt sluggish leaves is lifted up
The water-lily's argent cup;
The unquiet willow leaves hang low,
Fretting the image of the skies,
And the tall reeds stand all arow
Where Syrinx lies, where Syrinx lies.

The wild fowl's note rings loud and harsh,
The water bubbles in the marsh.
With lance and horn ablow goes by
The emerald-mailed dragon-fly;
The ripples lap about the weeds,
The buzzing gnat-clouds sink and rise,
The low wind rustles in the reeds
Where Syrinx lies, where Syrinx lies.

But her no eye of any man
Has seen since lusty goat-hooved Pan,
Her voice within the reeds has slept
Since in the god's embrace she wept,
The god whose chanted sorrows dwell—
Grief's memory under sunny eyes—
About the lake, about the dell
Where Syrinx lies, where Syrinx lies.

Yet when the dawn peers forth in bud,
Yet when the dead sun drips with blood,
The still lake is a trembling eye
The reed-bed's secret to espy—
Is this the glint of shining limbs
The shadowy hair, the breast of sighs,
Or the grey twilight mist that swims
Where Syrinx lies, where Syrinx lies?

LA POÉSIE DE MR. GEORGE MEREDITH.

On ne peut se défendre, en approchant pour la première fois Mr. George Meredith, d'éprouver un sentiment assez complexe, fait d'une certaine crainte et de beaucoup de respect; puis, peu à peu, on se sent gagné: l'antagonisme que suscitent toujours les premiers moments d'acointance avec des personnalités puissantes, Balzac, Tolstoi, Ibsen, par exemple, disparaît pour faire place à une large et ardente admiration.

Mr. George Meredith est une de ces personnalités. Il y a dans son œuvre entier la perpétuelle présence d'une force supérieure, coercitive un peu, mais qui vainc rapidement, et quoi que l'on puisse objecter aux moyens et à la forme par lesquels se manifeste sa pensée, nul ne peut nier qu'il ait cette puissance occulte qui se laisse apercevoir par flashes of lightning, et que l'on sent chez seulement ceux de génie. Cette puissance se fait sentir beaucoup plus fréquemment dans ses œuvres en poésie que dans ses œuvres en prose, parce que, malgré le contrôle qu'il subit, l'esprit du poète peut s'élever au dessus de la réalité plus facilement, plus souvent, et plus longtemps, que l'esprit du romancier, et se manifester d'une façon plus simple et plus directe. Faut-il inférer de là que Mr. George Meredith soit essentiellement, même dans ses œuvres en prose, un poète, qui se manifeste pleinement et sans entraves dans Modern Love ou The Joy of Earth? Je ne le crois pas; à moins que l'on n'entende par poète, l'homme à l'esprit puissant assez pour assumer toute l'humanité, toute la vie, et faire, avec cette vie qui passe à travers lui, des œuvres qui, quelle qu'en soit la forme, sont pour les esprits des hommes le reflet lumineux, la révélation radieuse de la réalité. Avec cette acception, Mr. Meredith est un poète.

Si déconcertante que soit parfois la forme sous laquelle il nous présente sa pensée, Mr. Meredith ne manque jamais d'y imprimer fortement sa personnalité. His published verse, dit Mr. Arthur Symonds, shows him as a poet who is not in the English tradition, et cette opinion d'un des fervents admirateurs du poète confirme encore ma conviction que non seulement Mr. Meredith est en dehors de la tradition anglaise, mais qu'il est en dehors de toute tradition, un des génies qui appartiennent à l'humanité, parce que leur vision s'étend au delà des ressemblances et des rapports qu'on peut leur attribuer avec d'autres esprits et d'autres époques. Et c'est la gloire de l'Angleterre d'ajouter un nom de plus à ceux qu'elle a déjà donnés à l'humanité.

Pourtant, combien peu de gens veulent consentir à connaître intimement Mr. Meredith. Lui-même, il y a une dizaine d'années écrivait: In England, I am encouraged but by a few enthusiasts. Je sais bien que depuis lors il a été apprécié à sa juste valeur par tous ceux de pensée noble et haute, sans avoir jamais recherché la moindre approbation: my mind looks elsewhere, a-t-il dit superbement. Mais ses admirateurs ne seront jamais qu'une minorité; des esprits distingués qui l'ont à peine lu et ne connaissent ni The Egoist ni Modern Love, se risquent à des jugements prématurément catégoriques. Et le plus grand nombre en est là. Il est évidemment vexant, pour quelqu'un qui se croit quelque valeur intellectuelle, de ne pas comprendre intégralement et à première vue une œuvre d'art. Chacun se croit doué des aptitudes critiques les plus universelles, alors que pour la plus simple opération arithmétique, il faut avoir appris à compter, et pour obtenir le moindre objet en un pays étranger il faut savoir au moins quelques mots de la langue; mais pour juger irrémisiblement une œuvre d'art: la Danse de Carpeaux ou le Balzac de Rodin, il n'est besoin d'aucune préalable notion, d'aucune éducation du goût; à première vue, l'opinion indéracinable est faite. A cause de cela, Mr. Meredith fut pendant de longues années mécompris et mal apprécié, et la plupart de ceux qui osèrent le critiquer ne firent de ses œuvres que des études fort superficielles; cette conviction ne s'impose-t-elle pas que, même en supposant une longue intimité avec son œuvre, ce n'est pas encore maintenant que l'on peut comprendre et juger Mr. George Meredith.

Nous affirmons donc la personnalité inséparable de Mr. Meredith, en nous refusant à louer le poète au dépens du prosateur, ou le prosateur au dépens du poète. Le moyen d'expression est secondaire puisque Mr. Meredith le subordonne à ce qu'il exprime, et que grâce à un don artistique admirable la forme s'adapte exactement à l'idée.

Il l'a dit lui-même ; le roman, exposing and illustrating the natural history of man, est le résultat d'une close knowledge of our fellows, discernment of the laws of existence, avec pour caractère essentiel : le comique, tel qu'il est analysé et défini dans l'Essay on Comedy. Mais toutes choses ne peuvent se ramener exclusivement à la comédie, et malgré des Odes to the Comic Spirit Mr. Meredith semble avoir surtout exprimé dans ses œuvres poétiques le tragique de la vie, the tragic life. Sans doute pour pouvoir être exactement fixé, sur ce nouvel aspect de la vie, faudrait-il que Mr. Meredith consentît à écrire un Essay on Tragedy, encore que ce sujet soit incidemment traité dans l'Essay on Comedy et au cours d'autres œuvres.

Les passages les plus poétiques des romans n'ont pas cette subtile note pathétique qui dans les poèmes s'ajoute au tragique particulier de l'ironie ou de la joie ; et dans cette œuvre unique, qui s'appelle Modern Love, le poète a su transmuier en substance éternelle de vie, quelques souffrances humaines, une douleur profondément tragique ; il a confondu sa douleur particulière dans l'immense douleur de la vie ; de sa douleur d'homme il fait la douleur humaine. Non seulement le poète associe le monde à sa souffrance, mais dans ce magnifique poème, l'humanité s'exalte au point de se confondre avec la nature :—

. . . In the largeness of the evening earth
Our spirits grew as we went side by side—
The hour became her husband and my bride.

Et pendant vingt ans cette sublime compréhension de la vie s'affirme dans d'admirables romans, et elle se révèle encore sous la forme poétique en 1883 avec les Poems and Lyrics of the Joy of Earth, parmi lesquels se trouvent ces pièces superbes : the Woods of Westermain et Love in the Valley.

Pour Mr. Meredith, la Nature est bonne et belle : the soul of things is sweet ; pour lui, toutes choses ont la même signification de force et de vie, l'opulente splendeur de l'été comme la rudesse sauvage de l'hiver. Il lit dans la nature, A Reading of Earth, les choses que tous devraient y voir, et il accepte avec une foi virile et sans restriction tout ce qu'elle enseigne : never is earth misread by brain. N'y a-t-il pas le même tragique charme dans les tendresses comme dans les cruautés de la nature, dans le jour et la nuit, la lumière et l'ombre, la vie et la mort des choses. Tout cela c'est la Joie de la Terre, et il s'écrie dans son enthousiasme lyrique pour la Nature : Behold, she does all things well.

Après avoir si puissamment embrassé l'humanité et la nature, Mr. Meredith s'élève à des hauteurs d'où il aperçoit, non plus seulement ce qu'ont d'éternel et de permanent l'humanité et la nature, mais le drame immense des destinées des nations. Laissant de côté toutes les objections possibles à la technique et aux qualités de cette poésie, il faut considérer les Odes in Contribution to the Song of French History comme un poème symbolique, dans lequel le poète a représenté l'éternelle lutte des races, se servant du fragment de drame historique qui commença avec la Révolution Française, se continua par les Napoléon et Sedan, et se terminera, comme l'indique le poète en une magnifique vision prophétique, dans une ère de dignité et de paix, acheminement vers la fin des contestations des peuples.

Seul, le gigantesque intellect de Mr. Meredith pouvait parcourir cette carrière. Dans un immense effort, il comprit l'humanité avec ses douleurs et ses grandeurs ; la nature avec sa joie superbe et tragique ; le drame majestueux et sublime des destinées universelles. Mr. George Meredith est le génial poète qui a absorbé la vie, l'a recréée suivant sa foi et qui, parti de son humanité intime, parvient à travers l'exaltation intellectuelle jusqu'à la nature et son rythme ordonnateur, fin des incompréhensions et harmonie du monde.

HENRY D. DAVRAY.

RUDYARD KIPLING AS JOURNALIST.

It was in the winter of 1884-85 that I first struck Kipling's trail. I had gone to India as assistant editor of the Pioneer, of Allahabad, while he had been installed for some years in the same capacity on the Civil and Military Gazette, of Lahore. Shortly after arrival I wrote some Limerick verses in dog Latin for my paper, signing them "K. R.," and received a letter a few days later from one Rudyard Kipling, saying that as he was in the habit of writing verses signed "R. K." he was, owing to the similarity of signatures, receiving congratulations upon "breaking out in Latin spots," which belonged to me.

This led to my looking out for "R. K." verses, and when I had seen them, I said to all and sundry :—"This is genius !" But it was not the fashion there to admit that Kipling had genius. To those who had official cognisance of his work—and everything in India is official—he was "a clever young pup," or "a smart youth." That was all.

I wrote to Kipling soon after, telling him that a man who could write as he could should go home to England, to London, where fame could be won ; but he replied, in a characteristic letter which may be published some day :—

"You ought to know better at your time o' life than to knock a youngster off his legs in this way. How do you expect any one will be able to hold me after your letter ?"

"Would you be astonished if I told you that I look forward to nothing but an Indian journalist's career ? Why should I ? My home's out here ; my people are out here ; all the friends I know are out here ; and all the interests I have are out here. Why should I go home ? Any fool can put up rhymes, and the market is full of boys who could undersell me as soon as I put foot in it."

Such is the effect of judicious depreciation upon juvenile modesty.

"Let us," he wrote further, "depart our several ways in amity. You to Fleet Street (where I shall come when I die if I'm good) and I to my own place where I find heat and smells of oil and spices, and puffs of temple incense, and sweat, and darkness, and dirt, and lust, and cruelty, and—above all—things wonderful and fascinating innumerable. Give me time, give me seven years and three added to them and abide the publishment of 'Mother Maturin.'"

"Mother Maturin" is the great work by which for many years Kipling purposed to make his name. In 1886 he had 350 foolscap pages of its manuscript—which means much in his neat writing, though it was not so small in those days as it is now—lying at the bottom of a "bruised, tin teabox." It was, he said, "the novel which is always being written and yet gets no further."

My first sight of Kipling was at an uninteresting stage, when he was a short, square, dark youth, who unfortunately wore spectacles instead of eyeglasses and had an unlucky eye for colour in the selection of his clothes. He had a weakness apparently, for brown cloth with just that suggestion of ruddiness or purple in it which makes some browns so curiously conspicuous. The charm of his manner, however, made you forget what he looked like in half a minute.

From his father Rudyard Kipling has inherited the artistic tendency which leads him to fill any odd scrap of paper near his hand with some grotesque sketch of the incident or idea uppermost in his mind. Quaint and uncanny faces almost always adorned the edges of his writing blocks in the newspaper office at Lahore, and many hundreds of drawings which the autograph-hunter would now value have gone the way of the waste paper basket. He illustrated, too, the connexion between music and poetry in the fact that before composing verses he hummed a tune to fit them to, and in reading his finished verses he delivers them, sometimes at any rate, in recitative. The thought may be worth following up how far the conjunctions of sketching with prose and singing with poetry suggest the natural relations of those arts to literature.

Among Kipling's early journalistic experiences was his involuntary assumption "for this occasion only" of the rôle of the fighting editor. He was essentially a man of peace, and would always prefer making an angry man laugh to fighting with him, but one day there called at the office a very furious photographer. What the paper may have said about him or his photographs has been forgotten, but never will those who witnessed it forget the rough-and-tumble all over the floor in which Kipling and he indulged. The libel, or whatever it was, which had infuriated the photographer, was not Kipling's work, but the quarrel was forced upon him; and although he was handicapped by his spectacles and smaller stature he made a very fine draw of it, and then the photographer—who, it may be remarked, was very drunk—was ejected. And Kipling wiped his glasses and buttoned his collar. That trick of wiping his spectacles is one which Kipling indulges more frequently than any man I have ever met, for the simple reason that he is always laughing; and when you laugh till you nearly cry your glasses get misty. Kipling, shaking all over with laughter and wiping his spectacles at the same time with his handkerchief, is the picture which always comes to mind as most characteristic of him in the old days when even our hardest work on "The Rag"—for fate soon took me to Lahore to be his editor—was as full of jokes as a pomegranate of pips. The "high collar" days, when there were no telegrams, and editorial matter had to be forthcoming to fill the space right up to the top of the columns; the "patent seamless" leader of emergency; the "stringing" of selected extracts; the fitting of "whip lashes" to notes; and the manufacture of "scraps" all gave a mixed bag of sport; but the ecstasy of literary composition was reached in the joint composition of repartees to the attacks of our dear contemporaries.

There was one Anglo-Indian magazine which arrogated to its second-rate self the title of the "Cream of Reviews," and for reasons which do not matter it fell foul of "The Rag"—by which affectionate title we knew our own C. and M. Gazette. So we put our heads together and concocted an article "Concerning Some Sour Cream," which moved the enemy to wrath so nearly speechless that in its next issue it refused to argue further with a "hireling organ which shoots out its wooden head and mocks." "Shoot out your wooden head and mock!" became thenceforth the office exhortation whenever there was journalistic warfare toward, which was often: for "The Rag" was distinctly militant in those days. "Longs and Shorts" was another merry jape; but of all journalistic feats we had most reason to be proud of our earthquake.

This earthquake occurred at about 2.30 a.m. one Sunday morning. In those days the Saturday paper, dated Monday, according to Anglo-Indian practice—for at the stations the native newsboys offer you always "To-morrow's paper, Sahib"—used to go to press in the small hours of Sunday morning to catch the Bombay and Calcutta mail trains. It was always practically finished by midnight, and only one page remained "open" for telegrams. On this occasion we had spent the hours from midnight till half-past 2 at the club, which was emptied by that time of revellers, and returned to the bungalow, when we both noticed a slight tremor as of an earthquake. To verify the matter we looked at a hanging hook on a door; yes, it was swinging, so in went a brief paragraph in the paper, among the very latest news, announcing a "slight earthquake" at Lahore. Not another soul in Lahore or in any part of the Punjab or India felt that earthquake, and the Government observatory knew nothing of it. It was our own private and special earthquake, and we treasure its memory. After the last English earthquake, he wrote to me:—

"This here English journalism isn't what it's cracked up to be. They can't have an earthquake in England without taking up two cols. of The Times to describe the effects and to verify the direction and nature of the shock. This does not give scope for invention. Now, I remember the time when you and I could just make an earthquake, same as the Almighty, slip it into the "local" at 3 a.m. of a Sunday morning, and go to bed with the consciousness we'd done our duty by the proprietors. Wonder what they'd say on the Globe to so strictly local an earthquake as ours?"

Surprise is generally expressed at the mastery possessed by Kipling of the technicalities of so many professions. As a rule the soldier, sailor, sportsman, engineer, or naturalist will detect the erring hand of the lay writer in almost every paragraph; but the peculiarity of Rudyard Kipling's work is that just when it is most technical it appeals most strongly to the admiration of the men with whose craft it deals. Many regard the power as an almost uncanny adjunct of his genius. Yet it is in truth the result of the most prosaic of all the attributes of genius—namely, the infinite capacity for taking pains. To learn to write as soldiers think he spent long hours loafing with the genuine article. He watched them at work and at play and at prayer from the points of view of all his confidants—the combatant officer, the doctor, the chaplain, the drill sergeant, and the private himself. With the Navy, with every branch of sport and with natural history, he has never wearied in seeking to learn all that man may learn at first hand, or the very best second hand, at any rate. Hence he can write of Esquimaux as though he had lived for years among them, and of the jungle beasts in the very echoes of the jungle. But most wonderful is his insight into the strangely mixed manners of life and thought of the natives of India. He knew them all through their horizontal divisions of rank and their vertical sections of caste; their ramifications of race and blood; their antagonisms and blendings of creed; and their hereditary streaks of calling or handicraft. Show him a native, and he would tell you his rank, caste, race, origin, habitat, creed, and calling. He would speak to the man in his own fashion, using familiar, homely figures which brightened the other's surprised eyes with recognition of brotherhood and opened a straight way into his confidence. In two minutes the man—perhaps a wild hawk from the Afghan hills—would be pouring out into the ear of this Sahib with heaven-sent knowledge and sympathy the weird tale of the blood-feud and litigation, the border fray, and the usurer's iniquity, which had driven him so far afield as Lahore from Bajaur. To Kipling even the most suspected and suspicious of classes, the religious mendicants, would open their mouths freely.

By the road, thick with the dust of camels and thousands of cattle and goats, which winds from Lahore Fort across the River Ravi, there are walled caravanserais, the distant smell of which more than suffices for most of the Europeans who pass; but sitting with the travellers from Bokhara or Badakshan, in the reeking interior Kipling heard weird tales and gathered much knowledge. Under a spreading peepul tree overhanging a well by the same road squatted daily a ring of almost naked fakirs, smeared with ashes, who scowled at the European driving by, but for Kipling there was, if he wished it, an opening in the squatting circle and much to be learned from the unsavoury talkers. That is how his finished word pictures take the life-like aspect of instantaneous photographs. When, moreover, any man acquired a reputation for special skill in his calling, to him Kipling always went for knowledge. From men like Warburton of the Police, J. R. Bell of the Civil Engineers, Mulroney of the Medical, Henderson of the Secret Service, and others—mostly dead now—he learned the secrets of life and work and crime on the large and often lurid scale that fits the colouring of an Eastern canvas.

That Kipling, given health and strength, will return to India I am sure. His pen is a magnet to draw him thither; and, as he has already done once since fame was his, he will sit again in a chair in the office of the old Rag, ask after the old native hands by name, and try to recall the aroma of the days when the waste paper basket under the editor's table used to receive some of his rejected MSS. It is not fashionable to reject Kipling's MSS. now.

E. KAY ROBINSON.

Notes.

Formal application has been made to the Treasury for a Civil List pension for the widow and children of the late Mr. Gleeson White. It is no mere phrase to speak of Mr. Gleeson White's "services to art and literature," in consideration of which the pension is asked for. He did much to improve the artistic taste of his generation, and a longer lease of life would probably have brought him a more substantial reward than his many years of hard work had yet won. We hope that the petition of Mrs. Gleeson White's friends may not go unheeded.

The Society for Checking the Abuses of Public Advertising continues, under the more manageable name of "Scapa," "to exert itself vigorously for the protection of our eyes from the outrages which affront them in street and field for the benefit, or supposed benefit, of the vendors of certain "eatables, drinkables, and drugs"; and to the current number of the Westminster Review Mr. Richardson Evans, who may almost be called the father of the Society, contributes an article commending it and its aims to public support. Publicly and privately, with the pen and by his organizing labours, Mr. Evans has done more than any man living to promote the cause; and, what is no less important, no one has done more to guide the work of promotion aright, and to direct it on the proper lines. The average Englishman is very difficult to move in a matter of this kind, and the Society are only making way slowly with him; but if the movement had fallen into the hands of Mr. Bunthorne and Mr. Archibald Grosvenor, and the average Englishman had been approached in the spirit of those "too too" passionately artistic gentlemen, the difficult would have become the impossible.

In this article, as formerly and elsewhere, Mr. Evans approaches him in a wholly different spirit. His appeal is eminently good-humoured and temperate in tone, and thoroughly practical and business-like in suggestion. Moreover, it puts the case for restraint of the disfiguring advertisers in a novel and striking way. "Vision," as Mr. Evans points out, "is almost the only sense which has been excluded from the scope of paternal legislation." Cleanliness has been made compulsory in our thoroughfares, lest our nostrils should be offended or our shoes soiled. The ear has been—in theory, at any rate—protected from organ-grinders and bawling hawkers. Even the palate has not been deemed unworthy the attention of a Legislature which has passed a series of Adulteration Acts. Why should the eye alone be at the mercy of any one who chooses to annoy it? The analogy is unassailable, and even the most anarchically-minded of "free" Britons may be induced by Mr. Evans to ponder it, perhaps to ultimate advantage.

We comment elsewhere on the cataloguing of the collection of French Revolutionary tracts in the British Museum. It is a magnificent collection—larger even than that in the Bibliothèque Nationale, at Paris. The greater part of it was acquired from, or at the instance of, John Wilson Croker, who, when in Paris shortly after Waterloo, bought up every pamphlet of the kind that he could lay his hands on. They will be found to throw fresh light upon many obscure and interesting points; among other things, we believe, they determine the precise date at which Robespierre dropped the aristocratic prefix "de." Though they are now for the first time properly sorted and listed, it must not, however, be assumed that modern scholars are absolutely unacquainted with them. It was his knowledge of this branch of revolutionary literature—as well as of the revolutionary annals of the various provincial towns—that enabled Mr. H. Morse Stephens to whitewash Marat, and revise many of the judgments of Carlyle, who declared that "for all practical purposes this collection of ours might just as well have been locked up in water-tight chests and sunk on the Dogger Bank as put into the British Museum."

Our Cambridge Correspondent writes:—

The storm which arose during the discussion as to the Classical Tripos has ceased now that the Senate has decisively rejected the proposals for reform. The voting was contrary to the expectations excited by the very clear, authoritative, and widespread expressions of discontent with the present state of things.

The rejection of the proposal to insist on men who have taken Part I. passing some other examination before they can get a degree was probably due to a fear which, in certain quarters, became increasingly acute, that the teaching staff in some of the smaller colleges would prove unable to cope with the fresh burden imposed on them; they would have to prepare their men for two examinations instead of one, and they would have to provide instruction in a number of new subjects. The colleges would have to provide almost all the teaching for themselves; there is no University Professor, Reader, or Lecturer in Greek or Roman Philosophy or Literature. There is no Professor of Classical Archaeology, but only a Reader, and he would have to cope, single-handed, with the whole range of subjects included under this head, for it is a mere accident that the present Disney Professor is a Classical man who has devoted himself with great enthusiasm and success to the teaching of Greek Archaeology. As to Ancient History, it is only within the last few weeks that Cambridge has done anything for that study beyond establishing a Readership in Roman History with a stipend of £50. It is true that we now have Dr. Reid as Professor of Ancient History, but he will probably lecture exclusively on Roman History, and his appointment is so recent that we have not had time to realize that Roman History is at last going to be taught at Cambridge.

Literature, in fact, is starved at Cambridge, and will die of inanition unless steps are taken to re-endow it. There is a movement on foot for counteracting by fresh benefactions the disastrous effects of agricultural depression. But, though the Duke of Devonshire and Messrs. Rothschild have set such a generous example, and though others will, no doubt, follow suit, Cambridge is so strongly in favour of what is immediately useful that, unless benefactors earmark their donations, those studies which most need help will perish for want of funds. As it is, such money as is given for a special purpose is devoted to what is technical and materially productive. Owing to the liberality of Sir Walter Gilbey and the Drapers' Company, the Cambridge and Counties Agricultural Education Scheme has now developed into a full-blown University department, funds to support which are guaranteed for ten years. It is ungracious to look a gift horse in the mouth, and flattering to find that practical people look to us for help in practical things; but, after all, our main duty is to promote "useless" knowledge, and we cannot and ought not to turn ourselves into a commercial University. That should be left to Birmingham or some other new foundation unhampered by our medieval traditions. We shall probably never become really practical, and if we do, the success will be more than counterbalanced by the loss it will cause to unproductive learning. At present, of course, the new department will be no burden, but we do not know that an equal amount of money will be forthcoming ten years hence, nor if it were, that it would then be adequate, nor that it would not be accompanied by conditions (e.g., that we should give a Degree in Agriculture) with which we might be unable to comply. In that case, supposing the school were flourishing, we should feel compelled to continue it ourselves, and our proper academic studies would suffer. Moreover, the constitution of the Agricultural Board, which is to regulate this study, is such that the majority need not be members of the University at all, which seems a step in the wrong direction.

There is, however, one consolation—the very modest scheme for improving the Library, hitherto scandalously understaffed, underpaid, and cramped for room, has passed without opposition.

We have received a letter signed by the Archbishop of Canterbury, Lord Stamford, Lord Bessborough, the Bishop of Durham, and others, appealing to the public on behalf of the Codrington College, Barbados. It is the University of the major part of the West Indies, and, unless by the 1st of May next a sum of £5,000 is forthcoming, it will be closed on June 29 of this year.

This college, established in 1710 by General Codrington, soldier, administrator, man of letters, and a native of the West Indies, provides "an adequate education for such of the West Indian youths as should be disposed to devote themselves to the Christian Ministry in their native islands, without the expense and trouble of seeking the necessary qualifications in Europe, at a distance from their friends and relations," and has, with one interval, continued to fulfil the intentions of the Founder.

Contributions can be sent immediately to Messrs. Drummond's Bank, 49, Charing-cross, S.W. Cheques should be made payable to "The Trustees of Codrington College or Bearer," and crossed "Messrs. Drummond."

A further extract from Windham's tour in France and Italy is printed in this month's Antiquary. It has a special interest because it shows us the discoverer of Chamounix once more in Alpine scenery. But the energy which was so conspicuous in the Windham of 1741 is no longer discernible in the Windham of 1769. At Novalesa it never occurred to him to make the ascent of the Roche Melon, though we know from the works of the Seigneur de Villamont that a tourist got to the top of that mountain as early as 1688. Nor is his account of the passage of the Mont Cenis at all in keeping with his earlier expeditions to the Montanvert and the Mer de Glace. "About two miles from this place" the writer says, "the plain ends and the descent begins on this side of the mountain, and here you will very willingly quit your mule in order to be carried down in a little light chair, by two men, accompanied by four or six others, by way of relays, according to your size and weight." It is a sad falling off.

Climbers seem to agree with us that, in an age when so many classics are being reprinted, the classics of mountaineering ought not to be forgotten. Let us make a little list, to which we will draw the attention of the publishers. These are:—

John Auldjo's "Narrative of an Ascent to the Summit of Mont Blanc" (1828).

T. G. Bonney's "High Alps of Dauphiné" (1865).

James D. Forbes' "Travels Through the Alps of Savoy" (1843).

John Forbes' "Physician's Holiday" (1849).

A. G. Girdlestone's "High Alps Without Guides" (1870).

Thomas W. Hinchliff's "Summer Months Among the Alps" (1857).

Hudson's "Where There's a Will There's a Way" (1856).

Tyndall's "Mountaineering in 1861" (1862).

Wills' "Wanderings in the High Alps" (1856).

It is not claimed that this list is exhaustive; but it contains the name of no book that is not at present at a high premium in the second-hand book shops.

We have received a copy of the Encyclopædic Catalogue of the Guille-Allès Library in the Island of Guernsey, compiled under the direction of Mr. Alfred Cotgreave. There are 40,000 volumes in the Lending Library and 20,000 in the Reference Library. The most interesting feature of the catalogue is unquestionably the bold attempt which Mr. Cotgreave has made to subject-index fiction. So far as historical novels are concerned readers may well find this classification useful. If they wish to read a novel about a particular period, it will save time to turn up Second Century, and be referred to "Day Break in Britain," by A. L. O. E.; or Reformation, and be sent to "Chronicles of the Schonberg-Cotta Family." Novels which are not historical are, however, more difficult to classify. Volcanic, see "Phantom City"; Vice, see "Diary of a Late Physician"; Sacrifice, see "Moloch"; Necklaces, see "Diamond Necklace"; Mystery, see "Mrs. Matthews"; Boats, see "Three Men in a Boat," are entries of rather questionable utility. On the other hand, the entry Robinson Crusoe, see "Life and Adventures of Robinson Crusoe," does not seem to belong to subject-indexing, in the strict sense of the word: while the fact that, out of 60,000 volumes, only nineteen are subject-indexed under Love, is a truly startling one.

The office of the Mercure de France seems to be the only place in Paris where they really know something about English literature, and the plebiscite lately taken by the Gaulois to ascertain which English authors are best liked by French men of letters has elicited ironical remarks from the editor of that excellent review. He writes:—

Il s'agit, je suppose, d'hommes entre quarante-cinq et soixante ans, allant de la génération de M. Bourget à celle de M. Sully-Prudhomme, et au delà. . . . En général leur connaissance de la littérature anglaise commence et finit à Shakespeare. Ceux qui se sont hasardés un peu moins loin l'ont fait avec une prudence vraiment académique, ou avec une indifférence comme bouseuse et affligée.

There follows a plea for the recognition of Defoe and Swift, and a just appreciation of the latter writer. It is a pity that the issue containing such an excellent criticism should also, in citing the contents of Littérature, abbreviate Canon Rawnsley as "C. Rawnsley"; but this is one of those little accidents against which the foreign critic can seldom be absolutely secure.

That, on the whole, the Mercure de France is up to date is proved by the fact that it has just issued a translation, by M. Henry D. Davray, of Mr. H. G. Wells' "The Time Machine," under the title of "Le Machine à Explorer le Temps." M. Davray's biographical and critical introduction contains some luminous remarks. As, for example:—

Il semble que Mr. Wells passe sa vie à sans cesse s'imaginer ce qui arriverait si les lois de la Nature se trouvaient soudain ou progressivement bouleversées, et toujours avec une tendance à des visions terrifiantes ou sinistres. Si ses méthodes parfois rappellent M. Jules Verne, il faut avouer néanmoins qu'il se rapproche beaucoup plus d'Edgar Poe, et de Villiers de l'Isle-Adam. . . . Plus souvent que Poe et Villiers il se sert de l'"humour," de cette sorte d'"humour" malicieux qui permet sous un tour léger de phrase de dissimuler une pensée plus profonde sur laquelle l'esprit peut méditer. Il suppose une perturbation quelconque des lois naturelles, et cela lui permet d'indiquer, dans le développement logique de son problème, les faiblesses et les insuffisances de l'organisation humaine, le leur très probable d'une civilisation allant de progrès en progrès, l'incertitude même de ce progrès, de la science, de toutes les affirmations et de tous les fondements sur lesquels repose la vie moderne.

The desire which has shown itself lately both in France and Germany to perpetuate the memory of a writer in stone does not seem to have taken root in England. Some months back we had occasion to allude to the unveiling of busts of Michelet and Chateaubriand in France. In Germany six beautiful colonnes hermatiques have just been added to the literary monuments of Berlin. The poets honoured—Arndt, Körner, Max von Schenkendorf, Uhland, Rückert, and Heinrich von Kleist—are all connected with the Freiheits Kriege of 1813-15. The tragic death of Körner on the field of battle lends a special interest to his statue by Wenck, who represents the poet pressing a sabre and a scroll to his breast. Why should we not have a monument of a similar kind to Sidney?

Nietzsche's correspondence with the art-historian Jacob Burckhardt, between 1881-88, edited by Frau Förster-Nietzsche, is being published in the Neue Deutsche Rundschau. Like Wagner, Burckhardt was many years Nietzsche's senior, but the friendship between the two distinguished Basle professors was instantaneous and warm. It sprang up, Nietzsche writes, on the ground of their "mutual æsthetic paradoxes." In 1871 they rushed to each other's rooms to wring their hands in unison over the burning of the Louvre, the news being regarded by both as a personal misfortune, and as mournful evidence of the futility of all present-day art and culture. To Burckhardt Nietzsche owed his copious and accurate knowledge of the Renaissance, while the historian on his side was so impressed by Nietzsche's theories with regard to the Greek drama, exemplified in his "Birth of Tragedy," that he altered and amended his lectures on Hellenism after reading the work of his younger colleague.

No more interesting book about books could be compiled than a catalogue raisonné of the contents of Petrarch's library. There are some in Rome, some in Paris, and although many of those which he gave to Venice have "crumbled into powder," or were "glued into shapeless masses by the damp," owing to the neglect of succeeding official custodians, there are yet some to be found in the Ducal Palace. Those, however, who cannot examine these books in situ will have an opportunity of seeing a collection of twenty-four manuscripts from Petrarch's library which will come up for sale at Messrs. Sotheby's on April 14. Many of these volumes have annotations which are said to be in the poet's own handwriting, and, so far as a comparison with lithographed facsimiles in the Codex Virgilianus in the Ambrosian Library show, the writing is clearly that of Petrarch. The earliest of the MSS. is a twelfth century "Evangelia quatuor" on 117 leaves quarto, but wanting the beginning, the text written in clear gothic letter, the glosses in a smaller hand interlinear and in the margins. Another early twelfth-thirteenth MS. is a work of St. Augustine, "Contra Epistolam Parmeniani Donatistarum," &c.

The most notable of the thirteenth-century MSS. is St. Ambrosius, "Commentarii in Epistolas S. Pauli," extending to 148 leaves folio, the text in large and the commentary in small gothic letter, with ornamental initials and a large wood-cut shield of arms surmounted by a Bishop's mitre, bearing, like many other MSS., the inscription "Fragmentum Bibliothecæ Petrarchæ." At the end of this volume is a copy of the two leaves of Rovillus' advertisement relating to Petrarch and his library at Arquà. The other thirteenth-century MSS. include "Clastrum Solitudinis: Sermones Dominicales"; Clemens, "Recognitionum"; Hugo de S. Clara "Commentarii in Ecclesiastici librum," and a copy of Richardus de Mediavilla (Middleton), "In Secundum Librum Sententiarum," on 260 leaves folio, "Gulielmus Rovillus in Libro Annotationum impresso Lugduni anno 1576."

There are two fourteenth-century MSS. of that profound schoolman, Ægidius de Colonna, "In Libros Posteriorum Aristotelis Commentaria," written in a contracted, cursive hand, with a large copper-plate engraving of a female, symbolical of "Logica" in front, and one of "Astronomia" at end. The second work is "In Secundum librum Sententiarum," written in small gothic letter, and with ornamental letters in red and blue. The copy of Joannes de Balbus, "Catholicon," is especially interesting for the printed edition of 1460 is one of the few indubitable productions of Gutenberg's press. Other fourteenth-century MSS. are the "Commentaria in libros Ethicorum et Economie Aristotelis," of Buridanus; S. Bonaventura, "In Librum tertium Sententiarum"; Gregorius Arminiensis "In Secundum Librum Sententiarum," and "Linterni Lectio pro Spiritualibus advenis" (Sermones Dominicales ad Carthusianos). There is also a copy of Lombardus, "Sententiarum, lib. IV., cum commentario," 128 leaves folio. One of the more interesting volumes has this title:—"Philosophicæ Discussiones. Dritton [John, Anglus of Drypool, Co. York] Glossæ in Aristotelis libros Metheorum de Generatione et corruptione, de Vegetabilibus et Plantis," &c. It seems a pity that no history whatever is given of these Petrarch volumes, and even the name of the present owner is not stated. The little collection is obviously one which has been formed only after long and assiduous research; and it will be offered in one lot at an "upset" price of £200; if that sum is not reached the MSS. will be sold singly in lots.

A curious and rare book, entitled "The Transcendent Virtue of the true Spirit of Salt," a copy of which was recently sold by auction, has a close connexion with the history of London. Its author was "one Constantine, a Grecian" Constantine Rhodotavakis—whose name, curiously enough, appears to have been almost entirely overlooked by the chroniclers. The Grecian coffee-house in Devereux-court, Strand, was established by him, though his chief claim to recognition is associated with the great plague of 1665, which served his ends so well that he is said to have amassed a fortune of £30,000 during its continuance. The "True Spirit of Salt" asserted by Constantine to be an absolute specific against bubonic plague if applied in time was, in fact, muriatic acid. He appears to have invented, or, at any rate, adopted, a theory that the plague was caused by invisible organisms in the blood, and claimed that his treatment destroyed these without injuring the patient.

It was with mixed feelings that collectors viewed the application of the "reserve" system and the en bloc method to some of the best lots in the collection of Mr. Egerton H. Clarke which Messrs. Sotheby sold last week. A typical case occurred in regard to the Dickens books, all first editions, in excellent condition, splendidly bound, and stated by the auctioneer as the finest set he had ever had to sell. The forty items, comprising sixty-three volumes, were put up en bloc. The bidding went to £172, but, as the reserve of £200 was not reached, the books were withdrawn. It would have been better to have sold them separately, for Dickens is such a popular author with collectors that even his ordinary books command high prices if their condition is good. There are, however, few who care to buy a whole set to begin with. Such a practice does away with "the ardour of the chase," a fascinating recreation which has very much to be reckoned with in book collecting. Included in the Dickens set were many books known to be wanted to complete collections already begun, and there were several "unlimited" commissions in the room. The failure to reach the reserves, which were in reality not high, caused the following sets also to be withdrawn:—Lever's Works, 34 items, 54 vols., £105 offered; George Meredith's Works, 24 items, 48 vols., £73 offered; Stevenson's Works, 41 items, 42 vols., £140 offered; Thackeray's Works, 47 items, 54 vols., £180 offered.

The remaining lots included some scarce examples of modern authors, and the competition for them was keen. Amongst the most prominent were the following:—"Lorna Doone," first edition, £11 10s.; Poems by "Carrer, Ellis, and Acton Bell," 1846, first edition, the rare first issue, by Aylott and Jones, £28. The demand on publication for these poems was so small that the majority of the sheets were not bound up. They were subsequently handed over to Smith, Elder, who issued them with the same date, 1846, but under their own name. A copy of this last issue also occurred in the sale, but it fetched only £1 6s.; Brontë (Sisters) Works, first editions, 22 vols., £60; Grimm's "German Popular Stories," 2 vols., first edition, etchings by George Cruikshank, £37; Dickens' "Pickwick Papers," first edition, in original parts, illustrations by Seymour and Phiz, a fine copy and in spotless condition, £22; George Eliot's Works, first editions, 29 vols., £30 10s.; Hardy's Works, first editions, 38 vols., £40; Charles Kingsley's Works, first editions, 15 vols., £20; Lamb's "Tale of Rosamund Gray," first edition, £30; Captain Marryat's Works, first editions, 80 vols., £111; Charles Reade's Works, first editions, 37 vols., £40; Ruskin's Poems (1850), and "Salsette and Elephanta," £21 10s.; Sir Walter Scott's Works, first editions, 74 vols., £226. Included in this lot was a fine copy of the rare first edition of Waverley. A separate copy of the first Waverley in cloth, cut, fetched only £5 15s.—there is a wide difference between this and the £78 paid for Lord Ashburnham's uncut copy—Swinburne's Works, first editions, 39 vols., £64; Tennyson's "Poems by Two Brothers," the scarce first edition as published and in much finer condition than usual, £30; Thackeray's "Vanity Fair," first edition in original parts, £32.

THE LATIN ENERGY.

One of the leaders among French writers of the younger school, M. Paul Adam, in a copy which he was good enough to send me of his latest volume, "La Force"—which is unquestionably, since "Paris," the novel of the year—wrote these words descriptive of his effort: cette image de l'énergie latine. The phrase reflects a common French illusion. The movement of the Napoleonic épopée, which succeeded the upheaval of the Revolution, you find interpreted in France as a repetition of the expansion of Rome, and the journalists who talk of the contrasts between Anglo-Saxon and Latin civilization are of one mind as to the necessity of cultivating this error as the surest hope of the revival of French national self-consciousness. M. Gachot, in his new and erudite history of Napoleon's second Italian campaign, records a significant proclamation by the First Consul, found by him in a note-book of an officer of the general staff, which suggests, perhaps, the origin of this illusion. The army was already in the Alps, and the future Emperor, before descending upon Italy, thus encouraged his troops:—

"Soldiers," said he, "march fearlessly on. Nothing can withstand you. And do not forget that you are sowing liberty broadcast through the Old World. If Europe persists in refusing to acknowledge our right to live free men, I will lead you victorious to every capital. Soldiers, remain always obedient to discipline. Thus will you render yourselves immortal in Italy, and deliver from the German yoke a nation of our race which honours itself in having our ideal aspirations."

Here, evidently, is M. Paul Adam's excuse. And there is much truth mixed with the cheap generalization as to the "Anglo-Saxon" and the "Latin." Nothing is more characteristic of the literary drift in France than the extraordinary persistence of the Napoleonic legend, and M. Paul Adam's success is a notable sign of the times. Readers of Sainte-Beuve had long ago noted the prophecy upon which he ventured in his article à propos of the letters of Sir Henry Bulwer upon Talleyrand:—

The private memoirs on the Empire have not yet appeared. The contemporaries who knew are no longer living [this was in 1869]; the sons, their descendants, have thus far held in check posthumous revelations. All this history, however, will finally see the light.

Yet even Sainte-Beuve would have been surprised if he could have foreseen the breadth of the stream which was shortly to begin its course over the broad territory marked France in the Republic of Letters.

The interest shown in France for unpublished documents relating to the Napoleonic period remains unabated, and if it flagged, the talent and activity of the Massons, the Houssayes, and the Chuquets, would resuscitate it. The other cause for the renaissance of the Napoleonic legend—namely, the abundance of memoirs which the last ten years have evoked from the garrets of country houses where for three generations they have been slumbering—seems as vigorous as ever. The most interesting of these memoirs, such as those of Coignet, Marbot, or Bourgoigne, have already seen the light. General Baron Desvernois, whose memoirs are now added to the long list, certainly did not possess humble Sergeant Bourgoigne's native art of narration. Yet his memoirs are worth noting for the information they give us of a period hitherto all but unknown.

Desvernois was born in Eastern France in 1771, and began life as a clerk in the employ of the farmers general, being transferred to the head office in Paris in 1791. He was set down by some jealous clubmen as a "suspect," and would no doubt have met the fate of so many "aristocrats" and "bourgeois" if he had not enlisted in the "hussars of Liberty." When the September massacres began he was at the Eastern frontier. By 1795 he had become a non-commissioned officer, and he was sent with his regiment to Italy to serve under Bonaparte, who had just been appointed by the Directory Commander-in-Chief. In the campaign that ensued Desvernois speedily rose in rank. He deserved it, moreover, if his account of the capture of Cremona with three hussars is true. He was taken prisoner before Mantua, and, led before the Austrian officer, told that Bonaparte would soon share his fate. No one, in fact, believed in Bonaparte's military genius, and even Desvernois never came under his spell. He always puts Kléber above him. After the Egyptian campaign we find Desvernois in Italy again. Bonaparte has become Emperor, his brother Joseph is King of Naples, and Desvernois is an "aide-de-camp" of the new King's Minister of War. But from a brilliant cavalry officer he has become once more an administrator, spending his time in auditing accounts, discovering frauds, threatening dishonest contractors. He recalls complacently, moreover, the executions of brigands for which he was responsible; all Napoleon's officers had something of the bloodthirsty revolutionist about them. After the disasters of 1814-1815 Desvernois turns up in Marseilles, which is in full insurrection, and discovers that a general's life is hardly safe in the Valley of the Rhone so long as the White Terror lasts. He had to return to his native town practically penniless. The July Monarchy in 1830 made him some amends. He was appointed military governor of Rochefort. He died in 1859, without apparently showing any enthusiasm for the restored Napoleonic fortune.

This, as I said, is the memoir-type, and in interesting contrast we have every few weeks as a result of M. Désiré Lacroix's careful editing some fresh publication in the famous collection of historical and military memoirs on the Revolution the Consulate, and the Empire bearing the seal of Garnier. The latest are "Les Derniers Moments de Napoléon," by Antommarchi, and the "Bonaparte en Egypte," which is an original work worthy of the scholarship of this former member of the Government Commission of Napoleon the First's Correspondence. Among the most curious things noted by Dr. Antommarchi is Napoleon's extreme desire to read Mme. de Staël's work on Germany. No one, however, was rash enough to send it to him. There at St. Helena Napoleon's favourite subjects of conversation were his son, the King of Rome, and his native land. Antommarchi affirms that at St. Helena it was the climate that killed Napoleon. At St. Helena he dreamed of his old home and of his boy, just as at Rome, in her old age—as the Comtesse Potocka relates in her "Voyage d'Italie" just published by M. Stryienski—Napoleon's mother, Mme. Letitia, dreamed of him. The portrait of this venerable lady is the most curious thing in the manuscript left by the Countess. When she called upon Mme. Letitia, she found there the Duke of Hamilton, but he immediately left. She says:

Her great age . . . does not appear to have destroyed her moral faculties. You still see she must have been beautiful. She is simply and nobly dressed. She speaks little and appears to understand French with difficulty. She likes to talk of her son. . . . She showed us a little ring she wears which her son gave her when a child. In her bed room we saw a number of souvenirs of the great man, among which was the little bust of the King of Rome sent to Napoleon at St. Helena, and the night-lamp which lighted his room when he died. Several times he had directed that these objects should be sent to his mother, appearing to attach to them a philosophic and consoling idea. . . . She made and remade her will. Extremely close as she was she never refused to give money to those whom the Emperor sent to her for sums which were often considerable.

It is this intimate note of "souvenir" which characterizes the work of the writer, who has obtained perhaps an even greater popularity than M. Arthur Chuquet. The third volume, entitled "Toulon," of M. Chuquet's "The Youth of Napoleon," has just appeared. He has uprooted a mass of material, the existence of which no one suspected, and is at once lucid and scientific in his treatment of it.

The new volumes of M. Frédéric Masson are among his best, and among recent additions to the rich literature of Napoleon far the most readable. The most recently published of them comes to us at an opportune moment, when the château of Malmaison, nestling in the meadows by the Seine, under the battlefield of Buzenval, is being thrown open to the public, restored by the liberality of M. Osiris. The historian of "Napoléon et les Femmes" is a writer of such charm that he risks alienating the scientific readers who have the cultus of the document and an ingrained distrust of an agreeable narrative style. Moreover, with a coquetry which of itself betrays the predominance in him of the artist seeking "effect," he refuses to encumber his pages with footnotes and references. But it should be added that if one takes the pains to verify his statements, the result is a complete triumph and justification for M. Masson.

His appreciation of Josephine has something of the quickly changing chameleonic graces of his model, assuming quite naturally, it would seem, something of her purring creole charm. It is a portrait differing in a hundred delicate touches from that which historians have hitherto offered us, and the verisimilitude of which no one can doubt. We have not as yet the finished picture. This volume is the first of three, and the second is called: "Josephine Impératrice et Reine." But here we have Josephine the girl and the young woman, carried to the point when first, active little intriguante that she is, she knocks one day at the door of General Bonaparte on a simple matter of business, and then and there so captivates the young officer that within 48 hours he is at her feet, making love to her in the house rented for her by Barras, writing to her as mio dolce amor, and irrevocably hers, not for life but for fourteen years in which she shared his grandeur. M. Masson has done well to find out what manner of woman Josephine really was. Clearly she is no longer the Josephine of the David picture; but she is pre-eminently human, intelligibly femme. The Bonapartists, many of them, have manifested indignation at these revelations, but their protests have in no wise affected M. Masson. Moreover, as he says, this woman held the largest place in the life of the General, the Consul, and the Emperor. M. Masson has substituted for the mass of legends, blunders, and interested apologies, of which Josephine has been the object, an intelligible, simple tale of Josephine's childhood in the "Islands"; her marriage with the priggish but successful young General Beauharnais, who always had pompous phrases on his lips which, as the French say, must have "left" Josephine "cold"; the difficulties of the "young ménage," the separation, with Josephine's entrance into a convent, which was her first introduction to the real world of good manners, her retirement to Fontainebleau, where she seems to have been gayer than M. Masson's Bonapartist critics like to admit, her sudden inexplicable departure for Martinique, then her return to share her separated husband's fate amidst the vicissitudes of the Revolution, and then the rôle of Hoche and Barras and the rest until her tact and grace and initiative created for her suddenly the "situation" in which alone she existed for us to-day almost until M. Masson's book appeared. This tale is destined to an immense publicity, and it deserves it. No French historian is at once such an erudite student and such a master of seductive narrative.

Josephine carries us a long way from M. Paul Adam and the "Latin energy." She is the indolent incarnation of just the reverse of the qualities which surprise us in the anapaestic measures of the Napoleonic writers. But they go on discoursing about the grand figure to which she was attached; and M. Paul Adam and MM. Margueritte and M. Barrès dip their quills in red ink which evokes the battle-field, just because, after all, there is such a thing as "Latin energy"—and just because this energy differs essentially, and we may add not ingloriously, from the Anglo-Saxon energy which, according to M. Démolins, is ousting it all over the globe.

W.M.F.

P.S.—In a third publication which M. Alcan has inserted in his "Library of the Faculty of Letters of the University of Paris," treating of the episode of Le Treize Vendémiaire An IV. which revealed the name of Bonaparte, and marked the beginning of his rapid fortune, M. Henry Zivy, the author, has produced a model of the scrupulous work now being turned out daily by the French University, although necessarily the method adopted does not concern itself with artistic presentation. And also the curious Souvenirs et Anecdotes de l'Île d'Elbe left by Pons de l'Hérault, a Spaniard who chanced to be manager of the mines at Elba when Napoleon arrived there. Both Napoleon and Pons liked the Marseillaise national dish of bouillabaisse, and this made them such friends that, during the "Hundred Days," Napoleon appointed Pons Prefect of Lyons. Never forgiven by the Restoration, Pons spent the last years of his life in writing his memoirs. They were discovered at the Montpellier library by a professor at the University, M. Pellissier, and it is to him we owe their publication. The picture Pons gives of Napoleon is curious in that it recalls the portrait cited above from the Comtesse Potocka of his mother, and gives one or two touching traits of character revealed in the enforced moments of repose between the mad explosions of his "Latin energy."

FICTION.

The Capsina. By E. F. Benson. Illustrated by G. P. Jacomb-Hood. 7½ x 5 in. London, 1899. Methuen. 6/-

"The Capsina" is a companion picture to "The Vintage." That is to say, it is a second story of the Greek War of Independence, consecutive in time and identical in motive with the former tale, and recording the patriotic "vintage of the sea," as the other recorded the vintage of the land. The heroine, who was about the same age as the century, was the orphan daughter of a Hydriot shipbuilder, whose work she carried on with energy and skill, turning out deep-keeled, narrow-prowed ships, quick to the helm, and ready (at her guidance) to fly almost into the teeth of a gale. Her father had been head of the clan of Capsas, and his authority passed on to her. The fame of the Capsina spread far and wide; she felt vaguely that there was a great work before her, and repudiated with scorn her betrothal to her cousin Christos, into which she had been hurried in her girlhood. The Capsina was strong-minded, self-willed, and capable of any effort of heroism; she was also an enthusiast, and full of ideals, vowing amongst other things that she would never give her hand in marriage until "some one, I know not who, comes from the sea, all sea and sun, some one not familiar, but strange to me and stronger than I." Mr. Benson has been at greater pains with the character of Sophia Capsas than he was with his sketch of Suleima, the wife of Mitsos the Mainat; and naturally, for the Capsina is a heroine of action, who, when her career opened before her, and she took command of her best ship and sailed her against the Turk, "felt as if her life had suddenly burst into blossom, and the blossom thereof was red."

Red, indeed, is the prevailing colour of Mr. Benson's historical romance. Many English writers have been attracted—"fascinated" would scarcely be too strong a word—by the Greek revolutionary movement of eighty years ago. The cruelties of the Turks, the revenges of the Greeks, the alternation of victory and defeat, the final intervention of the Powers on behalf of the weaker side, have dwelt vividly in the imagination of Western Philhellenes, and stirred up a recurrent enthusiasm which, to be candid, has occasionally touched the fringe of hysteria. This picture of the Capsina, stung to the quick by the tales of Kanaris, devoured by hate and the lust for vengeance, devoting herself and all her resources to a ruthless war against the Moslem, slaying her hundreds and thousands of the enemy, and all but unsexing herself to do it, is doubtless in some respects true to life. Plenty of Greek women fought heroically at that crisis for their hearths and homes, though, perhaps, none of them gathered such a vintage as is here set to the credit of Sophia Capsas. The tale of blood may pall upon a fastidious reader; but Mr. Benson has the advantage (for a novel-writer) of being fired by the enthusiasm which he attributes to the Capsina. He hates the Turk with a holy hatred, and counts up the victims of his heroine with manifest satisfaction. Moreover, the Capsina is not always fighting her ship, or rescuing a Greek village from a Moslem raid. Part of her time she is more or less consciously making love to her second-in-command, the "some one from the sea" to whom she had pledged herself by anticipation. This is Little Mitsos, the sunny young giant who had burnt the Turkish ship from Kalamata. She took him on board at Nauplia, and, not knowing that he was married, let her heart go out to him, and so determined the tragedy of her life, which, with such a nature, and at such a time, was in one form or another inevitable.

In short, this is a pathetic as well as an exciting romance, and Mr. Benson has added to his claims on the gratitude of the reader of novels. His ideas are elevated and his writing is picturesque; none the less so because he cannot be said to aim at the grand style. He delights in strange vocables. A building is "tottery"; troops are "plunderous"; one of his characters admits that he is "disquiet"; another looks "puzzledly." Mr. Benson does not even shun the use of an absolute phrase with its participle in grammatical agreement with the subject. "Forcing him along, the girth snapped" is not meant to imply that the girth was forcing the animal. But to tell a good story and to write impeccable English are faculties not invariably combined in one and the same person.

THE DAUGHTERS OF BABYLON (Macqueen, 6s.) is the latest example of a comparatively modern form of literary enterprise. Popular novels have been dramatized from the days of Scott downwards, to go no further back; it has been reserved for our own generation to try the effect of "novelizing" popular dramas. Of this invention Mr. Wilson Barrett is, if not the patentee, an early exploiter. Having brought the playgoing public in large numbers to see that ingenious compost of romance and religiosity, The Sign of the Cross, the dexterous author-actor presented it, in book form, to the reading public, by whom, it is understood, it was favourably received. In repeating this experiment with the less popular "Daughters of Babylon" Mr. Barrett has deemed it advisable to enlist the services of a collaborator; and the selection made by him is in itself a testimony to his skill as a purveyor of popular entertainments. No combination could have seemed more likely to "draw" than one which associates the name and record of Mr. Wilson Barrett with those of Mr. Robert Hichens. Collaboration has always been a mystery to the uninitiated, and a mystery deepened by the fact that collaborations vary indefinitely with the character of the work and the differing aptitudes of the workers. In the present case, however, we are not left without what looks like distinct—though, of course, it may be really delusive—guidance. It is natural, that is to say, for a reader to assume that the dialogue is, as, of course, the plot is known to be, the work of Mr. Barrett, and that Mr. Hichens has been engaged—like that sculptor's "ghost," who was conjured up, and with difficulty exorcised, in a certain cause célèbre some years ago—to "invest" the play "with artistic merit" as literature. Roughly speaking, no doubt, this does represent the division of labour, but it will not do to press the theory too far, for the descriptive and narrative passages are not, at least to our thinking, quite such genuine Hichens as the sentiment and conversations are characteristic Barrett. The former read rather like excerpts from "The Imaginative Man" retouched by the scene-painter's brush; while occasional dashes of modern realism break the flow of historical word-painting with a somewhat comical shock. On the other hand the story adheres more consistently to the Barrettian type, which is that of the penny novelette adapted to the Sunday reading of serious families of the lower middle-class; while the dialogue, if we except a few inadvertent borrowings from the vocabulary and style of the contemporary newspaper, achieves local colour by a liberal infusion of Biblical phraseology into the ordinary dialect of Wardour-street. Let it in fairness be added that the mixture is artfully compounded and quite adequately serves its purpose. Only the natural division of labour between the two authors is obvious enough to disappoint those who may have hoped that their partnership would yield results as curious as might have been expected to follow from a collaboration between, say, Edgar Poe and Eliza Cook.

Obituary.

SIR JULIUS VOGEL, who died last Sunday, was best known and did his best work in politics; but he also ranks, with Mr. B. L. Farjeon and Mr. H. B. Marriott Watson, among the few men of letters who have come from the colony of New Zealand. Born in 1836, in London, he studied at the School of Mines in order to qualify himself for the pursuit of the precious metals in Australia, but the cacoethes scribendi proved an even stronger passion with him than the auri sacra fames. In Victoria he edited the Maryborough and Dunolly Advertiser. Moving to Dunedin, New Zealand, in 1861, he purchased a half share in the Otago Witness, and shortly afterwards founded and edited the Otago Daily Times, the first daily paper in the colony. His sub-editor, who afterwards became his partner, was, it is interesting to note, Mr. Farjeon, the novelist. Like the majority of Australasian journalists, he entered upon a political career, and held several high offices which need not be here enumerated. In 1887, on the defeat of the Stout-Vogel Administration, in which he held several offices simultaneously, he returned to England. In 1888 he published a novel, entitled "Anno Domini, 2000," which had a certain, though not a startling, success. He was also known as a contributor to the reviews, mainly on the subject of Imperial federation of which he was one of the earliest advocates. What is known in England of New Zealand politics was, until the publication of "The Long White Cloud," mainly due to his expositions. Sir Julius Vogel leaves a son who has made a reputation in New Zealand as a poet.

DR. CHARLES EDWARD DRURY FORTNUM, whose death in his 80th year was announced last week, began his literary work by cataloguing the Majolica and bronzes at the South Kensington Museum. But he also published, as recently as 1896, a large octavo volume entitled "Majolica: A Historical Treatise," followed by a Descriptive Catalogue of Majolica, reviewed in our columns on May 21, 1898. In his earlier days Mr. Fortnum had pursued examples of the various Italian fabriques across Europe, and his books treated, authoritatively and exhaustively, of the ceramics of the Renaissance, and their sequents, including, as well as Majolica, the Persian, Damascus, Rhodian, Hispano-Moresque, French, and other wares. He was not only a diligent collector, but also a generous benefactor of the public collections of his country. The British Museum is indebted to him for a collection of insects, birds, and reptiles made in Australia, and the University of Oxford for a collection of classical and Renaissance works of art, as well as for an endowment of £15,000 for the Ashmolean Museum.

Our Paris Correspondent writes:—

A telegram from Lunéville on Tuesday night brought to the boulevards the news of the death of the novelist ECKMANN, the associate of his compatriot Chatrian, who had died some nine years ago. The extraordinary pact between these two writers had, however, been broken before death came to render the separation irrevocable. In 1889 the two friends quarrelled, no one seems to know exactly why or how, and a year later Chatrian died broken-hearted, while Eckmann lived on nine years longer suffering constant regret, it is said, at the painful memory of having let his old friend die without "making it up" with him. The companionship had dated from 1848. It is difficult to determine what each owed to the other, for the two temperaments blended marvellously, seeming both to be the natural product of the Alsatian soil and the fine flower of the rich part of that little ducal province. They were, both of them, just the opposite of what M. Barrès means by déracinées, and they conquered for French literature a fresh domain. Their most characteristic works were, no doubt, "L'Ami Fritz" and the "Deux Frères," for here they were absolutely themselves, racy of the soil, historians of their province, the creators of types which the "Ile de France" could not parallel. But the series of "Romans Nationaux"—"Le Fou Yérof, épisode de l'Invasion," "Mme. Therese ou les Volontaires de '92," "L'histoire d'un Conscrit de 1813," and "Waterloo"—attained an even wider fame. Their "Histoire d'un Paysan" attests the reality of their devotion to liberty as the outcome of the Revolution. Erckmann wrote more or less alone after his friend's death. Only recently the Temps had published short stories by him. But his voice seemed to come up out of the past; it had the strange muffled quality of a friend's familiar accents heard through a telephone. It is to be hoped that the authors of the "Deux Frères" have now at last "made it up."

THE CONSOLATIONS OF TRUTH.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—It is a good deal to admit, as Professor Case does, that "to know the truth is usually satisfactory." I think it ought always to be so—that is to say, to know the whole truth on any subject, for truth with some material point left out is truth in great part hidden. But not to extend the present controversy too far, I will ask your readers simply to consider the instances brought forward by Professor Case himself in opposition to my view. Truth, he insists, is not always satisfactory; and thereupon he gives a set of five examples, in every one of which the thing that is unsatisfactory is not truth but error! "It is not satisfactory," he says, "to know that you are in momentary danger of shipwreck"—quite true; but you wouldn't be unless "some one had blundered"—"or that you are in a railway accident"—but how came that about, except through error?—"or that you are sliding down a mountain, with a precipice beneath"—due to error again—"or that you have just taken poison instead of medicine"—a most serious error—"or, if you are a murderer, that the jury has found you guilty, and the Judge is putting on the black cap." That last is but the consequence of very malignant error; and yet even the unhappy criminal is not beyond the reach of "the consolations of truth," if he look his own acts in the face and prepare to expiate them with a feeling that the errors of his life were far worse than their expiation. There have certainly been criminals who have felt this.

In short, Sir, I hold that truth ought always to be satisfactory, except where we ourselves have unhappily neglected it, or failed to find it until it was too late. For truth in itself is always wholesome, if we could but take it rightly.

I remain, Sir,

Faithfully yours,

Pinner, 11th March.

NONCONFORMITY IN FICTION.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—May I be permitted to say a few words with reference to the excellent article on "Nonconformity in Fiction" in the last number of Literature? I do not wish to touch on the main point—i.e., whether "Dissent in imaginative literature generally is normally treated with dislike and contempt," but only on the side issue of Dickens' attitude towards ministers of religion. I would submit that, by portraying two extremely repellent specimens of the Nonconformist minister, Dickens no more lays himself open to the charge of implying that those two specimens are typical of the whole class than Charles Reade, who, in his novel, "Never too late to Mend," drew a picture of a ruffianly governor of a goal, need be credited with the opinion that all governors of goals are brutal.

It would be hard, indeed, if every novelist who depicts a bad or ridiculous man or woman should be held to have thereby insulted a whole class. You reply to the question:—"Is there a decent portrait of a clergyman or minister in Dickens?" with two examples, one from "Pickwick" and one from "Our Mutual Friend." May I add one from "The Mystery of Edwin Drood"—Mr. Crisparkle, Minor Canon of Cloisterham, a capital embodiment of that school of "muscular Christianity," which we are supposed, rightly or wrongly, to owe to the influence of Charles Kingsley?

I am, Sir,

Yours faithfully,

F. M. RAMSAY.

AN AMATEUR HERALD.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—As an amateur herald of many years' standing may I enter a vigorous protest against the point of view your critic takes in his review of "The Right to Bear Arms, by X."; and, as I have a perfect legal claim to arms myself, I cannot be suspected of a personal interest in supporting the claims of people whose right is more shadowy than my own?

In the first place, there is no necessity to prove a claim to arms in order to use them, it having been ruled in a Court of law many years ago that any man has the right to adopt any heraldic device he likes, and that after using it for a certain time it becomes bona fide his own.

Secondly, I have it on the authority of the greatest living Herald that grants of arms were not recorded in the Heralds' College from the time of the foundation of the College until the Commonwealth. That is to say, thousands of grants of arms were made during a period of a century and a half, no record of which has been kept by the authorities. As a matter of fact, almost every family in England has the old-fashioned legal right to bear arms if they could prove it. The Heralds' College (very properly) will not recognize this right unless a perfect claim is made out; but it is slightly absurd on the strength of this fact to brand every man as an impostor who may not be able to produce Heralds' College proof of the arms he, and very likely his ancestors for centuries, have used, and to which his claim in the eyes of commonsense may surpass that of many of our proudest nobles. Thousands of our best families (from the heraldic point of view) have pedigrees which, owing to some little flaw in the records which time or carelessness has made, are defective. Any number of families, including quite six of our old historic nobility, are bearing arms, with the full consent of the Heralds' College, to which they have no moral right at all. For the Heralds of old time were often venal fellows, and overlooked and buried many skeletons. As a matter of fact, the using of arms nowadays is simply a matter of conscience. No man who respects himself would wilfully use arms to which he knows he has no claim. Every man who is created a Peer or a Baronet must either prove his claim or take out a new grant. But to condemn a man, as so many of the foolish and snobbish works on Heraldry with which the press has teemed for the last few years, do, for using arms to which his title is imperfect, is about as sensible as to condemn him for holding landed property in the deeds of which there is, possibly ages back, some slight flaw. Surely the onus of proof in such cases, in the eyes of charity and commonsense, lies not with those who use the arms but rather with those who would question their right to do so?

Heraldry is a charming, romantic, and picturesque way of differencing one family from another, and this in the present day is all the use it has.

I remain, Sir, yours faithfully,
March 11, 1899. Y. Z.

[. The above letter does not, we think, call for any lengthy reply, since it is evidently written under a misapprehension as to the nature of the book which formed the subject of the review. Moreover, almost every direct statement in the letter is incorrect. Grants of arms, prior to the Commonwealth, were recorded in the Herald's College; no man who is created a Peer must prove his right to arms or take a new grant—he can do so or not, exactly as he pleases—while the statement that a man may legally appropriate the arms of another person, and, after using them for “a certain time”—which our correspondent, by-the-by, does not specify—acquire a bona fide right thereto, is not only incorrect, but, from the point of view of “charity and commonsense,” slightly absurd. In the book under consideration, no single person is either branded as an impostor or even held up to ridicule. It claims to be merely an attempt to prove—for what it may be worth, and for the information of those who desire to know—that the ultimate authority in all these matters is the Crown; and that it is a successful attempt to do so is certainly our opinion.]

THE REVIEWING OF NOVELS.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—In reference to the recent protest of a member of the Society of Authors against the custom of “those reviewers who tell the whole story of a book when criticizing it,” the method is by no means modern. A strong appeal on the subject was made by Wilkie Collins in his preface to “The Woman in White,” on the occasion of the publication of his fascinating story in book form. This appeal puts the case so tersely and so forcibly that it may be of interest at the present moment. The preface is dated “Harley-street, London, August 3, 1860.”

Before I conclude, I am desirous of addressing one or two questions, of the most harmless and innocent kind, to the Critics.

In the event of this book being reviewed, I venture to ask whether it is possible to praise the writer, or to blame him, without opening the proceedings by telling his story at second-hand? As that story is written by me—with the inevitable suppressions which the periodical system of publication forces on the novelist—the telling it fills more than a thousand closely-printed pages. No small portion of this space is occupied by hundreds of little “connecting links,” of trifling value in themselves but of the utmost importance in maintaining the smoothness, the reality, and the probability of the entire narrative. If the critic tells the story with these, can he do it in his allotted page, or column, as the case may be? If he tells it without these, is he doing a fellow-labourer in another form of Art the justice which writers owe one to another? And lastly, if he tells it at all, in any way whatever, is he doing a service to the reader by destroying, beforehand, two main elements in the attraction of all stories—the interest of curiosity, and the excitement of surprise?

Yours faithfully,

AUSTIN BRERETON.

AN EXPLANATION.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—I have been asked by Mr. Alfred E. T. Watson to explain that a volume of collected pieces published by me last autumn under the title of “Huntingcrop Hall” and other stories, by Alfred E. T. Watson and other sporting writers, and lettered outside “Huntingcrop Hall, A. E. T. Watson,” was not prepared nor edited by that gentleman and that he had nothing to do with the publication.

The two stories by Mr. Watson included in the volume were republished from “London Society,” of 1872, by arrangement made by me with Mr. James Hogg, the proprietor of the copyrights, and not by permission of Mr. Watson, the writer of the stories.

GEORGE REDWAY.

Authors and Publishers.

There is nothing very striking in the publishers' announcements for the rest of the spring publishing season. More than half the books that will make up the season's output are already in the hands of the public. Among the biographies to come are those of William Morris (Longmans); Sir J. E. Millais (Methuen); John, Marquis of Granby, Commander-in-Chief (Macmillan); the late Duchess of Teck (Murray); Sir Philip Sidney and the Sidney Family (Unwin); Signor Crispi, by Mr. W. J. Stillman (Grant Richards); George Müller of Bristol, (Nisbet); the late Empress of Austria and the King of Roumania (Hutchinson). Autobiography and “recollections” seem to be exhausted—every one who has anything worth recollecting has recollecting it already. Mr. Justin McCarthy is an exception, however, and his “Reminiscences” (Chatto & Windus) ought to be an interesting couple of volumes.

There seem to be as many novels as usual, but the autumn lists may show a decrease—they probably will. The publishers seem determined to go in for cheap fiction, and cheap fiction means large sales. There is more likely to be a large sale of a book that is already popular than for a new story, even by a fairly prospering writer, and publishers are not under any illusions on this point. So it looks as if the latest development would carry further the effect of the abolition of three volumes. The very few authors who can count upon selling a large number of copies will do better. The many who have just found it worth while to write will do worse. For the moment the outlook to the many is not cheerful, but, perhaps, their turn will come again later on.

An American book of which the manuscript has just reached England is “The Choate Jest Book,” by Mr. Will. M. Clemens, who is, we understand, a relative of that other Clemens who is better known as Mark Twain. It contains an account of the life of the Hon. Joseph Hodges Choate, U.S. Ambassador to the Court of St. James', together with a collection of new quips and cranks designed to make the name of “Joe Choate” as famous as that of the other illustrious “Joe”—Joe Miller. The book will be published in England, in April, by Messrs. Sands.

The author of “Studies in Little Known Subjects,” Miss Constance E. Plumptre, is editing an edition of that very rare work “The Tragedy,” by Bernadus Ochino, for Mr. Grant Richards, who intends to bring out a reprint of the play, probably during the autumn. Like the Book of Job, Milton's “Paradise Lost,” and Goethe's “Faust,” this book is one of the finer dramas suggested by the problem of evil. Superstition is the keynote of Ochino's “Tragedy.” The only modern work dealing at any length with this drama seems to be Karl Benrath's “Life of Ochino.” Dr. Garnett in his “Life of Milton” has drawn attention to the parallelism between the “Tragedy” and “Paradise Lost.” In an article on the subject published about a year ago, Miss Plumptre closed her paper by saying:—“As a terrible indictment against the wickedness of Papacy in the sixteenth century, written by one who was for years in the closest communion with it, it is, I think, without parallel. . . . Written, as it is, strictly from the Protestant and orthodox point of view, it might fitly form a companion volume to other books of the same tendency and written about the same period—such, for instance, as Luther's ‘Table Talk.’”

Messrs. Macmillan are about to issue a new work by Major G. J. Younghusband, the author of “On Short Leave to Japan,” and joint author of “The Relief of Chitral.” It will be entitled “The Philippines and Round About,” and will give some account of British interests in these waters.

“The Cipher in the Plays and on the Tombstone” is to be the title of Mr. Ignatius Donnelly's new book now in the press. Mr. Donnelly hopes that this work will finally settle the controvery as to the authorship of the so-called Shakespeare Plays. Having disposed of them, Mr. Donnelly will publish about three months later another book entitled "The Cipher in the Ben Jonson Plays," in which he will show that the Jonson Plays were also written by Francis Bacon, and which will contain a cipher-narrative setting forth that fact. The author is so confident of the success of these books that he will print them at his own expense and retain the copyright, both in America and England.

Lord Overton is to contribute an introduction to Dr. Elmslie's work "Among the Wild Ngoni" which recounts the experiences of a medical missionary in Livingstonia. This volume will be published by Messrs. Oliphant, Anderson, and Ferrier this spring. A second book on somewhat the same subject will also be published by Messrs. Oliphant—viz., the second volume of Dr. Dennis' "Christian Missions and Social Progress," the first volume of which was published in 1897. It was originally intended that the book should be complete in two volumes, but the material has proved so abundant that it will be extended to three.

We understand that Mr. Budgett Meakin, who was fifteen years in Morocco, will publish three volumes on the Moors, through Messrs. Sonnenschein—"The Moorish Empire," "The Moors," and "The Land of the Moors." The first is to be issued next month.

Mr. Barry Pain is publishing, through Mr. John Lane, a selection of the amusing verses he has contributed for a long time past to the Daily Chronicle on Saturday mornings, in the character of Tompkins. They were so neatly attuned to the feelings of the moment that it is almost a pity to re-publish them. But everything is republished now. Mr. Clarence Rook is also bringing out in a book (with Mr. Grant Richards) the series of Hooligan sketches which appeared recently in the same journal, and which are founded on a close acquaintanceship with Hooligans. These will be called "The Hooligan Nights," and will set forth "the life and opinions of a young and unrepentant criminal." As studies in juvenile callousness and depravity they have much grim humour.

Mr. R. A. M. Stevenson, whose forthcoming work on the art of Velasquez we have already mentioned, will write the introduction to a volume published in the autumn by Messrs. T. R. Annan and Sons, of Glasgow, containing sixty or seventy photographs of the best among Sir Henry Raeburn's pictures. There will be biographical notes on each picture by Mr. J. L. Caw, Curator of the Scottish National Portrait Gallery.

Mr. Henry Clifton Sorby, who has written largely on microscopical structures of crystals indicating the origin of minerals and rocks, has of late carried out many inquiries as to the preparation of specimens of marine animals for museum purposes, which will be communicated to the Linnean Society. Another paper of interest which Mr. Sorby has in hand is on the production of artificial pseudomorphs of minerals and on the effects of long continued weak chemical reactions on minerals and rocks. Some of these experiments have been carried on continuously for 37 years with interesting results.

Messrs. Macmillan will publish shortly after Easter a complete edition of Tennyson's poetical works (exclusive of the dramas) in their well-known Globe Library at three shillings and sixpence, the cheapest complete Tennyson that has ever been offered to the public.

The Scottish History Society will publish shortly an important volume to be entitled "Scotland and the Protectorate." It has been edited by Mr. C. H. Firth, and is in continuation of Mr. Firth's "Scotland and the Commonwealth"—a collection of letters and papers relating to the military government of Scotland from August, 1651, to December, 1653, which was published by the Scottish History Society in 1896.

The papers in that collection were derived from four sources—the bulk from the Clarke collection now in the library of Worcester College, Oxford, a few from the Tanner MSS. in the Bodleian Library, some from the Leith Mercurius Scoticus, and others from the Clarendon collection in the Bodleian Library. Those in the volume about to be issued are from the Clarke and Clarendon collections, and will complete the subject of the military occupation of Scotland during the time of Cromwell.

The American Historical Association held its fourteenth annual meeting at New Haven, Conn., December 28, 29, and 30. The association virtually adopted the American Historical Review, agreeing to send it to all its members, and to make in return a large subvention to the Review. A Bibliographical Committee was formed to deal with such portion of the publications of the association as are bibliographical in their character. The report of the Committee of Seven on the teaching of history in secondary schools was laid before the association in elaborate form, and is to be printed as a separate book this spring. The association appointed a committee on the historical study of colonial dependencies.

Mr. Alfred Lubbock is preparing a volume of "Memories of Eton and Etonians," dealing mainly with cricket and sport. Mr. Lubbock was captain of the Eton eleven in 1863.

"The Church's Message to Men," a volume of sermons by the Archbishop of Canterbury, Canon Gore, Dean Hole, and others will be published by Messrs. Skeffington.

Canon Girdlestone is about to issue a new translation of Deuteronomy; with notes on the peculiar words and the references to the earlier and later Books printed in full, so as to assist the student in determining its true position.

The new edition of the "Babylonian Talmud in English," by Dr. Michael L. Rodkinson, is to be published in about twenty volumes, at the rate of four volumes per year. Five volumes are now ready. There will also be a carefully-prepared edition of the Hebrew text by the same author.

Edward FitzGerald's "Rubaiyat" is to be added to the Golden Treasury Series of Messrs. Macmillan.

The April number of the American Historical Review will contain an article by Professor W. M. Sloane on Napoleon's plans for French colonies in Spanish America, and one by Professor George L. Burr, of Cornell University, on the search for the Venezuela-Guiana boundary. Professor Burr was the leading historical expert employed in that search by the United States Commission.

With the March number, the Annals of Botany begins its thirteenth volume and the thirteenth year of its existence. It is a matter of congratulation for the science of botany in English-speaking countries that a periodical of this character, unlike so many of its predecessors, should have survived so long, with every prospect, under the editorship of Professor Sydney H. Vines, of becoming a permanent institution.

The originators of a new journal called the Conference of Contemporary Thought, to be published in January, 1900, in England and America by Messrs. Macmillan, have conceived an attack upon knowledge in a highly strategic spirit. Four essays by specialists, on each of twelve departments of knowledge, ranging from fine art to geography, will appear in a year. The casual reader might expect that each month would see an essay on each department dealt with. But in two months of the year the journal will not be issued; and some feeling of anxiety will be aroused by the statement that "when some of the regular essays cannot be secured in time for a certain month's issue extra material will be substituted." At the end of the year the forty-eight essays accumulated will be divided into twelve volumes, and the professors will then recommence their attack. Will the essayists or the departments of knowledge hold out the longer? At any rate the prospectus is a capital essay in mathematics. The American members of the advisory board consist almost entirely of professors from the universities.

Mr. J. W. Mackail, whose "Life of William Morris" is announced, is a Newdigate prize-man and a former Fellow of Balliol, now in the Education of Office. His literary work, which includes his "Select Epigrams from the Greek Anthology," with a valuable introduction, shows much sympathetic appreciation of poets so different as Virgil and Mæterlinck.

The doyen of all South Sea mariners and explorers—Captain Roger Turpie—has returned to England after thirty-eight years' continuous service as mate and master of the London Missionary Society's four successive ships. He is the one man competent to tell a thrilling story of a life in the South Seas, and may yet give the world the story of his adventurous and honourable career. The field, as we know, is already occupied by Mr. Louis Becke, of whose writings Captain Turpie has a high opinion. No one, he thinks, ever has depicted or will again depict South Sea life so vividly and accurately.

The Revue de Paris has commenced "Notes sur la Vie," by Alphonse Daudet. These notes were jotted down by the great novelist from day to day, and would probably have been used by him in his future works had his life been spared.

M. Pierre Loti has changed his plans. He had arranged to go to Persia, but, being reinstated in his active functions as lieutenant, he now awaits orders and will pass the time at Hendaye. He is said to be engaged on a volume, the subject of which is "Ile de Pâques," a small island in the Pacific Ocean, which was discovered in 1686 by Davis, and explored on a certain Easter day, 1722, by Roggervœen. Some twenty-five years ago M. Pierre Loti happened to stop there on one of his voyages, and was struck by the intelligence and originality of the inhabitants.

Messrs. Methuen will probably begin to issue their sixpenny series of novels next week with a book by Mr. E. W. Hornung.

"The Drones Must Die," Dr. Max Nordau's new novel, will be published by Mr. Heinemann this month.

"The Countess Tekla" is being dramatised by its author, Mr. Robert Barr, in collaboration with Mr. Cosmo Hamilton.

Next week Mr. Percy White's new novel, "A Millionaire's Daughter," will be published by Messrs. Pearson, who are also issuing "Spies of the Wight," by Mr. Headon Hill, who lives in the island, and knows its history.

THE DECADENCE OF MAGAZINES.

On the festive occasion of the one thousandth appearance of Blackwood we indulged in a certain retrospective survey of the history of magazines. There remains, however, one aspect of the question to which it might have seemed cynical to refer upon a birthday, but which, nevertheless, invites consideration. This is the lowering of the literary standard of magazines which—though Blackwood is the last periodical to be cited in illustration of it—has long been noticeable and has been particularly conspicuous in the course of the last ten years. The original intention—the final cause, as one might say—of the issue of the early magazines was well defined in the prospectus of one of the earliest of them. "A Repository for the Occasional Productions of Men of Genius" was the polished phrase in which the editor expounded his ideal; and it was an ideal from which, until quite recently, no editor deliberately departed. On the contrary, almost every editor loved the highest when he saw it—and not only loved it, but sent it to the printer, and asked the author of it for more. Examples abound. The Edinburgh was the Repository of the Occasional Productions of Macaulay; Fraser's, of those of Carlyle; Blackwood, of those of more Men of Genius than we have space to mention; the early Cornhill, of those of Thackeray; the later Cornhill, of those of R. L. Stevenson; Macmillan—to come as near modern times as one can—of those of Mr. Rudyard Kipling in the days when his genius was as yet his only passport to editorial favour. It is a goodly list, and one which any one with a good memory can easily extend. Studying it—and remembering that most of the celebrities whom it commemorates were not yet celebrated in the days when they did their best magazine work—one sees clearly that the chief ambition of the early magazine editor was to be "literary." Turning over the back pages of any magazine that made a stir before (let us say) the 'eighties one also perceives that he generally achieved his purpose.

No one can affirm that to be "literary" is the chief object of the average magazine editor of the present day. He has ceased to be literary—indeed, he has long ceased to be so, for, with the single exception of Longman's, we doubt whether there is any still surviving magazine which has been started since 1880 on the old literary lines. The rest have given themselves over to ideals with which literature (as distinguished from mere prose composition) has nothing whatever to do. What are these ideals? They vary, of course, according to the price of the magazines, and the nature of the public to which they are addressed; but it is not very difficult to classify them. To begin with, there is the pursuit of the notable name. This may not be so bad in England as in America, where, it is said, a man has only to fall off a ladder and break his leg in order to be solicited to send short stories from his sick-bed to the yellow press; but it is not a phenomenon with which any of us can pretend to be unfamiliar. The name that is notable in letters may take its turn with the names that are notable in other departments of endeavour; but there are no indications that it is preferred to them. On the contrary, in the modern magazine of this class an essay by an essayist or a poem by a poet would always be held over to make room for the special pleadings of a faddist, or the commonplaces of a titled co-respondent, or a professional strong man, or any one else whose name is continually in the papers. That there is a certain interest in this sort of raree-show we are not prepared to deny. But it and the literary magazine, as the editors of the past understood it, are wide as the poles asunder.

Next to the editor whose ideal magazine is a rareeshow comes his rival whose ideal is a bundle of pamphlets on topics of the day. There is, of course, no reason why the topics of the day should not be treated in pamphlets, or why a number of pamphlets should not be bound up together, every month, and sold for half-a-crown. The practice supplies a felt want, and there is little more to be said about it. We merely note that the magazines—which the reader will easily identify—produced to meet that want have about as much to do with literature as have the Blue-books and White-papers; and we pass on to consider the most glaring of all the instances of the decadence of magazines.

This is furnished by those sixpenny and threepenny illustrated periodicals which, since the price of paper has fallen, and photography has been improved and popularized, and the ignorant have learnt to read, have figured in such huge piles upon the bookstalls. In these—the most widely circulated of all the magazines—that old ideal of “the Repository for the Occasional Productions of Men of Genius” is thrown over deliberately and openly. The editors of some of them have, indeed, announced quite frankly (to interviewers) that they have no use for the services of men of genius; and it is certainly difficult to imagine the man of genius bringing himself to provide them with the sort of thing that they require. They want short stories, of course, but not the sort of short stories that make the reader think. Such stories are rejected on the ground that they are “too literary”; whereas short stories about detectives, bank robberies, matrimonial advertisements, breach of promise cases are sure of “early and sympathetic” consideration. As for the miscellaneous articles which fill the bulk of the paper, their case is even sadder. Sometimes these contributions are merely fatuous—a set of photographs, for example, of a bullet in motion, or of a drop of falling water. More frequently they pander to a feeling of curiosity which is at once ridiculous and impertinent; and it is in this respect that the decline of magazines has been most rapid and most remarkable. It began with the “illustrated interview,” enabling any one with sixpence in his pocket to take a peep at “a corner of the drawing-room” of a bishop, a lady of fashion, or an actress. Nowadays, the illustrated interview has been left far behind. We have come to articles on Notable Noses, and on the Visiting Cards of Celebrities; and, as we lately mentioned, pudding basins full of gelatinous matter are, at the present hour, going about the country collecting impressions of the soles of the feet of eminent literary men. And this for a publication ostensibly of the same kind as those which used to serve as repositories for the occasional productions of Thackeray, Carlyle, and Robert Louis Stevenson!

It would be unfair, of course, to throw all the blame for this sort of thing upon the editors. They are men of business, and they are not editing magazines, as the Americans put it, “for their health.” A good many of them, we imagine, edit with their tongues in their cheeks. The circulation is “the thing” with them, as the verdict was the thing in the view of Daniel O’Connell; and it is easy to understand the line of argument which guides them in the course which they pursue. It is just possible, they doubtless reason, that a cultivated reader may take a passing interest—albeit a scornful one—in a paper on notable noses; he may beguile a railway journey, if not by deriding the notable noses submitted to his criticism, at least by deriding the editor for supposing that any man, woman, or child could be attracted by such a subject. On the other hand, the uncultivated man, who will examine the collection of noses as carefully as the cultivated man would examine a collection of cameos, would certainly feel no emotion but that of boredom in the presence of a witty or thoughtful paper on some topic with which his evening paper has not familiarised him. So, the greatest happiness of the greatest number being consulted, the article on notable noses is found the most suitable from every point of view. Such, we feel sure, is the working of an intelligent magazine editor’s mind; and it is not very easy to find a flaw in his ratiocination. Some day, when the spread of education is more marked, and more of the people who have lately learnt to read have also learnt to think, he may find it worth while to change his plans and raise his standards. But we are not very sanguine about this; and expect to see the decadence of the magazines go a good deal further before the tide sets definitely in the opposite direction.

It is often said that, what with the penny post and other changes which nowadays force the pace of life, the age of letter writing is past. It certainly seems less natural to throw a story into the form of correspondence than it was in the days of Richardson; nor did Scott’s readers seventy years later see anything out of the way in Miss Julia Mannering’s voluminous letters to her bosom friend. But a very few years after the publication of “Guy Mannering” came the penny post, and since that time authors who adopt the epistolary form in novels or elsewhere do it at their peril, especially if letters occupy the whole book. Mrs. Craik did this with some success in “A Life for a Life,” and two well-known writers have not shrunk from the endeavour in a collaborated work of fiction shortly to appear, while a remarkable book which we notice in another page, called “A Reported Change in Religion,” consists of a batch of letters which make excellent reading. But then here no two letters are from the same person; they represent a great variety of people writing on a common subject, and each letter exhausts, sometimes briefly enough, what the writer has to say on it.

But if fictitious letters are so seldom anything but tiresome, is this because “the age of letter writing is past”? And is it past? The biographies and memoirs which have poured from the press in recent years do not point to any such conclusion. To take one instance only, look at the prolix and exhaustive disquisitions sent through the post by that most hardworking of all public men, the late Lord Selborne. There were real letter writers in the last century, many of whom won (and in some cases sought) fame by their practice of the art of correspondence; and there are real letter writers still—only the millions who now scribble off countless notes and post-cards did not, and perhaps could not, write at all in the old days.

The unpopularity of the epistolary form as a method of authorship is, in fact, due quite as much to a change of taste as to the decay of letter writing. The old practice was of a piece with the unrealities of the eighteenth century, both in art and letters. It necessitated an abundance of superfluous detail, and it was a roundabout, artificial way of doing what the true artist could do much better simply and directly. It gave, of course, an opportunity of exhibiting subjectively many "fine shades" of feeling. But it is certainly much more difficult to carry conviction in inventing letters for fictitious people than in making them converse. In the latter case there is a background; there is the life and movement of the various characters, the spontaneity of question and reply, and the running interchange of talk, all helping to keep a spell upon the reader. The letter gives much less chance of illusion, and we may very soon become conscious of the author—instead of the supposed correspondent—beating his brains for something to say next.

The best method of Subject Indexing in Public Libraries, which Mr. Cotgreave, of the West Ham Library, discusses in another column, bears closely on another vexed question among Librarians, that of "Free Access" or "Open Shelves." It is a pretty controversy, with the theorist on the one side and the practical man on the other; and it is the more attractive to an onlooker because neither party to it has any pecuniary axe to grind. Indeed, it seems to us a pity that the adherents of the Free Access plan should be charged with a desire to avoid the trouble of perfecting their catalogues, or to be able to favour particular readers—"especially those of the opposite sex," as one controversialist adds unkindly. For there is much to be said on behalf of "open access," as may be seen by any one who reads a very sensibly written little pamphlet just issued by the Librarians in charge of libraries where the system prevails.

How often, in requisitioning a book at the British Museum, has one made a mistake from being able only to see the title of it, and how one would like to forage at will among the endless shelves to which only the attendants and their superiors have free access! But "open access" at the British Museum presents of course exceptional difficulties which need not be felt in the case of local Free Libraries. This pamphlet urges that there is not very much importance to be attached to the common objections of wear and tear, misplacement of books when returned, and possible thieving, provided certain details of arrangement are observed. One main attraction of the "open access" system is its possible educative value both to the public who frequent the libraries and to those who superintend them. Free access to shelves, where the books are properly classified, should increase the general knowledge of literature, teach the best way to use books for reference or research, and so instil into the public mind a higher idea of their value; while the library assistant, instead of spending his time in fetching some book which a reader has ordered—possibly under a mistake as to its contents—can exercise his intelligence in guiding the reader to take down the right book for himself.

Unfortunately it is found in practice that the average frequenter of a free library, when let loose among the shelves, spends his time in a perfectly aimless manner, wearing out and dirtying a great number of books for the sake of looking at the pictures, putting them back on the wrong shelf, and sometimes thoughtfully placing a work he would like to possess in the inside pocket of his coat; also that the assistant spends his valuable time in literary or other gossip. And despite the faith in the system shown by the authors of our pamphlet, there is no doubt that the great majority of experienced librarians have come to the conclusion that the difficulties of storage and of machinery which the system involves far counterbalance its advantages, at any rate in all but small libraries. One thing is certain, that the more guidance and information there is to be derived from the library catalogue, the less will readers miss the advantages of "free access."

The Chicago Dial has good hopes for the future of literature, with which it consoles American booksellers. They, too, like their English brethren, complain that they are being crushed out of existence by publishers who push the sale of their own books on one side and by the large shopkeepers who sell everything, books included, on the other. The Dial thinks the booksellers are behind the times. They have not yet realized the "increasing importance of books as a part of household furnishings." This increase will go on until "reading matter will be as staple a commodity as groceries, and as necessary for the daily needs," until the retail trade in books is as sure of customers as the retail trade in eggs and poultry. The former commodity is, we believe, divided in the trade into New Laid Eggs, Fresh Eggs, and "Eggs." We only hope that the housekeeper of the future, when the bookseller's cart comes round in the morning, will be able to discriminate with equal exactness between the classes of books—good, indifferent, or addled—which she lays in for home consumption.

Reviews.

Francis Turner Palgrave. His Journals and Memories of His Life. By Gwenllian F. Palgrave. 9×6½ in., ix.+276 pp. London, 1899. Longmans. 10/6

Lovers of English poetry are so deeply indebted to the compiler of "The Golden Treasury" that they cannot but be desirous of a nearer view of him than a reserved temperament and an apparent repugnance to many of the modern forms of publicity had ever allowed to the world. Mr. Francis Palgrave's whole career, in fact, was rather a curious example, for these days, of the fallentis semita vitæ. Though he made his mark in literature before middle age, and continued an active worker till his death at the age of seventy-three, and though during that period there was probably no man whose purely literary gift commanded more of the respect, and his literary judgment more of the confidence, of the foremost men of letters of his day, there was no name so seldom on the lips of the crowd. It is true, of course, that Mr. Palgrave never attained the rank of a great poet—that, indeed, he could hardly be said to have been even "in the first flight." But in times when, as was the case during the later years of his life, the appearance of a new poetic star of even the second magnitude has been again and again so noisily acclaimed, the almost total neglect of this accomplished poetic artist by those who profess to instruct the multitude in what to study and to admire is rather ironically illustrative of modern popular culture. In an age of less indiscriminate enthusiasms this might have been pardonable enough. If laurel wreaths were not so inordinately plentiful as they are, and were awarded only on proof of high and rare poetic genius, no doubt Mr. Palgrave would have rightly gone uncrowned. For he was certainly not of the race of poets who are born and not made. His poetry was undeniably much less the gift of nature than the product of cultivation; and even his most successful efforts were wanting alike in the incommunicable touch and in the inevitable word. His claim to distinction—and it was no light one—lay in his almost unerring critical taste, and his exquisite appreciation of all forms of poetic, and, in the wider sense, of literary excellence.

The eldest of four remarkable sons of a remarkable mother—the second of whom, Mr. Gifford Palgrave, deserved a wider fame as a linguist and Oriental savant than he ever achieved—the future Professor of Poetry had the advantage, not always an unmixed one, of the most sedulous maternal training from his earliest infancy. Miss Gwenllian Palgrave, who has edited these Journals of her father and “Memories of his Life,” describes his education—as, no doubt, a daughter should—with a pride untouched by misgiving. But we must confess that, when we hear of Lady Palgrave lamenting the unhappy backwardness of the child of three who “does not make a rapid progress in his book at present,” and “seems unable to understand that the letters are the symbols of the sound,” we are a little too strongly reminded of the childhood of the ill-fated John Stuart Mill. The results, however, of this Blimberian “forcing system” were less visible in Mr. Palgrave’s case. He does not seem, at least, to have at all seriously suffered from having been induced to “take pleasure in learning a few Latin words” at four-and-a-half, and to “consider it a reward to be allowed to commit two or three to memory, after he has spelled and read.” To have altogether escaped the natural consequences of such a training would have been a miracle; and “miracles do not happen.” He always regretted, says his daughter, that his school life did not begin till he was fourteen, “maintaining that early going to school was the only remedy for priggishness—which weakness he admitted in himself.” But the man who can admit this weakness can never have suffered very badly from it; and we read without surprise that he quickly fell into the ways of school-life, and entered with considerable zest into its games. Otherwise, too, he did as well at the Charterhouse as any other clever boy; won his Balliol scholarship, and his Fellowship at another college in the regular course; and, having, after some hesitation on the choice of a profession, decided on entering the Civil Service, he obtained an examinership in the Education Department, and thereby secured the requisite leisure to devote himself to the life-long cultivation of his literary and artistic tastes. The latter, indeed, were almost as strong as the former. His love of art was hereditary on both sides of the house, and he had acquired a just reputation for connoisseurship in pictures even in his undergraduate days. His taste in music, also, is said to have been “pre-eminently classical”; but here the testimony is decidedly more doubtful:—

With a remarkable knowledge and love of music [says Miss Palgrave], it was curious that he could not play a note on the piano, and did not usually distinguish whether others were playing correctly or the reverse. He was fond of playing the violin, and was, fortunately for his own pleasure, quite unconscious of the discordant notes which he produced, the beauty of the air he might be hearing or playing completely carrying him away.

Musicians, we suspect, will have some difficulty in realizing the “beauty” of an air played out of tune, and perhaps, indeed, will smile at the alleged combination of a “remarkable knowledge and love of music” with an inability to distinguish between correct playing or the reverse. We ourselves, at any rate, should certainly have doubted Mr. Palgrave’s fine taste in poetry if he had seen no difference between a line that would scan and one that would not. But the sensibility and accuracy of his ear for music of that description are, fortunately, open to no such suspicion.

The publication of the “Golden Treasury” in 1861, Mr. Palgrave’s thirty-seventh year, was the crowning achievement of his career. His original poetry has gained only, and indeed has only deserved, a succès d’estime, though it would hardly be fair to judge it by Miss Palgrave’s quoted extracts, which, with one or two exceptions, notably the beautiful lines to the memory of his mother, are quite undistinguished; but with this triumph he once for all established his reputation for consummate taste and judgment in the poetic art. There is no need to say much here of this most famous of anthologies; its praises have been sung, its supremacy has remained unchallenged, from that day to this, and the fine critical gift which it attests was again and again displayed in other and minor works of the same kind, such as his Selection from Wordsworth in Moxon’s “Miniature Poets,” his Shakespeare’s “Lyrical Songs and Sonnets,” and, above all, his “Treasury of Sacred Song,” published at Oxford during the first term of his tenure of the Chair of Poetry, in 1889. For the period of nearly forty years, which had to elapse between 1861 and his death in the autumn of the year before last, his life was, for the ardent lover of literature, an ideal one. Removed from the necessity of working under any sort of pressure, he was able to devote himself exclusively and undistractedly to the study of “the best”; he was the close friend and confidant of Tennyson, and on terms of more or less familiar intimacy with Browning, Matthew Arnold, Froude, Gladstone, Jowett, and nearly all the men of light and leading of the mid-century; and until the last few years of his life he enjoyed perfect health and a domestic happiness unbroken by bereavements. His journals should reflect these fortunate conditions, and they do; they abound, as do his excellent letters and the many others from eminent correspondents which accompany them, with interesting reflections upon literature and life; and if they disappoint a little in the extent of their revelations of the man himself, it is only as all such records—save those of the untrustworthy sort which have been written with one eye on the future reader—do and must disappoint.

Moreover, after all, his work speaks not only for itself, but for him, and amply justifies the admirable and, indeed, quite exhaustive appreciation of him by Professor Churton Collins:—

It may be doubted whether, after Arnold, any other critic of our time contributed so much to educate public taste where in this country it most needs such education. . . . He had no taint of vulgarity, of charlatanism, or of insincerity. He never talked or wrote the cant of the cliques or of the multitude. He understood and loved what was excellent, he had no toleration for what was common and second rate; he was not of the crowd. . . . In the best and most comprehensive sense of the term he was a man of classical taste, temper, and culture, and had all the insight and discernment, all the instincts and sympathies, which are the results of such qualifications.

The one notable lapse of critical judgment, the single mistake that is recorded against Mr. Palgrave, of finding supreme excellence in what was—not, indeed, “common and second rate,” but something less than supremely excellent—was in the extraordinary favour shown by him in the Second Series of the “Golden Treasury” to the poetry of the late Mr. O’Shaughnessy. And even here, curiously enough, he had another distinguished critic, Professor Saintsbury, to keep him in countenance.

AMERICAN HISTORY.

A Short History of the United States. By Justin Huntly McCarthy. 8 $\frac{1}{4}$ × 6 in., 320 pp. London, 1899. Hodder & Stoughton. 6/-

The Rise and Growth of American Politics. By Henry Jones Ford. 7 $\frac{3}{4}$ × 5 $\frac{1}{4}$ in., 409 pp., with Index. London, 1899. Macmillan. \$1.50

Though only four hundred years lie between the first voyage of Columbus and the second Presidency of Grover Cleveland, no period of recorded time holds so many events of importance to the history of mankind. A new world was discovered, new colonies were founded, and an experiment in civilized government was made, unparalleled either in classical or in modern times, all within a span of centuries no longer than the gaps which pass unnoticed in our view of the development of ancient Egypt. The two volumes before us might very well be chosen as the beginning of an instruction which it is becoming more and more necessary for every Englishman to secure. In the first, he will learn how his forefathers set foot upon the Western Continent, warred against "the merciless Indian savage," drove out the Spaniard and the Frenchman, and at last set up a country of their own and "severed the political bands" that held them to their motherland. In the second, he may read of the internal developments that followed that severance and final union whose external aspects Mr. McCarthy describes, of caucus and convention, of the town Boss and the State manager, of Tammany, and of the fearsome complications of a Presidential fight, as Mr. Ford has seen it.

Mr. McCarthy is wise to pass as quickly as may be over early colonial days. He soon leads us to that fascinating period, which Sir George Trevelyan has just treated from the English point of view, the misgovernment of the Ministers of King George, and the struggle of the colonists to teach him how to govern. In this, as in every chapter in his book, Mr. McCarthy possesses that quick eye for a picturesque phrase, an illuminating incident, which is invaluable in any brief survey of a momentous crisis. He is wise, for instance, to introduce Patrick Henry with that famous speech of his in the Virginia House of Burgesses, "in which he declared that 'Cæsar had his Brutus, Charles the First his Cromwell, and George the Third ——' (here he was interrupted by loud cries of 'treason.')

As soon as the clamour had died away, Patrick Henry calmly concluded, 'and George the Third may profit by their example. If this be treason, make the most of it.' Again, in his description of the "Embattled Farmers" at Lexington, Mr. McCarthy gives Horace Walpole's apt quotation from "Chevy Chase" as a comment on the serious events at Concord:—

The child as yet unborn shall rue
The hunting of that day.

It is curious that a chronicler, who was writing down on the spot all he saw and heard, Dr. Gordon, records that a boy on Roxbury highroad told the English colonel he was laughing "To think how you will dance by-and-by to Chevy Chase," a sentence so extraordinarily appropriate both to the occasion and to Lord Percy that we are inclined to doubt its transatlantic origin, and join Mr. McCarthy in ascribing its origin to the wit of the English Court. The sad episode of Major André is adequately treated, and the point of the excellence of the Court-martial who sentenced him is well made. La Fayette was one member of it, and Steuben, a staff-officer under Frederick the Great, was another.

A history published some few weeks ago should not have been so careless of contemporary discoveries published in the last year as Mr. McCarthy's account of the famous "Monroe Doctrine" would suggest. "Monroe," he writes, "was determined that the United States should deal with the problem [of European encroachment] alone. He declined Canning's suggestion . . ." and, speaking of the Seventh Annual Message, Mr. McCarthy continues erroneously to observe, "the words were the words of John Quincy Adams; the policy itself was only an amplification of Washington's theory of neutrality." But, as a matter of fact, Mr. McCarthy should know what all serious students of American history know—at least since the September of last year, when the Fortnightly Review published for the first time a letter from Monroe to Jefferson explaining exactly what his "doctrine" really was. Before framing his Message, Monroe had taken the advice both of "the Sage of Monticello," and of Madison. Their whole correspondence on the subject still exists in the State Department at Washington, and whether Lord Salisbury was aware of it or not, his reply to Mr. Olney in the Christmas-time of 1895 might have been based as much on documentary evidence as on the sound political instinct which evidently appears to Mr. McCarthy to be its sole source of inspiration. To put it in its briefest form, Monroe's desire was to announce the combined policy which England and the United States were to follow on the Continent of America as against all other Powers, a policy which was only proclaimed from Washington, instead of from Westminster, in order to avoid any appearance of dictation by the Mother Country. It was reaffirmed when the neutrality of the maritime canal was guaranteed in the Clayton-Bulwer Treaty by the two countries together, because each was recognized to be an American Power; and English diplomacy was perfectly right in insisting that into the Venezuelan question it never entered at all, for that very reason. This is something very different from calling it "an amplification of Washington's theory of neutrality." For it is not merely a maxim of American diplomacy; it is as fixed a principle as any article of their constitution. To attack it would be to attack their Government, and to provoke a war; but the war would not be fought between two English-speaking peoples.

Few things are more striking to the reader who first comes in contact with the political or private papers of early American history than the extraordinary loftiness of thought and balance of style possessed by one after another of these "Fathers of the Constitution." There is, for instance, a stateliness of reasoning and diction in the writings of Jefferson—to take only one out of a number of gifted politicians of the Revolutionary period—which it is difficult to equal for sustained dignity in the English language, and impossible to surpass outside it. Yet the ideals for which he and Franklin and Adams and Hamilton were mainly responsible soon faded beneath the stress of practical emergencies, just as the tongue in which they first proclaimed their creed was changed when their descendants tried to use its pure and virile diction. Of that change Mr. Ford's book is an eloquent testimony. His main object is not so much to tell the story of American politics as to explain their nature and interpret their characteristics, to describe causes rather than to narrate events. And in doing this he has been perfectly wise in suggesting his own "politics" to English readers as the direct offshoot of English political conditions and precedents. But he could have chosen no course more dangerous to the reputation of his country. For he is inexorably compelled to trace the slow process of decay in purity of public life.

It is not difficult to realise now that the turning-point came when the "spoils system" was inaugurated by Jackson. But this was by no means the only sign that the "stage-coach constitution" was really on its last legs. The principle of the electoral college has been equally long ago abandoned. That principle had been to confide the election of the Chief of the Executive to the quiet and undisturbed verdict of men picked out by each State as the most judiciously capable of securing the best President in the interests of them all. Without pausing to discuss the intermediate stages, we may ask at once what that election amounts to at the present time. It begins in raucous conventions and platitudinous "party-platforms"; it goes on with a multitude of speeches, in making which one candidate steeple-chases across the country to impress as many crowds with his personality as is possible in the time allowed him; it ends in a batch of electors going to Washington who would no more think of having an independent opinion of their own than they would dream of nominating the Prince of Wales for President. Party government, which in France has already become a mere system of groups obeying not the man they want, but the man "who will divide them least," has suffered the worst fate of all in the United States. The principle of the "division of power," which has failed in every single experiment since Montesquieu devised it, has failed more conspicuously than anywhere in the Great Republic oversea. They tried it even in their military organization, and not until Commissary-General Eagan had been condemned did the real reason for the breakdown of the Commissariat strike those who had been responsible for its mismanagement. The instance is typical. For the late war is the strongest touchstone by which the American system of government has yet been tried. Racked and tortured as it has been by the test of sudden and colossal wealth, it has yet known how to keep its sufferings to itself. But the Power that conquered Spain and is now taking up its burden in the Philippines, and Cuba cannot conceal the cankers that are eating out its body politic.

As Mr. Ford very rightly remarks, American politics are in a transition state. "A cry for relief is the burden of public utterance. A ready ear is given to quackery, and many political nostrums are recommended with pathetic credulity by large bodies of respectable people." But the end is not yet, and they must work out their own salvation. The "boss system" may insist upon an enormous price for the blessings of concentrated authority in municipal affairs, but Americans are beginning to realize that the cost of party management in State and national affairs is beyond all computation. Mr. Ford thinks that it is at least as much as that of any regular department of government. As a matter of fact it is far more. The Republican Government now enjoyed by the free people of America is infinitely more expensive to them than any Monarchical régime in Europe, yet it is at once less democratic and less practical than all save one. The Civil War did much, but the Spanish War has already done far more to mend this state of things. The Great Experiment we have hinted at will be completed before the eyes of a far larger audience than it has ever had before.

CELTIC NIGHTMARES.

West Irish Folk Tales and Romances. By William Larminie. (The Antiquary's Library.) 8½ x 5½ in., xxviii. + 258pp. London, 1898. Stock. 3/6 n.

Mr. Larminie is in love with his subject, and he has spent years in collecting these stories from the Gaelic-speaking inhabitants of the west coast of Ireland. Allowing for the exigencies of translation, he has written them down exactly as the peasant narrators told them, and we may accept them therefore as accurate presentments of the peasant mind. And what is presented to us? Something strangely akin to the savage. We find stories of blood, and murder, and horror, of witches, devils, monsters, concluding with the childish savage delights of gorging for consecutive days, of telling stories, of slumberings soft and deep. And we find little significance in the tales, scarcely more significance than is to be found in a confused dream. As in a dream, there is perpetual slaying of some man or beast, which, as in a dream, immediately springs into life again. What is the following, which we take from the story of "King Mauanaun," but a transcript from some frightful nightmare? The hero Kaytuch, having vanquished the Hag of the Church, the Hag of Slaughter, Slaughter himself, and the Lamb of Luck, is now fighting with the Cat of Hoorebrikk.

He struck a blow of his sword at the cat and split it, and when the sword went through, the cat fastened together again. He drew a second blow at the cat, and split it from the snout to the tip of the tail, and the cat fastened again. When he was drawing the third blow, the cat leaped and put the tip of her tail into his side, and there was a barb of poison at the tip of the tail, and it took the heart of Kaytuch out, and Kaytuch took hold of the cat and thrust his fist into her mouth, and took her heart and entrails out in his hand, and the cat and Kaytuch fell dead.

How nightmare-like, too, is this, when Kaytuch, restored to life (he is killed and resuscitated no less than three times in the story) and wanting to make a fire, "took hold of the turfstack, and put his hands down and pulled out some of the turf, and ran as well as he could, and the turf was running after him to the door to smother him."

In Kaytuch's final fight with his rival Londu, we have the again vain imaginings of a dream:—

The two went to battle on board the ship. They began young like two little boys, and fought until they were two old men. They fought from being two young pups until they were two old dogs, from being two young bulls until they were two old bulls, from being two young stallions until they were two old stallions. Then they began a battle in the shape of birds, and they were fighting as two hawks, and one of them killed the other.

The story of "King Mauanaun" may be taken as a type of the rest. The hero is a sort of demi-god of strength and prowess, with plenty of devils'craft to fall back upon in emergencies. For the Irish mind has never been really christianised. The Irishman sees devilment in everything, and to put "druidism" on his neighbour is the height of his ambition. Kaytuch runs through entire armies as a hawk runs through flocks of birds, or a dog through flocks of sheep; and if you would go seeking for fun from the west of the world to the freshness of the morning, says the peasant-narrator, it is to see Kaytuch wrestling with "an owas" that you would betake yourself. The owas, be it explained, was a creature having at least human shape, frequently to be met with in Gaelic mythology.

They made hard of the soft, and soft of the hard, and wrestled until they brought the wells of fresh water up through the grey stones with fighting and breaking of bones, till the night was all but gone.

This passage, and others of real beauty, reappear again and again in all the stories:—

She gave her face to the way until she overtook the red wind of March which was before her, and the red wind of March which was after did not overtake her.

They spent the night together, a third in talking, a third in story-telling, and a third in soft rest and deep slumber, till the whiteness of the day came upon the morrow.

And there is the recurrent chaunt concerning the great sails, which is too curious not to quote. It varies slightly in form, but this is the essence of it :—

They hoisted their great sails, speckled, spotted, red-white, as long, as high as the top of the mast, and they left not a rope without breaking, an oar without tearing, with the crawling, creeping creatures, the little beasts of the sea with red mouth, the great beasts of the deep sea rising on the sole and palm of the oar, making music and melody for themselves, till the sea rose in strong waves, till the eels were whistling, the froth down and the sand above.

Such musical and persistent passages make us suspect that they are all that remains of the original myths drawn perhaps from Aryan sources, while the horrors, the monsters, the devils, the blood-lust, now become the main theme of the stories, have been superimposed on them by non-Aryan savages. The book should prove extremely interesting to the general reader, and of great value to the student of folk-lore.

THEOLOGY.

A Reported Change in Religion. By "Onyx." 7½ × 5½ in., 176 pp. London, 1899. Arnold. 3/6

This book, in so far as it portrays the thoughts and lives of imaginary people, should rank under the heading of Fiction, but to place it there would be quite misleading. The object of the anonymous author is to find the exact place of Romanism in the world of educated thought at the present day, to bring up, as it were, some representative individual types and confront them with the Roman ideals. The literary form chosen for this purpose is interesting and ingenious. Mr. Bertram Bevor, of Denham Court, Berkshire, a nephew of Lord Cumnor, on arriving at an hotel in Florence, to which he had directed that his letters and newspapers should be forwarded, finds a pile of communications awaiting him. Their unexpected number is explained when his eye lights upon an announcement in The Times, now two weeks' old, that he had joined the Roman Church. He proceeds to study his correspondence, and it is these letters from a great variety of men and women, together with his reply to one of them, which constitute the book. The announcement, it may be said, was not true, nor did it, as we were half inclined to expect, become true by the time Bevor had perused his letters—many of them from cultured and persuasive Romanists, one of whom, a priest, is the only correspondent acute enough to disbelieve the statement. Bevor does not join the Church of Rome; like Gerald Beechcroft, an old school friend, his reply to whom is given, he is standing on the brink. But he is not, like Beechcroft, kept back by social and domestic ties from taking the fatal plunge, and, moreover, he deliberately refrains from sending a contradiction of the announcement to The Times for publication. We confess to some curiosity as to "Onyx," the writer of this book. He reveals in many places a broad outlook, a philosophic aloofness from dogma combined with a real spirituality which disarms the critic; but we should be much surprised if Protestant readers do not trace the proselytiser in his pages—in his insistence on the appeal made by Rome in its historic Catholic aspect, and in his failure to conceive any mean for an educated man between a vague poetical idealism and the self-abandonment of the Roman. These characteristics run on parallel lines with the teaching of a well-known writer on social and philosophic subjects, who is also a successful novelist; and we may add that many other things in the book—its literary charm, the skill with which the mental and religious outlook of the various correspondents is realized, not to mention the introduction into their company of, at least, one portrait taken from the life—all contribute to remind us forcibly of the author of "Is Life Worth Living?" Whatever its religious tendency, the style and manner of the book is of high quality. The epistolary is generally, of all literary forms, the most wearisome, but the new personalities here revealed by each succeeding letter prevent monotony and give occasion both for humour and pathos, while in some of the longer letters there are many passages full of suggestion and original thought or of poetical fancy. The book is an interesting and, in many ways, a remarkable one.

Christian Institutions. By Alexander V. G. Allen, D.D. 8½ × 5½ in. London, 1898. T. & T. Clark. 12/-

Professor Allen evidently feels a difficulty in writing a history of Christian Institutions. We doubt whether he is well qualified by genius or temperament for dealing with such a complex subject. In his well-known "Continuity of Christian Thought" he displayed a remarkable faculty for wide though not very accurate generalization. His present subject demands a very careful and discriminating study of innumerable facts.

It is characteristic of Dr. Allen that he is quick to detect, and, as we think, to exaggerate antagonistic elements in the history of the Church. His "Continuity of Christian Thought" presupposed a radical antagonism between Greek and Latin Christianity. In his very interesting survey of Monasticism there is a similar instance of an opposition, which is certainly greatly over-estimated. We are told that—

The Montanist, the Novatian, the Donatist were all alike in this respect, that they did not believe that salvation depended on adherence to the Catholic Church, that Church out of which there was no salvation, as Cyprian had maintained, and as Augustine at a later time asserted with equal emphasis. In this conviction Monasticism also shared, putting the conviction into practical form by fleeing to the desert or the cell. . . . There resulted a compromise, therefore, between these opposite and almost incompatible forces. The Catholic Church followed the monks with priest and sacrament, they were not to be allowed to escape its authority; but within its fold, and under the limitations of a Church within a Church, they were at liberty to cultivate the monastic ideal.

This contrast between Monasticism and Catholicism is, we believe, fallacious, and it vitiates Dr. Allen's view both of the origin and development of creeds and of the "mediating" position which he assigns to the medieval Papacy. Anyhow, the reference to the Novatian and Donatist schisms is beside the mark. These movements did not represent "an antagonism to Catholicity," but an attempt to narrow the term "Catholicity" by too rigidly defining the conditions of Church membership.

Yet if Dr. Allen is not always to be followed as an historian, he rarely fails to be suggestive. Thus he seeks to show that the divisions of Protestantism "still perpetuate the various attitudes of Monasticism so far as they were expressions of certain permanent tendencies in religion." What he means is that the spirit of the various medieval orders is to some extent reproduced in different sections of post-Reformation Christendom. Thus he thinks that in Lutheranism we have the spirit of the Augustinian order; in Methodism that of the Franciscan order; and Wesley was, as it were, the successor of Francis of Assisi, "taking the world for his parish" and "differing from the Reformed Church on all those points in which the Franciscan differed from the Dominican." Whatever may be the truth underlying this suggestion, Dr. Allen's development of the idea is striking and stimulating.

On the whole, however, in spite of his learning and ability, Dr. Allen does not seem to us a very trustworthy guide to the history of Christian Institutions. The habit of rash generalization is peculiarly perilous when applied to such a subject. The book, it should be added, is marred by an unusual number of irritating misprints, especially in Latin and Greek quotations. Among authorities quoted or referred to we have noticed "Thomas of Aquinas," "Augustine Contra Petilian," "E. C. Benson, Archbishop of Canterbury," "Ommaney, Early History of the Athanasian Creed."

Mr. Eugene Stock's HISTORY OF THE CHURCH MISSIONARY SOCIETY (C.M.S., 6s. n. each vol.) is not yet complete, but as the 12th of April, on which day exactly a hundred years ago the Society was founded, is now so rapidly approaching, it has issued two volumes, and promises the third and concluding one very shortly. This will contain the history of the last quarter of a century and also an index, without the aid of which all but those few readers who are prepared to read steadily through the volumes will be rather at sea in perusing these closely-filled pages. But we do not complain of the comparative voluminousness of this work. It was at first—in 1891—conceived on a still larger scale, but Mr. Charles Hole, of King's College, to whom it was originally entrusted, found nearly half his time gone when he had only reached the year 1814. The result of his labours was published under the title "The Early History of the Church Missionary Society." Dr. W. P. Mears then took up the task, but was compelled by the state of his health to abandon it. Mr. Stock, the well-known editorial secretary of the Society, agreed to go on with the work, and he must certainly be congratulated on having made excellent use of a period of time which must have been all too scanty for such an undertaking. The free hand which he has reserved for himself in his sub-title, "Its Environment, its Men, and its Work" enables him to include much historical and biographical matter not directly bearing on the history of the Society, but which we are glad to see dealt with from a point of view which has not, on the whole, been adequately represented in histories and memoirs. The book is, to a great extent, a history of the Evangelical party—of which the Church Missionary Society is often said to be the most important achievement—and it gives incidentally an account, full, accurate, and never intolerant or fanatical, of the Evangelical party, from the days of Wesley and its missionary efforts at home and abroad, which is of real importance as a contribution to the religious history of the century.

MESSIAH COMETH by Canon Jelf (Innes, 7s. 6d.) goes through the Old Testament, showing in the case of each book in turn the witness it bears to Christ and His coming. Like this writer's other widely-read works, it will prove extremely useful to devotional students of the Bible.

A BOOK OF DEVOTIONS.—Canon J. W. Stanbridge, who has "compiled and arranged" "A Book of Devotions" (Methuen, 2s.), has provided the sober Anglo-Catholic with an excellent manual which (containing the Communion Service) may be used both at church and at home. Some of the prayers are derived from medieval sources (resembling in this respect the greater part of the Book of Common Prayer), but other devotions are taken from the works of such honoured Anglicans as Andrewes and Wilson.

The late Rev. A. E. Litton's THE CHURCH OF CHRIST (Nisbet, 5s.) has been republished in a revised form, with an introduction by Mr. Chavasse, the Principal of Wycliffe Hall. This work has a certain interest as having been "thought out in the thick of the conflict, amidst the din and distraction of controversy," excited by the Oxford Movement. Indeed, Mr. Litton was a Fellow of Oriel, and only a few years junior in standing to Newman himself. The book is a temperate statement of the Protestant position, somewhat controversial in tone but not consciously unfair. The writer does, indeed, betray a prejudice against the Western Fathers, especially Cyprian and Augustine, who "may be named as having laid the foundations of Romanism." Mr. Litton's dislike of Cyprian leads him to quote one famous passage (de unitate c. iv.) in its Romanized form without drawing attention to the spurious interpolations. The doctrine of the visibility of the Church, as taught by these Fathers, was especially repugnant to Mr. Litton. Mr. Chavasse thinks that "the republication of the book is peculiarly timely." We have only a faint hope, however, that it will help the cause of peace.

CHRIST THE SUBSTITUTE, by the Rev. E. Reeves Palmer (Snow, 7s. 6d.), is written from the Calvinist point of view and is a thoughtful and candid study of Christian doctrines, starting from the fact of the Divine Fatherhood. In his view of the Atonement, Mr. Palmer approximates to the late Dr. Dale. To him, Christ appears as the representative man, acting and suffering not "instead of" man, but "for" man, thus enabling man to do that which would otherwise have been impossible to him. In the concluding chapter on "The larger hope" it is interesting to see the extent to which the older Calvinism has assimilated ideas distinctively Catholic.

The general aim of THEOLOGIA PECTORIS, by Dr. James M. Hodgson (T. and T. Clark, 3s. 6d.), is to show that the truths of the Christian creed "are not only consistent with, but are implied in, and demanded by the essential principles of Human Nature"; in other words, that they do not rest merely on the authoritative statements of dogmatic theology. The theory is closely akin to that of M. Sabatier's "Philosophie de la Religion." Like M. Sabatier, Dr. Hodgson finds the basis of religious certitude in the intuitions of the human soul itself (anima naturaliter Christiana). The chief merits of the book are, in our opinion, two. In the first place the "theology of the heart," as expounded by Dr. Hodgson, is not weak or sentimental—it does not ignore the existence or the consequences of sin. Secondly, it successfully vindicates for religion a vital place in human life.

MEDITATIONS ON THE LOVE OF GOD.—Fray Diego de Estella, the author of these "Meditations" (Burns and Oates, 3s. 6d.), was born in Navarre in 1524, and became Royal Preacher, Adviser, and Theologian to King Philip II. He was the author of "De la Vanidad del Mundo," the "Meditaciones" now translated by Henry W. Pereira, and "La Vida y Excelesencias de San Juan Evangelista." It is curious to note the contrast between the "sobriety" of English devotional works and the fervent ecstasy of the Spanish friar. The following is a good example of the strange, semi-mystical tone which characterizes the "Meditations":—

O Spouse of my soul, Prince of Glory and King of Heaven, . . . Thou hast loved me so much that Thou hast not only ransomed me, but, having been made man, Thou hast betrothed Thyself in a Virginal Bride-chamber to human nature in an indissoluble marriage.

It is all quite "un-English," of course, but the imagery would have commended itself to the author of the "Song of Songs," and would seem devout and impressive to any Eastern of the present day.

We admit with Cardinal Vaughan, in his preface to Wiseman's MEDITATIONS ON THE INCARNATION AND LIFE OF OUR LORD (Burns and Oates, 4s.), that "at the first hasty perusal of them we confess to have experienced a feeling of disappointment." But we cannot agree with him that further consideration has altogether removed this feeling. Cardinal Wiseman had a genial and picturesque breadth of character, and the type is less common now than it was; therefore we are glad to see his influence perpetuated among his co-religionists. A book of which one can say that it might for the most part have been written by a warm-hearted and clear-sighted divine of almost any other communion has much to recommend it at a time like the present, when sectional ideas are rather strong. But we can find nothing original or of distinction in these meditations; straightforward and thorough, they are yet, like so many books of this kind, but an amplification of the obvious.

THE CHRISTIAN PASTOR AND THE WORKING CHURCH, by Washington Gladden, D.D., LL.D. (T. and T. Clark, 10s. 6d.), is written from the point of view of a Congregationalist minister, who has an intimate knowledge of the social conditions of America. It seems unfortunate that an "International Series" should include a volume of so avowedly sectarian and nationalistic a character. Such points as the character of the religious instruction to be given in day schools or the preparation of the young for Confirmation are, of course, left unnoticed, and in the chapter on "Woman's Work" there is no attempt made to estimate the work of the sisterhoods in the English Church. We are glad to observe that Dr. Gladden speaks with warm appreciation of Bishop Dupanloup's "Ministry of Catechizing," though he does not apparently notice the same great prelate's "Prédication populaire." Speaking generally, however, the age-long pastoral experience of the Catholic Church is, for the most part, ignored. The problems of rural parishes are scarcely even approached; and clergy working among the populations of our English towns will find Dr. Gladden's large volume considerably less useful than Bishop Gott's "Parish priest of the town," or the Bishop of Stepney's "Work in large towns." The book contains a chapter on "Co-operation with other Churches," which is worth reading.

OTHER NEW BOOKS.

The charm of books like WOOD AND GARDEN, by Gertrude Jekyll (Longmans, 10s. 6d. n.), and Mrs. Earle's "Pot Pourri from a Surrey Garden," and many others of the same class, is their freshness and sincerity. The garden, the field, and the woodland present the one subject to discourse on which it is not necessary to be a practised writer, the one subject which only wants for its proper study enthusiasm and observation, the one subject on which there is always something new to say, and on which it is always pleasant to hear what is old. There need be no laborious phrase-making, no conceits or affectations, no consciousness of the critic, no display of literary lore. Given the true love of nature, wild or cultivated, with the true receptiveness to its infinite charm, the simple record of impressions and experiences is always pleasant simply because it is not at second-hand, but fresh and genuine as the scent of newly gathered flowers. There is this quality about Mrs. Jekyll's writing, but, as in the case of Mrs. Earle's book and of Mr. Robinson's classic "English Flower Garden," there is much more than this, and the amateur gardener will find here a great deal of helpful advice on the practical details and the true ideals of a garden suited to the pleasures of daily life, and also as to a subject on which a word of counsel is often needed—viz., the relations between masters and mistresses and their gardeners. Mrs. Jekyll has taken a large number of delightful photographs from various points in her own grounds and used them to illustrate her book, which we cordially recommend to every one who has a garden with time and money to spend upon it.

The happy idea came to Miss E. M. Merrick that in many parts of India there must be numbers of Begums, Queens, Maharanees, and purdah ladies generally who merely awaited her coming to have their portraits painted. Having thus "heard the East a-calling," she started on her journey and travelled India from north to south and back again, capturing a Maharajah here, a Nizam there, and ladies everywhere, as well as such important sitters as Lord and Lady Lansdowne, Lord Roberts, Mr. Stanley, and others. She has now put together in a readable volume—WITH A PALETTE IN EASTERN PALACES (Sampson Low, 5s.)—her experiences of Indian life. Almost everywhere she was well treated and made much of. One of her handsomest sitters, whose portrait is given in this book with many others, was H.H. The Maharajah Rana of Dholpore, a Prince celebrated for his pearls; and it was while Miss Merrick was working for him that the ladies of the Zenana showed her that portrait painting in Indian palaces may sometimes be carried on under difficulties:—

The women threw stones at me when I arrived in the morning, flattened their noses against my window, putting their tongues out, and sometimes six or eight would crowd into the small room where I was painting, smearing my painting, and making grimaces and giggling, and nothing would induce them to leave.

Miss Merrick complained; but the Maharajah of the many pearls only regarded the matter as a great joke, and could not help her. On another occasion the incivility was, at any rate, unintentional. An old Maharanee spent hours learning a sentence which should be an engaging adieu to her. At last her chance came, and in the kindest and politest tone she said, "Get out of this 'ouse, woman." It was the first sentence in the Maharanee's book of "polite speeches"—evidently prepared by a humorist. On one occasion Lady Harris gave a purdah party, at which a native lady, after talking to Miss Merrick for some time, surprised her by saying that the artist reminded her of one of the characters in "Pride and Prejudice," an astonishing remark from a lady who had never come from behind "the curtain." Miss Merrick is an acute observer and writes in a fluent, fresh, and often humorous style.

The Dean of Ely is well qualified both by his early knowledge of Kingsley and by the work he has done in helping to spread Kingsley's gospel to write on CHARLES KINGSLEY in the Victorian Era Series (Blackie, 2s. 6d.). The volume is rather shorter than some others in this series, being printed in larger type, but this is, perhaps, due to the rather limited scope which the Dean has set before himself, of writing a book which completes the picture drawn by three other volumes of the series—"The Rise of Democracy," "The Anglican Revival," and "Provident Societies and Industrial Welfare." The Dean's subject, in fact, is the movement which originated in 1848, with which the public associate more than any other the name of "Parson Lot," and of which the Christian Socialists of to-day are the legitimate successors. The new democratic spirit and the religious revival helped to bring it to life, and one of its results was, or rather is, the extension of industrial co-operation. But the real originator of it was, as readers of this book will be reminded, not Kingsley but F. D. Maurice, the first teacher of influence who founded the new ideas of social service on the Doctrine of the Incarnation. All this is well and skilfully set out by the Dean. He does not dwell on Kingsley's literary side, although he gives one instance of how the Socratic gadfly could sting the man to poetry. It was the conscientious, but uncourteous behaviour of the incumbent of a church in which Kingsley was preaching that so irritated the poet's brain that he could not sleep. Instead of going to bed he paced in front of his rectory and composed the most lovely of his lyrics, "Three Fishers went sailing out into the west." One can only wish that clerical controversies were always so richly productive! But we are grateful for this sketch of Kingsley's career on its practical side, and for the copious quotations from his speeches and pamphlets, many of which, unfortunately, are as apt to-day as they were half a century ago.

The sixth series of M. Brunetière's ETUDES CRITIQUES SUR L'HISTOIRE DE LA LITTÉRATURE FRANÇAISE (Hachette, 3f. 50c.) contains essays on "The Doctrine of Evolution and the History of Literature"; on "Les Fabliaux du Moyen Age et l'Origine des Contes," the reprint of an old article of 1893, in which M. Brunetière repudiates, as being not more French than Italian or English, the famous thing known as l'esprit gaulois; on a "précurseur de la pléiade, Maurice Scève," a poet all but unknown, who interests M. Brunetière as proving the theory that writers in epochs of transition necessarily perish, "being annulled in the transformation of which they are the unwitting workmen"; on "Pierre Corneille," a long study of fifty-seven pages of a man who, for M. Brunetière, is with Pascal and Bossuet "one of the few great French writers who defend Frenchmen against the reproach of levity, heedlessness as to great questions, gauloiserie, and immorality"; on "L'Esthétique de Boileau," a brilliant demonstration of the pre-eminently "national" quality of Boileau's utterance; on "Bossuet," the great exponent of the temper of the seventeenth century; on the "Mémoires d'un Homme Heureux," Marmontel, an amusing rating of a representative frequenter of eighteenth century Salons; on "Classique ou Romantique," an interesting discussion of the place in French literature of André Chenier; on M. Bertrand's "La Fin du Classicisme et le Retour à l'Antique dans la seconde moitié du XVIII^e siècle et les premières années du XIX^e en France"; and finally on "Cosmopolitisme et la Littérature Nationale," in which M. Brunetière frankly accepts, greatly to his honour, the thesis of M. Texte that French literature should assimilate to its own genius the best that is thought and said in the world.

Mr. Heron-Allen's new volume on "Edward FitzGerald's Rubā'iyāt" (Quaritch, 7s. 6d.) is destined to set at rest for ever the vexed question of how far that incomparable poem is to be considered a translation and how far an original work. Mr. Heron-Allen prints FitzGerald's quatrains on the left-hand page, and on the opposite side gives a literal translation of the Persian sources whence they were drawn. The result is a volume of extraordinary interest to the student, and a proof that besides being a great poet, FitzGerald understood the difficult art of translation, as it is, unhappily, understood by few. For the true artistic translation is not the most faithful rendering of the word, of the phrase, nor even of the illustration or the metaphor, often quite inappropriate to the genius of the language in which the translator works. The true artist sets himself to give the spirit of the original, and knows how to clothe it in metaphor and image of a corresponding, but not of an identical, felicity. FitzGerald has thus produced a translation so essentially faithful, and, at the same time, an original poem of such exquisite beauty that for English readers he and Omar shine as stars of the same magnitude.

Mr. Holbrook Jackson sends us a modest little brown-paper pamphlet on the same subject, being an essay on EDWARD FITZGERALD AND OMAR KHAYYAM (Nutt, 6d. n.). He gives a useful bibliography of all the renderings of Omar into English, and he appears to be a good Omarian, yet he makes so curious an assertion in the last line of his essay that it almost tempts one to inquire whether he imagines "Saki" to be the name of a girl.

It would be hard to say for whose edification Mr. Edward Spencer, the "Nathaniel Gubbins" of so many a story in the Sporting Times, has compiled his treatise on drinks—of all kinds and of all periods—which he calls THE FLOWING BOWL (Grant Richards, 6s.), for in our time the wise are said to believe in drinking only one wine at dinner, say a champagne of a good year and brand, and those who are young as well as wise are understood to add after dinner a satisfactory port; if with the coffee comes a green liqueur, we can really see no reason why any one, wise or foolish, should trouble about negus, metheglin, and elderberry punch. But those who know Mr. Spencer's previous volume, "Cakes and Ale," will understand that he can make his subject amusing, and that he can give us many strange recipes, and some experiences, which are, at least, original. "Glorious Beer" is the heading of a chapter which deals in a cheery way with the many varieties of our national drink, one that has inspired a fair share of singers. Brasenose Ale has been particularly prolific of lyrics, but "the potion," says our author, "is simplicity itself:—Three quarts of ale sweetened with sifted sugar, and served up in a bowl with six roasted apples floating in it." Mr. Spencer writes of champagne with a matured enthusiasm and a wide and catholic knowledge. We are, therefore, a little hurt to find him writing of a well-known shipper as "Mum"; whereas he knows full well that mum "was but a species of unsophisticated ale, brewed from wheat, or oats, with a little bean-meal occasionally introduced." "The Aftermath of Revelry" is a chapter that should be read by all who propose to put Mr. Spencer's many engaging recipes to the test; his knowledge of Katzenjammer, as the Germans name that form of remorse that comes with the morning, is undoubted, and his "pick-me-ups" might be tried—by the courageous.

The outside of "The Flowing Bowl" is decorated with an excellent design by Mr. Phil May.

It would be very easy to be severely critical upon LOYAL LOCHABER AND ITS ASSOCIATIONS, by W. Drummond Norie (Morison, Glasgow, 10s. 6d. n.). It is too large; it is distended with padding; the author has little or no discrimination in his enthusiasm, and cannot pretend to be a scientific student of history. He is so hasty in his statements that (p. 106) he is found speaking of Graham of Claverhouse, Viscount Dundee, as "proud of his descent from the great Marquis" (Montrose). Claverhouse is also affirmed to "have been instrumental in saving the life of the Prince of Orange at the Battle of Seneffe in 1674," as if there were no doubt about the matter. The achievement is, indeed, duly recorded in the Gramscid, but that is no reason—rather the reverse—why the statement should not be taken with a few grains of salt. On the other hand, Mr. Drummond Norie may be forgiven many sins for his deep attachment to the Highlands and to that particular region of which he writes where

We see as in a dream stretches of purple moorland, dotted here and there with snow-white sheep; blue sparkling lochs embosomed among the hills, reflecting in their mirrored surface the brown sails of the fishing boats; turbulent rivers rushing merrily along over rocks and pebbles, making sweet music as they go to join the sea.

Mr. Drummond Norie's Jacobitism, too, is very cordial, and his book is worth reading after the doubts as to the loyalty of more than one of the chieftains of the '45 which have resulted from the investigations of Mr. Andrew Lang. This book is, indeed, the encyclopædia of the history of Celtic enthusiasm and of the families such as the Macdonalds and the Camerons who have been identified with Lochaber. Mr. Drummond Norie, with all his love for the past, has an eye to the future. Referring to an extension of the West Highland Railway, which is now being proceeded with, he says:—

Such a railway cannot but prove of immense advantage to the islanders, as by its means they will be enabled to transport their fish and other native products to the markets of Glasgow and Edinburgh in much quicker time than they can do now by the Strome Ferry route.

There is a good deal of the character of a haggis in Mr. Drummond Norie's book, and the cookery is not above reproach. But it is rich, reeking, warm, and not so indigestible as it might have been.

Although the title of Mrs. Harland's book, WHERE GHOSTS WALK (Putnam, 9s.), is rather more suggestive of theatrical slang than of old romances and poets that are dead, she has hit upon a series of happy subjects for discursive essays. The haunts of familiar characters in history and literature remain mines of pleasant "copy" for those who know how to handle their subject. An American lady of culture passing from one such scene to another across Europe, from No. 24, Cheyne-row to Ravenna, from Hampton Court to Siena, should be able to give us some interesting and freshly-observed impressions. Although, on the whole, Mrs. Harland has produced an agreeable and readable book, it is by no means so engaging as a list of her subjects predisposed one to anticipate. For example, in the chapter headed "Her Gloomy Honeymoon," dealing with Queen Mary and what the author calls "the great Babylon of Hampton Court," there is no fact, nor hardly any thought, that we cannot find better expressed in Mr. Ernest Law's work upon the Palace and its history. "In Ravenna," again, will be a little disappointing to those who have read John Addington Symonds on the same subject. But Mrs. Harland is always an enthusiast for what she believes to be old and, as it were, well-connected with the past. Her essay on a Fleet-street chop-house, "The Cheshire Cheese," is a conglomeration of hyperbolic praise, her enthusiasm for the subject actually leading her to write:—

We yet remind one another, whisperingly, that Robert Herrick wrote to Ben Jonson of—

"These lyric feasts
Made at The Sun,
THE CHEESE, the Triple Tun";

whereas all lovers of the poet will know that he wrote—

An Ode to Him.
Ah, Ben!
Say how, or when Shall we thy Guests
Meet at those Lyrick Feasts,
Made at the Sun,
The Dog, the triple Tunne?

Such inaccuracies, and a somewhat trivial style, mar many of Mrs. Harland's engaging subjects. Perhaps her most successful essay is that entitled "In Villetta," which gives some details of the school at Brussels which stands still much the same as it was in the days of Charlotte and Emily Brontë. The many illustrations, which are descriptive rather than artistic accompaniments to the book, are well reproduced from photographs.

The first volume of a HISTORY OF THE PEOPLE OF THE NETHERLANDS, translated by Oscar A. Bierstadt and Ruth Putnam from the Dutch of Professor Petrus Johannes Blok, of Leyden (Putnam, 12s. 6d.), has been published. It covers the ground from the earliest times to the beginning of the fifteenth century—the period, that is to say, during which Dutch history is least interesting and most difficult. The nature of its difficulty is partly explained by the author in the appendix in which he discusses his authorities.

Our knowledge of Netherland history for the period before the fourteenth century is based on fragmentary and broken records. The investigator finds some trustworthy authority for a brief epoch here, and a few years there. Then the ground sinks under his feet, and he has no material for bridging over the chasm of uncertainty. It is impossible to follow the evolution of events so as to obtain a panorama of gradual historical development. With few exceptions, characters appear suddenly on the scene, and we see them act without knowing the causes of their action. We can form no clear idea of such men as Count William I. and Count Flores V. of Holland. We know nothing of Otto II., of Guelders, of Guy, of Dauphine, of the three Henries of Brabant. Their deeds are in the main inexplicable, and their guiding thoughts incomprehensible.

There is a further difficulty. At this early epoch there was, strictly speaking, no Holland to have a history. It used to be said that Italy was only a geographical expression; but Holland, during the periods which this volume treats of, was not even that. Italy, though governed by a variety of principalities and powers, had, at any rate, thanks to its geographical advantages, fairly definite boundaries. The Netherlands might mean anything, according to the political position of the hour; and their early history can only be read in conjunction with the early history of the Continent as a whole. They were brought into touch with the civilized world on the day on which Cæsar overcame the Nervii. When the Romans withdrew, the Germans overran them. They—or a part of them—were included in the Merovingian Kingdom, in the Empire of Charlemagne, and in the Duchy of Lower Lorraine; while Frisia was raided, and to a large extent conquered, by the Danes. Then we get the rise of independent feudal powers, and their intricate wars against each other. We have Flanders fighting against Holland and Hainault; Holland fighting against Friesland; Holland fighting against Brabant; Holland and Guelders allied against Utrecht. Finally, we get the rise of the cities, each of which has a more or less complicated history of its own. These, clearly, are not promising materials for the picturesque historian; his chance comes later, when the cities have risen and the Spanish invaders arrive. Piecing the earlier history together is merely the indispensable clearing of the ground. Yet Professor Blok is to be commended upon the manner in which he has fulfilled his task. He is as lucid as the conditions and circumstances allowed, and a good deal less dull than might have been expected. Occasionally a character sketch—as that of Charlemagne—stands clearly out; while, when the historian gets away from the recitation of political facts to descriptions of social life, his work is always excellent.

"The Social England Series," of which Mr. Kenelm D. Cotes is the general editor, now includes an informing work on THE EVOLUTION OF THE ENGLISH HOUSE (Swan Sonnenschein, 4s. 6d.), by Mr. Sidney Oldall Addy. He begins with the earliest forms, wattled huts or combinations of dwelling-house and cattle stall, and traces the history through the early round house, rectangular house, and larger rectangular house with aisles. Mr. Addy does not cultivate any particular charm of style, but every page is crowded with facts, and his diagrams and illustrations greatly assist the reader.

THE HISTORY OF CORSICA, by L. H. Caird (Unwin, 5s.). There may be a public for a history of Corsica which is about as dull as the average school history of England gets when it arrives at the Wars of the Austrian Succession, but we should imagine that it is a small one. The material available, competently handled, might have made a book that at least would have been interesting in places. The careers of King Theodor—the Monarch who ended in an English debtor's prison—and of Paoli, gave the historian two chances of being picturesque; but Mr.

Caird has not availed himself of either chance. His book makes a certain amount of information more accessible than it has hitherto been, and its appearance requires, therefore, to be noted; but his diligence is the only quality for which the author can be praised.

THE NEW LEVIATHAN, by J. A. Farrer (Stock, 2s. 6d.), is another of the many tracts called forth by the Tsar's rescript. The author appeals to us to give up patriotism for cosmopolitanism; and he may be admitted to have proved that, if we all became cosmopolitans at once, the transformation would be generally advantageous. But this was not a very difficult proposition to establish. The question whether, in a world in which some people were cosmopolitans and other people patriots, the patriots would not take an unfair advantage of the cosmopolitans is harder, and Mr. Farrer does not face it. The Chinese, for example, so far as reluctance to draw the sword goes, are cosmopolitan enough for anything; but the patriots of other countries are not disarmed by their pacific disposition. Mr. Farrer's pamphlet might have been more valuable if he had anticipated these obvious objections to his views. As he has not done so, his seven essays, eloquent though they are, are, dialectically, on the level of sermons.

MATHEMATICS.

GEOMETRY OF POSITION, by Theodor Reye (Macmillan, 10s. n.), represents a course of lectures on what is generally known in this country as projective geometry. They were delivered at Strassburg University, and to Dr. Holgate belongs the credit of a close and lucid translation into English. A translation of Cremona's Italian text-book on projective geometry and Professor Henrici's article in the "Encyclopædia Britannica" were for long the only sources of reliable information in our language, if we except Townsend's book (which confines its consideration to the straight line and circle) on the modern geometry of position that owes so much of its development to Poncelet, Steiner, and Chasles, and so little to geometers of this country. There are certain characteristics which distinguish this modern geometry from the Euclidian. The latter refers almost invariably to metrical properties of forms; projective geometry studies relations between different forms due to their mutual positions. Euclid's propositions are designed to stand with little support from each other; they are narrow, and the chance of applying them is not often manifest. Modern geometry is a study of principles; generalization is arrived at in every case, and even the notion of the infinite is systematically presented to us. Professor Reye's course has been known in Germany for over thirty years. His system is specially noticeable for the very rigid exclusion of algebra throughout, and for his early insistence of the student's attention to the doctrine of duality. It is a pity the book was not translated long ago, though it may be remarked that Professor Henrici's article above referred to is based on Reye's course of lectures and has been available for twenty years.

INFINITESIMAL ANALYSIS, by W. B. Smith (Macmillan, 14s. n.). Among the many American treatises on mathematics that have in recent years been published in England, this introduction to the infinitesimal calculus promises to be one of the most useful. The style is excellent and the matter carefully chosen. The subject offers much difficulty to the ordinary student, and its developments are not attractively dealt with in our standard text-books. Professor Smith has contrived to make his volume much more than a series of processes set forth analytically. He introduces explanatory paragraphs that throw many a sidelight on the discussion, and invest it with an almost personal interest. His diagrams are clear and the print is well arranged. The chapters on partial derivation and integration are perhaps the best in the book, and, inasmuch as they deal with the hardest parts of the general theory, we may hope that in the promised second volume the author will render its subject in the higher branches more interesting than we are accustomed to find it. It would have added to the utility of the present work if answers had been supplied to the problems.

EPITAPH

IN FORM OF BALLADE : MADE BY VILLON FOR HIMSELF AND HIS COMPANIONS WHEN EXPECTING TO BE HANGED WITH THEM.

I.

You fellow-creatures who come after us,
Steel not your hearts against us as some do ;
For, if you look with pity generous,
God will have mercy, likewise, upon you.
Here we six hang, all swinging fro and to ;
As for the flesh we cherished so, you see
'Tis fall'n away and perished utterly ;
Mere bones, we waste in ruin gradual,
Crumbling to dust. Laugh not that here we be,
But pray to God that he absolve us all.

II.

You should not, brothers, since we ask you thus,
Look with contempt upon us, though 'tis true
That we were slain by judgment righteous ;
You know that all take not a sober view
Of life and duty. Intercede in lieu
With Christ, the holy Son of Saint Marie,
That His enduring grace and heavenly plea
May shield us when the infernal blast shall fall ;
No man can harm us more, dead men are we,
But pray to God that he absolve us all.

III.

The rain has washed our bodies villainous,
The sun has dried us ; and a horrid crew
Of pies and crows our picked-out eyes discuss,
And tear the hair that on our faces grew.
At no time are we still ; for, ever new,
Now here, now there, the varying breeze makes free
And sways our bones upon the gallows-tree ;—
Bones pricked like thimbles by the bird-beaks small.
O men, here is no place for mockery,
But pray to God that he absolve us all.

Envoi.

Prince JESUS, who of all things hast the key,
Forfend that Hell hold us in custody,
And save us each from being Devil's thrall.
And ye who hear, shun our fraternity,
But pray to God that he absolve us all.

PILGRIM SCHOLARS.

With bookish men it is a favourite exercise to canvass in moments of pause the merits of certain of the memory-pictures they may have collected. Such a recreation commonly accompanies a disquieting retrospect at the year of birth, and not seldom leads to the conclusion that collection ought to cease forthwith, so manifest are the signs of inferiority and deterioration in the latest additions to the gallery. Here, preference is a matter of temperament. In my own case I may affirm that, of all the impressions scored on memory deeply enough to persist, those which recall some moment of youthful discovery, some expansion to more vivid experience, shape themselves most pleasantly, and have a certain efficacy in lulling into acquiescence a brain worn, no doubt, but not yet weary of living. Most clearly I can picture voyages in a leaky boat up streams running through osier beds and alder plantations, which would bring rich spoil of bulrush heads and waterhens' eggs, and end unexpectedly at some greystone bridge, known hitherto only as an incident on a commonplace highway. Then came the time of search in books rather than in running brooks, when the eye would light upon some familiar sequence of words, some jewel of thought now first enjoyed in its appropriate setting ; but to particularize here would be too long.

A single instance of successful exploration in the world of letters may be produced—to wit, the discovery of that band of young Englishmen who set out for Italy, drawn thither by rumours of new and marvellous treasures of learning recently rescued from monkish lumber-rooms or conveyed over seas by fugitive Greeks. There is a quickening of the learned pulse, even in these prosaic days, when a few lines of a third-rate Greek poet are disentangled from palimpsest or papyrus. What, then, must have been the exaltation of the clerks of London and of the Universities when they heard how a rhetorician had been discovered here, and a philosopher there, and that Greek was being taught in Florence. Here was indeed a revelation. Ah, to have lived in those days even with the lack of halfpenny papers, cycles, and piano organs !

One curiously interesting figure of this group moves like an alien presence through the dismal rack and ruin of the times. John Tiptoft, Earl of Worcester, lives for us in scattered references of the chroniclers, in the matter-of-fact periods of the Paston letters, and most vividly of all in the pathetic appreciation of Caxton. Treating of Tiptoft as a traveller it may be recorded that two diplomatic missions to the Pope were entrusted to him by Henry VI. ; but whether he visited the South on the King's affairs or his own is a question which has never been settled. Possibly, he may have combined diplomatic duty with literary pleasure in the voyage he made to Italy about 1457, a voyage prolonged to the Holy places and Jerusalem. On his return to Venice he studied law at Padua, gained the friendship of Guarino at Ferrara, and heard John Argyropoulos lecture on Greek at Florence. He went on to Rome and, according to Fuller, spoke so eloquently before Pius II. that the Pope was moved to tears. Fuller is also responsible for the statement that Tiptoft withdrew to Italy expressly to avoid participation in the strife between the King de facto and the Yorkist leader, to whom he was unflinchingly loyal. The chroniclers tell less of his literary achievements than of his cruelty, which they attribute to his association with the corrupt and treacherous Italians. His crowning sin was the execution and mutilation of a band of Lancastrians at Southampton, and he is likewise charged with superseding the law of the land by "the law Padowe," whenever this substitution promised more ready attainment of his ends. He did cruel work, without doubt, but it is hard to say how far he was personally responsible for this. Edward IV., be it remembered, was a man of merciless temper. Tiptoft may have imbibed some of the cruel spirit of the contemporary Italian ruler, but in one respect he was not Italianate; that is, he was ever loyal to his chief. No treachery, like that of Clarence or Warwick, no desertion of his King's standard like that of Grey de Ruthyn at Northampton, or Stanley at Bosworth, sullied his name. These men, albeit they had never sojourned in "Circe's Court," had learnt better than Tiptoft the trade of Captain of a Free Company.

It may be advanced that Tiptoft, a great noble and statesman, took to letters as a diversion, and reaped the facile literary harvest of a person of quality, but it is hardly probable that Caxton would have been moved to use such terms of praise unless he had detected some sign of true enthusiasm for letters. In the epilogue to the orations of Cornelius Scipio, he writes:—"I mene the right vertu and noble Erle, Therle of Wurcestre whiche late pytously lost his lyf, whos soule I recomende unto your special prayers, and also in his tyme made many other vertuous werkys whiche I have hered of. O good blessyd lord god, what grete losse was it of that noble vertuous and weldisposed lord. Whan I remembre and advertyse his lyf, his science and vertue, me thynketh god not displeyd over grete a losse of suche a man consydering his estate and connyng. And also the exercise of the same with the grete laboures in gooying on pylgremage unto Jherusalem visytyng there the holy places that oure blessyd Lord haloued thith his blessyd presence. . . And what worship had he at Rome in the presence of oure holy fader the pope. And so in all other places unto his deth. . . wherein I hope and doubt not but that god receyved his soule into his evirlasting blysse, for as I am enformed he ryghte advyседly ordeyned alle his thynges as well for his last will of wordly goodes, as for his soule helthe, and paciently and holyly without grudchyng in charyte to fore, that he departed out of this worlde whiche is gladsome and joyous to here." And Fuller says of Worcester's death:—"Then did the axe at one blow cut off more learning in England than was left in the heads of all the surviving nobility."

An earlier pilgrim than Tiptoft was William Grey, a scholar of Balliol and subsequently Bishop of Ely. Attracted by the fame of Guarino he went to Ferrara in 1442, and in 1449 Henry VI, made him King's Proctor to the Curia, whereupon he repaired to Rome to receive, no doubt, a cordial welcome from that illustrious scholar, Pope Nicholas V. It is probable that he tarried at Rome till his advancement to the see of Ely in 1454, but after his return he did not spend all his time in the dismal solitude of the fens. He held various posts of responsibility in these troublous times, and amid the turmoil of affairs did not forget the claims of letters. He founded the library at Balliol, and sent John Free and John Gunthorpe, two promising Balliol scholars, to study under Guarino, the subsequent career of the first-named being a typical one. Free first studied medicine, and his success was so remarkable that he was appointed to teach it at Ferrara, and afterwards at Padua and Florence. About 1465, under Tiptoft's patronage, he went to Rome, and was probably employed by Pius II. in translating Greek MSS. into Latin. He was nominated Bishop of Bath and Wells, but he died almost immediately after his preferment, not without suspicion of the poisoned cup. Gunthorpe was more fortunate. After his return to England he was employed in various diplomatic negotiations: with the King of Castile in 1466, with the Duke of Brittany in 1484, and with Maximilian in 1486. He was preferred to the bishopric of Bath and Wells, which dignity he held till his death.

It is certain that association with the subtle-witted Italians, and with the finest intellects of the ancient world, who now spoke for the first time through their rediscovered writings to the islanders of the West, must have rendered these scholar statesmen vastly more skilful in diplomatic fence than home-bred soldiers and justiciars would ever have proved to be; and if we compare the possible rewards of the politician and the clerk we may easily understand why they forsook letters, which had advanced them, for politics. Having tasted the sweets of power they spent their strength in quest of the prizes which ambition offered; hence the meagre volume and unattractive nature of their literary legacy. But though their achievements in letters were of little account, their work was not entirely fruitless in that it prepared the field for the next relay of labourers who took up the task under the direction of Colet and More.

W. G. WATERS.

FEYSHAD.

[By H. DE VERE STACPOOLE.]

The slave Aziyadé told the Caliph this:—

The merchant Feyshad, Sire, in a journey across the desert, fell apart one day from the caravan with which he travelled, and, causing his camel to kneel, he dismounted for the purpose of counting the emeralds and rubies in the sack which he wore at his belt.

In this sack there were balas rubies of the colour of a white mouse's eye, and emeralds coloured like the grass after rain, and, also, there were green sapphires and sapphires of cornflower blue, and sapphires coloured like the Bosphorus on a windless day; and pearls, Sire, some black and bean-shaped like the thumb of an Æthiopian woman, and some like a woman's little teeth, and some that blushed rose red, as if at the thought of their own beauty.

So lost was the merchant in contemplation of his treasures that he did not notice Sleep, who, passing by on his grey mule, cast a handful of poppy seeds upon the head of Feyshad, and then rode on, laughing, with eyes half closed, in the track of the vanishing caravan. Feyshad had slept scarcely an hour, Sire, when, awaking, he glanced around and found himself alone. His camel had forsaken him, and over all the yellow desert burning beneath the noonday sun there was no trace of life, save the bleaching bones that here and there marked the road of the caravans.

He turned to the east and to the west, to the north and to the south, and nothing did he see but the sands running to a rim against the sky, save in the east, where a sand devil danced upon the plain, making movements as if in derision of Feyshad.

"Alas!" cried the unhappy merchant as he tore his beard. "Fool that I am! That I might count my treasure in safety I withdrew me from the caravan where was my real safety. I thirst, but where shall I find water here? The sun consumes me, but where shall I find shade?" Then he ceased for fear of his own voice, which sounded strange in that echoless desert, and sitting with his eyes fixed upon the sand devil, which was now dancing into the west, he gave himself to despair, till, suddenly he was startled by a voice from behind, crying,

"Feyshad!"

The merchant, Sire, turned, and, to his astonishment, he saw before him, at twenty paces distant, an Arab veiled in white and seated upon an ass.

At this sight a great horror fell upon the soul of Feyshad, for, but a moment before, he had been alone seated amidst the vastness of the desert. Nor did his horror grow less when he beheld the thing before him ceaselessly changing form as it spoke, yet speaking always in the same voice.

Now, it was an Arab seated upon an ass; now, a woman naked and bestriding a lion; it would shrink now to an ape seated upon a dog; and now it would swell to the form of a stout man upon a camel.

And the form cried to him, saying, "Feyshad, I am the Fata Morgana, the dreamer of the desert. I bring to the waste places the ghosts of the cities, with their mosques and towers, and the sapphire shadow of the Nile bends at my word through the heat shaken air and past the feet of dying men. I give to man the one thing real—Illusion. I am thine."

Then Feyshad, consumed by thirst, cried out, heedless of the horror before him, "Water, I pray you, water!"

"Before entering my lands," said the Fata Morgana, "bear well in mind, O Feyshad, that should you meet there any one you love, should you see them, though it be a league away, or though it be but their reflection in a mirror, at that instant all will vanish and the world of Khayf*, and happy illusion, will be for you no more."

"Peace," cried Feyshad, "I love no one, nor have I ever loved mortal in this world. Water, I pray you, water!"

"No man has lived in my cities," said the Fata Morgana, "for longer than a moment of time, for no man born of woman is content even with happiness. One plucks a flower in my gardens, another a fruit from a tree, another a jewel from the wealth in my bazaars. Not content, craving for ever for the unreal which men have misnamed 'the real,' they must touch and have, and that ever brings them to ill-luck, who drives them forth from the gates of my paradise. But enter, O Feyshad, and remember!"

And lo! Sire, Feyshad found himself seated in the courtyard of his own house in Old Cairo, and the fountain in its centre played beneath the sun, casting its diamond bright waters to the sky, and the great acacia planted by his father cast upon Feyshad its pleasant shadow. His thirst had vanished at the sight of the water, nor did he notice that the fountain was but the ghost or shade of a fountain without song or sound, and that the leaves of the acacia moved in the breeze without a whisper.

II.

His tortoise crawled upon the pavement of the courtyard. Through an open door he saw within the house the figure of his wife like a brown shadow against the sunlight of a window that lay beyond. She was grinding coffee, but of the sound of grinding there was none. And though Feyshad was fond of coffee he did not call upon his wife to bring it to him as was his wont. The thought of it was sufficient to satisfy his desire even as the thought of the fountain water was sufficient to satisfy his thirst.

Filled with a great happiness he sat, and as he sat thus he remembered the words of the Fata Morgana, "Should you meet there any one you love, should you see them, though it be a league away, or though it be but their reflection in a mirror, at that instant all will vanish."

And as he murmured the words he smiled, for Feyshad did not love his wife, and when his child entered the courtyard and ran in pursuit of a butterfly with amber wings he smiled again, for Feyshad did not love his child. He sat contentedly in the shade of the acacia and watched his wife and his child and the crawling tortoise, and the dancing water, and the waving leaves; and all this while, Sire, his body was sitting upon the desert sands beneath the burning sun, but sun or sands were nought to him, for around him the Fata Morgana had laid the ghost of the city of Cairo, fetched from a hundred leagues away; where, indeed, his child was chasing a butterfly at that moment, and his wife was grinding coffee, and his fountain was playing in the sunlight, and his acacia waving in the breeze, just as he beheld them in the desert.

Forever he might have sat there, happy beyond the dreams of man, but a merchant, Sire, is ever a merchant, even though he live in Paradise; and presently Feyshad said to himself, "I will arise and go into the bazaars."

At that moment might have been seen a great way off the caravan returning to seek for Feyshad, and the people of the caravan beheld before them, over against the place where Feyshad was, the city of Cairo, with its palm trees, mosques, and minarets, and they laughed, for they knew it was the work of Fata Morgana.

III.

Feyshad, Sire, fearful of being robbed, placed his sack of jewels in a hole beneath the fountain, for a merchant is always fearful of robbers, even in the land of Happy Illusion; and he placed them there not knowing that he was burying them in the sand, where they would never be found again. And then he left what seemed to his eyes the courtyard of his house, and began to walk about upon the sands whereon Fata Morgana had laid the streets and bazaars of Cairo.

In the bazaars sat the merchants smoking their pipes, whilst around them lay piled their wealth, silks and brocades, and jewels, and, as Feyshad wandered and looked, the happiness fell from him. For, though the sight of the fountain water had quenched his thirst, and the sight of his wife and of the coffee had satisfied his desires, the sight of the gems and rich silks, far from giving him satisfaction, made him unhappy, inasmuch as they were not his.

He paused at the shop of El Kobir the goldsmith, and, seizing upon a vase of gold encrusted with turquoise, cried out, "El Kobir, what price?" But El Kobir neither drew the amber mouthpiece of his pipe from his lips nor turned his head, so Feyshad put the vase beneath his robe and walked on.

As El Kobir did not cry after him, he knew that the bazaars and all they contained were his; a great hunger for riches came upon him, and he cast the vase of gold in the street, and it fell upon a sleeping dog, who neither moved nor raised an eyelid. Then Feyshad ran to the shop of a silk merchant, and, taking therefrom a great bag of silk embroidered with golden melon flowers, returned with it on his shoulders to the shop of El Kobir. There he took all the diamonds he could find, and cast them in his sack, and rubies and emeralds as well, and when there was nothing left for him to take, he cried out in derision, "El Kobir, what price?"

But El Kobir did not see him nor the loss of the jewels, but sat smoking his pipe and conversing with a Greek, heedless of Feyshad and his evil doings.

Then, Sire, Feyshad went to the shop of a Jew, and took a little vial of attar of roses, and a dagger with a ruby hilt, and an elephant of gold with jewelled eyes, and a bag of sequins; and the Jew, who, at that moment, was, in fact, asleep in his shop in Cairo, dreamt that he was being robbed, but he could not prevent Feyshad from taking his things, and Feyshad hastened home rejoicing with the sack upon his shoulders.

Though it seemed to him that he had spent several hours in the bazaars, it is impossible that he could have been there longer than a moment, for, to his astonishment, when he entered the courtyard of his house, his child was still in pursuit of the butterfly with amber wings, and the tortoise he had left crawling upon the pavement had not gained an inch towards its goal, and his wife was still grinding the coffee.

Feyshad felt a great thirst from his exertions, and the sight of the fountain did not allay it as before.

* Khayf, an idleness of the soul and body unknown or but partly known to northern peoples.

He emptied his sack of the stolen jewels, and covered the glittering heap with leaves plucked from the acacia, and then he cried, "How happy am I that I have never loved, else the sight of my wife, or my child, or a friend would have banished me forever from this land where I may rob all day and be happy. Now will I quench my thirst at the fountain, and, leaving my jewels here, return to the bazaars for more."

But, Sire, the hand of Allah reaches even to the land of Happy Illusion. As Feyshad bent to drink he beheld a person whom he loved, for, in the clear waters of the fountain, he beheld the reflection of his own face.

IV.

At that moment, Sire, the people of the approaching caravan saw the phantom city that lay before them trembling, from the green palm trees at its walls to the domes that cut the sky, and then it vanished like a dream, leaving nought but a black speck upon the sand, which was Feyshad.

The jewels he had hidden for safety beneath the shadow fountain were never found again, nor the jewels he had covered with the leaves of the acacia.

And to-day, Sire, he sits at the gates of Cairo begging alms, or wanders through the bazaars gazing upon the jewels that once were his—in the land of Happy Illusion.

Notes.

In another column Mr. Goldwin Smith—the most illustrious of the Canadian authors—expounds his views on the subject of Canadian copyright. His first proposition—that the question ought to be "settled by an Imperial Statute"—does not admit of argument. As was pointed out by the Canadian High Court, in the leading case of "Smiles v. Belford," the rights conferred by the Imperial Act of 1842 cannot be taken away, or modified, by any legislative body other than the Imperial Parliament, so long as Canada remains an integral portion of the British Empire. Cadit questio. But Mr. Goldwin Smith's second point—that "there should not be a 'manufacturing clause' requiring a book for which copyright is sought to be set up in the colony for the benefit of colonial printers"—goes to the heart of the matter. Such a provision, our correspondent justly remarks, would sacrifice "the universal interests of literature and science to those of a mechanical and local trade." This is, in effect, what we ourselves said in our first article upon the subject.

Hardly less satisfactory is the line now taken by the Toronto Globe—a journal which, we believe, speaks on behalf of Canadian publishers. It says:—

The guns of the opposition are trained on a supposititious proposition that the Canadian publisher is to be empowered to publish an English copyright work, whether the holder of it is willing or not. Now let it be said, once for all, that no such proposition is made. If what is now asked for were granted, the English holder of the copyright would be perfectly free to maintain his rights in Canada. All that is asked for is that, when he sells his Canadian rights by a free bargain with a Canadian publisher, the latter shall be protected in the property he has bought.

This, clearly, is a demand to which, if it means nothing more than it says, no objection can possibly be taken. But it is very different from the original demand of the Canadian printers. Sir John Thompson's Act, embodying their demands, with its obnoxious "manufacturing clause," represents the position on which "the guns of the opposition were trained." If that position is now definitely abandoned the guns of the opposition need not, of course, go on bombarding it; but it must by no means be inferred that it can be recouped with impunity because the bombardment is suspended.

"It is vastly amusing to me," writes a correspondent, "to read in your current issue that Mr. Ignatius Donnelly, after having proved to his own satisfaction that Francis Bacon was the author of Shakespeare's plays, now proposes to demonstrate by his infallible cipher that Ben Jonson's plays are also the work of the same all-accomplished hand. A more ingenious way of discrediting the witness whose evidence is the hardest nut the 'Shaconians' have to crack it would have been hardly possible to devise. It irresistibly recalls to my mind an anecdote—probably of the ben trovato order—which was current at Oxford in my undergraduate days. To many of your readers it will doubtless be a 'chestnut,' but the closeness of the analogy with Mr. Donnelly's proceedings which it suggests must be my excuse.

"A certain highly-respected Head of a House had 'Popery on the brain' and saw the machinations of the Society of Jesus everywhere. On one occasion at a table d'hôte in Switzerland the somewhat priestly-looking countenance of one of the younger waiters attracted his suspicious attention, and as soon as dinner was over he sought out his host, and said that he thought it his duty to inform him that he had come across this youth a few weeks before as the inmate of a Jesuit seminary. 'That, Monsieur,' replied the landlord with a smile—'that, pardon me, is impossible, for Franz has been in my service for more than a year.' 'And then,' said the reverend gentleman, solemnly concluding the story, 'And then I knew that the landlord was a Jesuit.' Even so, alike by speech and by silence, Ben Jonson refutes the preposterous theory that Bacon wrote the thirty-six plays of Shakespeare. But what does that prove? Why, clearly, that Jonson was himself a party to a similar fraud, and that Bacon played 'ghost' to him in the production of his own dramas."

The sad death of Mr. Macdonald, the editor of the Calcutta Englishman, reminds one how extensive are the annals of Calcutta journalism. The Englishman itself dates from 1820; and at that period the Calcutta presses were already turning out periodicals devoted to a great variety of interests—from science to belles lettres, and from sport to the propagation of the Gospel. The actual beginning was in 1780, in which year appeared the first number of Hicky's Bengal Gazette or Calcutta General Advertiser. This is a journal consisting of four pages, about the size of those of the Spectator, printed with such ink on such paper that, nowadays, old numbers of it can with difficulty be read. It contained short news-letters from various places, a poet's corner, and some interesting advertisements. Among these is one, headed "Elopement," for the return of a runaway slave, and another announcing a performance of The School for Scandal at the theatre.

Much progress is visible in the India Gazette which began to appear in 1782. This also consists of four pages; but they have grown from the size of the Spectator to that of the Guardian, and the ink and paper are all that could be desired. The contents are much the same as before, though we find an interesting report of a fancy dress ball, and a controversy on the morality of duelling. The Recruiting Serjeant is now being played at the theatre; and the advertisement of this entertainment shows the "d-d nigger" sentiment in full blast. We read:—

The Managers of the Theatre finding that the present low price of the Gallery has been the means of admitting all degrees of Black Servants into that part of the House; in order to prevent the intrusion of such persons in future, they have raised the price of Gallery Tickets to Four Sicca Rupees.

Indian journalism in general has latterly trained quite its fair share of prominent literary men. Mr. Rudyard Kipling is, of course, the leading instance. But there are plenty of others—such as Mr. Phil Robinson, Mr. Louis Tracy, Mr. Wilfrid Pollock, and Mr. A. P. Sinnett.

Mr. Macdonald, as his name indicates, was a Scotsman, and had assisted Dr. Ross in the production of the Globe Encyclopædia. For a while he worked on the Daily Telegraph, and proceeded to India in 1880. He edited the Civil and Military Gazette, with Mr. Kipling for assistant editor, and is the "A. M." to whom Mr. Kipling dedicated an early collection of his verses.

From Lahore he proceeded to Calcutta to edit the Englishman, and at the time of his death he was acting as the London representative of that paper.

Another interesting, if not very notable, journalist whose death is announced is Mr. John King Coxon. Mr. Coxon was the manager of the Nottingham Journal at the time when Mr. J. M. Barrie was a member of the editorial staff. A humorous but good natured portrait of him is included in the picture gallery of "When a Man's Single." At the time of his death, however, Mr. Coxon was a journalist no longer, but had left the profession to become a hotel-keeper.

Dr. A. B. Grosart, who died the other day at Dublin, at the age of 63, had rendered valuable services to literature as an editor of reprints and as a writer on historical subjects. He had edited Fuller's Worthies, the works of Herrick and Sidney, and the discourses of many Puritan divines, as well as the Towneley Hall MSS., and a number of early English plays. He had written an authoritative life of Robert Fergusson, the Scottish poet, a volume of sketches of "Representative Non-conformists," and many other books. In the British Museum catalogue there are 102 entries under his name. Dr. Grosart was a minister of the United Presbyterian Church of Scotland.

In his recollections of Mr. Rudyard Kipling, which we published last week, Mr. E. Kay Robinson mentioned that, in his Indian days, Mr. Kipling expected to establish his fame by a novel called "Mother Maturin." A curious confirmation of the statement is found in an interview with Mr. Kipling, published in the World in 1890, where it is mentioned that the MS. of this particular "forthcoming" work was taken out of a quaint Dutch bureau and shown to the interviewer. Another book which Mr. Kipling then had in MS. but has never yet issued to the public is called "The Book of the Forty-five Mornings," and is an account of his wanderings in Japan and America on his way home to England.

M. André Chevrillon is to continue in the Revue de Paris of April 1 his study of Mr. Kipling. In this fresh instalment of a work of criticism worthy of Taine, he touches upon that side of Kipling's work which appeals most frankly to the "Anglo-Saxon" soul. M. Chevrillon professes, however, the keenest admiration for Mr. Kipling and feels grateful to a country which, as he has said:—"Après avoir produit tant de génies en a donné au monde un si nouveau, si original, si puissant et inattendu."

Mr. Dunne, the author of the most popular book that has sprung out of the Spanish-American War, which we reviewed recently, has long been connected with Chicago newspapers, and he is at present the managing editor of the Chicago Evening Journal, and years ago began to write "skits" on topics of the times for the Chicago Press under the name of "Mr. Dooley," which were copied throughout the country. But "Mr. Dooley" did not really become famous till the Spanish War inspired him. It is said that his comments on Admiral Dewey's performances in Manila Bay drew from the Admiral a message of thanks and the statement that, among all the newspaper comments on his success, none other had given him so much pleasure. His medium of expression reproduces the brogue heard in county Roscommon, Ireland, and Mr. Dunne is himself an Irish-American born in the United States.

The Daily Mail gives publicity to a scheme in which a certain number of struggling men of letters will be interested. This is nothing less than the establishment of a bank (or pawnbroking business) to advance money on literary security. Presented without details the project cannot very well be criticized. That it might lend itself to grave abuses is clear. Yet an equitable charge on a manuscript may, under certain circumstances, be worth as much as an equitable charge on a piece of land; and if men who understand the value of manuscripts go into the money-lending business, there is no reason why they should not advance money at moderate rates to their own advantage and the convenience of their clients. Such a business, which is sure to be done by some one, is more likely to be done honestly by an institution founded for the express purpose of doing it, and challenging criticisms of its methods.

Our note on Mr. Morley Roberts' story of the two clerks who tried, independently, to poison their chief, but gave him mutual antidotes with the result that nothing happened, has brought us some letters which should be instructive to sensational novelists. Mr. H. C. Hart writes, from County Donegal, to point out that the device has already been used by Dryden:—

In Don Sebastian (iii., i.) [he says] Dorax is practically assassinated by two independent poisoners unaware of each other's designs. But the poisons counteract each other, and her life is saved.

And Mr. Hart further refers us to the line of Ausonius:—

Et quum fata volunt, bina venena juvant.

So that the question now is—What will Mr. Morley Roberts say if confronted with the charge of having plagiarized, without acknowledgment, from Ausonius for the purposes of "King Billy of Ballarat"? On the other hand Mr. G. Rayleigh Vicars turns the cold searchlight of science on the problem, saying:—

If A administers atropine to C, and B administers pilocarpine to C, B is neutralizing the poison administered by A, and A is neutralizing that administered by B. Theoretically such a condition might exist; practically the conditions would have to be very unique for a consummation.

Whence the conclusion obviously is that this sort of poisoning in fiction is all right for romanticists, but that realists had better avoid it.

An attack on the Society of Authors, published in a Sunday paper, claims a passing comment. The gist of the complaint is that two of the Society's enterprises—its dinner and its publications—result in a financial loss. The reply to the first charge is, of course, that dining is not a branch of money making; to the second, that the publication of certain works which ought to be published, but are nevertheless bound to show a loss, is precisely one of the purposes for which the Society of Authors was founded. If this is the worst that the enemies of the Society have to say, it is hardly likely to suffer materially from their attacks. The further complaint is made that the Society of Authors does not transform itself into an Authors' Publishing Company. That is a proposal which has often been before the Committee of Management, and has always been rejected, for reasons which seem to us not only satisfactory but obvious. So long as publishers treat authors fairly the Society does not aspire to oust them from their business. Its function is to keep all publishers in the straight and narrow way which honourable houses follow of their own accord. By doing this, it not only protects authors but publishers as well.

The French frequently complain of the absence of psychological studies in English novels, but they appear to have found an author who supplies this want, for, as we lately pointed out, Mr. George Gissing's works are being published in Paris as fast as they can be translated. Some years ago "Demos" was brought out in French. Then about two or three years ago Mlle. Blaize de Bury gave a lecture on "Gissing and his works," taking "New Grub Street" as her special theme. This book has now been translated and will appear shortly as a serial in the Débats. Last year a translation of "Eve's Ransom" was published in the Revue de Paris, and afterwards in volume form by Calmann Lévy. The same review will bring out shortly "The Town Traveller," "The Whirlpool" and "The Odd Women" are arranged for and will come out first as serials in two of the most important Parisian papers. Mr. Gissing's short stories also seem to have found favour. The Gaulois has had "Two Collectors" and the Revue Hebdomadaire has had "An Inspiration." "Our Mr. Jupp" has, we are told, been translated for the Monde Moderne, and "Comrades in Arms" for the Revue Bleue. The latter review will also publish one of the author's shorter novels, "The Paying Guest." All these, we may add, are excellently translated.

A writer in the Paris Temps has been calling for a careful translation of all Robert Louis Stevenson's principal romances. M. de Wyzewa finds great fault with the manner in which Stevenson has hitherto been translated into French. He speaks with just scorn of "the international jargon which forms nowadays the current language of our translators," and is afraid that "we may come to look upon the only writer of our time, perhaps, whose childlike genius has expressed feelings capable of being universally understood and enjoyed, as simply a pleasing writer of serial stories." It is to be hoped that M. de Wyzewa may induce some publisher to do what he suggests.

M. Paul Bonnetain, the novelist, author of "Le Tour du Monde d'un Troupier," "Charlot S'Amuse," "Une Femme à Bord," "Le Nommé Perreux," "Amours Nomades," "Au Tonkin," &c., has just died at Khong-Laos, where he represented French interests. Born at Nîmes in 1858, he entered the Infantry of Marine at Toulon and passed five years in the colonies, especially in Guiana and the Antilles. He then came to Paris to gain a living in journalism, and rapidly became an authority on colonial questions. He was a great traveller and made a remarkable journey to the Sudan, the record of which, "Voyage d'une Française au Soudan," was given literary form by his wife.

The daughter of George Sand, Mme. Clésinger, has just died in Paris. She was born in 1828, five years after her brother Maurice. In 1847 she married the sculptor Clésinger. There is a characteristic letter of George Sand on her daughter's marriage, in which she says:—

Our enragé sculptor is here. The idyll is in bloom at La Châtre and the grande princesse has become human enough to say yes. You were more perspicacious than I. She has had this yes in her heart for a long time, and didn't want to say it too soon, voilà tout. They seem enchanted both of them. I am, consequently.

This sets at rest the rumour, which arose later on from the evident incompatibility of the pair, that George Sand forced her daughter into the marriage against her will. Calmann Lévy published two novels by Mme. Clésinger—"Jacques Brunneau" and "Carl Robert"—and she was a painter of much talent.

The latest translator of Hamlet is a Royal one—the Grand Duke Constantine Constantinovitch of Russia, President of the Academy of Sciences. A private representation of the III. and IV. scenes of the Third Act, and the V., VI., and VII. scenes of the Fourth and Fifth Acts was given a week or two ago at the Marble Palace in St. Petersburg, the part of Hamlet being taken by the Grand Duke himself. The scenes from the Third Act are to be published in one of the manuals issued in commemoration of the Poushkin celebration.

A complete translation of Poushkin into Italian is being made in Russia and printed by the Imperial Academy of Sciences. The Italian booksellers have subscribed for 40,000 copies of the work, which will be issued on June 7 of the present year.

Many fine book-plate designs are included in the annual exhibition of the Painter-Etchers, which is now open at 5a, Pall-mall east. The society numbers amongst its members some of the ablest ex-libris designers of the day, notably Mr. G. W. Eve and Mr. C. W. Sherborn. Very good designs are also exhibited by Messrs. C. M. Pott, C. Holroyd, D. Y. Cameron, A. Robertson, W. Monk, C. O. Murray, and Miss E. K. Martyn, while the Countess Feodora Gleichen sends (her only exhibit) the most charming "composite" design in the whole exhibition. Out of the 150 designs shown Mr. Sherborn contributes quite one-half, and included in these are representatives of all his varied styles. To contrast with his own work he has also lent some choice examples by old engravers—plates by Zuendt, Dürer, Chodowiecke, and the engraver, unknown, of the splendid ex-libris of Giulielmi van Hamme. Such fantastic work as the "Lady's book-plate," No. 192, representing an interior surrounded with a particularly heavy and spiritless border of fruit and flowers, need only be referred to as showing what a book-plate should not be. These medleys are outside the province of the book-plate proper, and are only so much good work misapplied. But it is armorial designs, such as No. 254, that of Mr. C. E. Kempe, and No. 262, that of the Ulster King at Arms, that show how fine Mr. Sherborn's work is at its best. There is a dignity about the armorial book-plate which is quite denied to its flamboyant competitors, and the air of repose and restraint which characterizes many of the ex-libris in this exhibition is very welcome just now when so much of the work expended upon book-plates is ending in mere meretriciousness owing to the mistaken effort made to get free of the natural conventionalities of the subject.

A catalogue just issued by Messrs. Robson and Co., of Coventry-street, W., contains an entry rarely met with in these days—viz., that of a copy of the first edition of Shakespeare's "A Midsummer Night's Dreame," printed in 4to. by James Roberts, 1600, and priced at £95. Several leaves are missing, but with this exception the book is large, sound, and complete. As a rule books of this kind are sold privately and do not find their way into catalogues. During the last twelve years only four copies of "A Midsummer Night's Dreame" have been sold by auction in this country, and the prices realized—ranging from £61 to £122—show a wonderful increase over those which once prevailed. It is a matter of mere antiquarian lore that in 1688 eleven early Shakespearean quartos were sold in one lot for 12s., but as late as 1812 we find a perfect "Midsummer Night's Dreame" bringing as little as £3 3s., and this at the sale of one of the most important libraries in the Kingdom. Indeed, at that time, original copies of the plays of Marlowe, Marston, Massinger, Thomas Middleton, Nash, and many other Elizabethan dramatists appear to have been in even greater request than those of Shakespeare. The prices realized show that they were, on the whole, more difficult to obtain, and the same may even be said to be the case now. Marlowe's "Dido, Queen of Carthage," 1594, for example, is a scarcer book than most of the first Shakespearean quartos, though it is not so valuable as a good copy of any one of them. The last eighty or ninety years has greatly improved the position held by the old dramatists.

American Letter.

AMERICAN LITERATURE IN EXILE.

In a recent lecture Sir Lepel Griffin is reported to have noted the unenviable primacy of the United States among countries where the struggle for material prosperity has been disastrous to the pursuit of literature. He said, or is said to have said (one cannot be too careful in attributing to a public man the thoughts that may be really due to an imaginative frame in the reporter), that among us "the old race of writers of distinction, such as Longfellow, Bryant, Holmes, and Washington Irving, have (sic) died out, and the Americans who are most prominent in cultivated European opinion in art or literature, like Sargent, Henry James, or Marion Crawford, live habitually out of America and draw their inspiration from England, France, and Italy."

If this were true I confess that I am so indifferent to what many Americans glory in, that it would not distress me or wound me in the sort of self-love which calls itself patriotism. If it would at all help towards putting an end to that struggle for material prosperity which has eventuated with us in so many millionaires and so many tramps, I should be glad to believe that it was driving our literary men out of the country. This would be a tremendous object-lesson, and might be a warning to the millionaires and the tramps. But I am afraid it would not have this effect, for neither our very rich nor our very poor care at all for the state of polite learning among us : though, for the matter of that, I believe that economic conditions have little to do with it ; and that if a general mediocrity of fortune prevailed and there were no haste to be rich and to get poor the state of polite learning would not be considerably affected. As matters stand I think we may reasonably ask whether the Americans "most prominent in cultivated European opinion," the Americans who "live habitually out of America," are not less exiles than advance agents of the expansion now advertising itself to the world. They may be the vanguard of the great army of adventurers destined to overrun the earth from these shores, and exploit all foreign countries to our advantage. They probably themselves do not know it, but in the act of "drawing their inspiration" from alien scenes, or taking their own where they find it, are not they simply transporting to Europe "the struggle for material prosperity" which Sir Lepel supposes to be fatal to them here ?

There is a question, however, which comes before this, and that is the question whether they have quitted us in such numbers as justly to alarm our patriotism. Qualitatively, in the authors named and in Mr. Bret Harte, Mr. Stephen Crane, Mr. Harry Harland, and the late Mr. Harold Frederic, as well as in Mark Twain, now temporarily resident abroad, the defection is very great ; but quantitatively it is not such as to leave us without a fair measure of home-keeping authorship. Our destitution is not nearly so great now in the absence of Mr. James and Mr. Crawford as it was in the times before the "struggle for material prosperity," when Washington went and lived in England and on the Continent well-nigh half his life.

Sir Lepel Griffin—or Sir Lepel Griffin's reporter—seems to forget the fact of Irving's long absenteeism when he classes him with "the old race" of eminent American authors who stayed at home. But really none of those he names was so constant to our air as he seems—or his reporter seems—to think. Longfellow sojourned three or four years in Germany, Spain, and Italy ; Holmes spent as great a time in Paris ; Bryant was a frequent traveller, and each of them "drew his inspiration" now and then from alien sources. Lowell was many years in Italy, Spain, and England ; Motley spent more than half his life abroad ; Hawthorne was away from us nearly a decade.

If I seem to be proving too much in one way, I do not feel that I am proving too much in another. My facts go to show that the literary spirit is the true world-citizen, and is at home everywhere. If any good American were distressed by the absenteeism of our authors I should first advise him that American literature was not derived from the folk-lore of the Red Indians, but was, as I have said once before, a condition of English literature, and was independent even of our independence. Then I should entreat him to consider the case of foreign authors who had found it more comfortable or more profitable to live out of their respective countries than in them. I should allege for his consolation the case of Byron, Shelley, and Leigh Hunt, and more latterly that of the Brownings and Walter Savage Landor, who preferred an Italian to an English sojourn ; and yet more recently that of Mr. Rudyard Kipling, who voluntarily lived several years in Vermont, and has "drawn his inspiration" in notable instances from the life of these States. It will serve him also to consider that the two greatest Norwegian authors, Bjørnsen and Ibsen, have both lived long in France and Italy. Heinrich Heine loved to live in Paris much better than in Düsseldorf, or even in Hamburg ; and Turgueneff himself, who said that any man's country could get on without him, but no man could get on without his country, managed to dispense with his own in the French capital, and died there after he was quite free to go back to St. Petersburg. In the last century Rousseau lived in France rather than Switzerland ; Voltaire at least tried to live in Prussia ; Goldoni left fame and friends in Venice for the favour of Princes in Paris.

Literary absenteeism, it seems to me, is not peculiarly an American vice or an American virtue. It is an expression and a proof of the modern sense which enlarges one's country to the bounds of civilization. I cannot think it justly a reproach in the eyes of the world, and if any American feels it a grievance I suggest that he do what he can to have embodied in the platform of his party a plank affirming the right of American authors to a public provision that will enable them to live as agreeably at home as they can abroad on the same money. In the meantime, their absenteeism is not a consequence of "the struggle for material prosperity," not a high disdain of the strife which goes on, not less in Europe than in America—and must, of course, go on everywhere as long as competitive conditions endure—but is the result of chances and preferences which mean nothing nationally calamitous or discreditable.

SUBJECT INDEXES TO GENERAL LITERATURE.

[By ALFRED COTGREAVE, Chief Librarian to the West Ham Public Library.]

Owing to the vast increase in the literary output of recent years, considerable anxiety has been felt by librarians and others as to the possibility of keeping pace with such conditions, both in the additions to their stock of books and in the provision of adequate catalogues and other guides for the use of their readers. In the course of the discussion and controversy arising on these matters considerable attention has been directed to the question of Subject Indexes, and many valuable suggestions have been made, although as yet little has been effected with general literature, beyond giving the author and subject entries of the books.

The Subject Index may be divided into two classes—the one referring to the main subject of a book or work, which is generally set forth upon its title-page ; the other to the contents of a work which are not apparent from its title and are rarely noted in an ordinary catalogue. Taken singly or individually it will be found that almost every work published in these days, exclusive perhaps of prose fiction, gives not only a clear announcement of its main subject on the title-page, but also a description of its contents, often carefully arranged under subject headings, either in a list of contents or an index.

General indexes in connexion with special publications already exist—e.g., those of the Edinburgh Review, "Notes and Queries," "Encyclopædia Britannica," and The Times; but it is rare that any attempt has been made to collect such indexes together and form one general and universal index. No doubt the principal and most comprehensive work of the kind is the "American Index to Periodicals," founded by H. Poole, late librarian of Chicago, and the "American Library Association Index to General Literature," useful chiefly in connexion with American books. Miss Hetherington's "Review of Reviews Index to Periodicals" is also a most valuable and greatly appreciated work, and recently an "Index to German Periodicals," chiefly scientific, has been published. Minor attempts, useful to a limited circle, have been made in the catalogues of various libraries, among which may be named those of the Newcastle (first edition), Dundee, and Guille-Allés Libraries.

If the value of such limited indexes is obvious, how much would this be enhanced if some system could be devised by which a national encyclopædic index to the main contents of all suitable works could be compiled and classified under the various subjects dealt with. The reader and the student would then not be confined to the special works on any subject, but would be guided to an immense field of information now practically closed to him. This contention will be better understood and appreciated by a reference to Miss Hetherington's Index or to a Contents Subject Index of General Literature, now being issued in parts by the Public Library authorities of West Ham. Although this latter is but a drop in the ocean it may suffice as a humble illustration of what grand results might be attained by a universal index. For those of your readers who are not able to refer to the above works, such an extract as the following from the West Ham Index may be sufficiently illustrative :—

With a more extensive index it would be advisable to classify the references belonging to each subject.

Although for the purposes of illustrating the matter before us it is sufficient to refer to the above English Indexes, it is but fair in this connexion again to call attention to the American Indexes and to state that, in addition to those previously mentioned, there are several others of minor importance, and that some of their library catalogues are, in themselves, very valuable indexes, not only to the main subjects of the books, but also to their contents. It is a pleasure to make this acknowledgment, and it is to be hoped that when next their Library Journal comments upon our attempts to emulate their enterprise, they will at least give us credit for our good intentions.

To make such a work of general value, it is needless to say, would be a task of gigantic dimensions and only possible of accomplishment by co-operative effort, such as that in connexion with Poole's Index, but to a much greater extent. Various methods or plans are suggested as a basis upon which the work could be undertaken, from which the following might be selected, if found practicable, as the one likely to produce the best and greatest results :—

1. The Government, through the British Museum, or, failing this, the Library Association or some other important literary society, to undertake the work.

2. Only contemporary literature to be indexed, as a rule. A selection, however, might be made from English classics.

3. Every living author to be notified of this work, either directly or through the publishers, and requested to furnish a synopsis of each of his books, except works of fiction, prior to publication. If this could be done through the publishers greater returns would result. At the worst, it appears certain that the majority of authors would respond; in most cases out of sympathy with such an undertaking, in a few possibly because of the advertisement their works would receive. It might be found worth while to publish an index volume to historical and topical novels.

4. Considering the immense number of new books published each year, the index should be an annual one and be divided under subjects—i.e., the many volumes of index which even one year's literary work would require should be divided into, say, one for literature, one for biography, one for history, one for science, or even for each branch of science if sufficient matter to require it, one for travel and topography, &c.

5. The whole of the work to be carried through by a body of experts under the direction of one chief editor.

By the above plan the following advantages would be secured :—The labour would be greatly minimized by its division among so many hands; the character of the references in any work, being given by its own author, would be accurate and reliable; and, last but not least, the work would be within the reach of every one, as the volume representing any particular subject could be purchased separately, while the whole index series would be available free of charge at most of our Public Libraries.

There are, of course, other plans, which, however, do not present such probabilities of success except where the scope of the work is considerably reduced. It is rather a melancholy reflection that, although possessing the richest literature in the world, we evince so little disposition to enlighten the public as to the vast stores of hidden treasure which exist in our libraries, and await but the "Open Sesame" of the Subject Index to unfold themselves to the entranced and astonished gaze of the artist, the man of science, and the littérateur. It does seem a strange anomaly that until recently the only general indexes to the contents of English books and periodicals should have been compiled and published in America, and consequently that an Englishman wishing to collect all the information possible on any subject from English books can only do so by referring to a great extent to the indexes provided by another country. It is, however, to be sincerely hoped that for the honour of our librarians and men of letters this will not continue much longer, but that a movement will be inaugurated for the publication of an English index which shall, like most other English productions and enterprises, be excelled by none.

FICTION.

No. 5, John Street. By Richard Whiteing. 7 $\frac{1}{2}$ × 5 $\frac{1}{2}$ in., 337 pp. London, 1899. Grant Richards. 6/-

No one who had read "The Island: The Adventures of a Person of Quality" could fail to anticipate with genuine interest a new book by Mr. Richard Whiteing. It is eleven years since that brilliant and vivid study convinced many that they had found a new writer of unquestionable individuality. A second book from the same pen has come at last, and "No. 5, John Street" seems to us in many ways an abler and finer achievement. The title is not attractive, though when the reader has finished the story, "No. 5, John Street" seems the inevitable title. The idea of a sociological study in the guise of fiction is still less alluring, for rare, indeed, have been the successes in this particular literary genre, but we have read the book with increasing admiration. Mr. Whiteing has a mordant, epigrammatic style which suits well a narrative such as "No. 5, John Street," but it is the genial humour, the urbane yet trenchant satire, and the real humanity of his romance which will most commend it to the general reader.

The story is the personal narrative of a man of fortune who voluntarily accepts the life of the extreme poor in a swarming metropolitan region, lives their life without knowledge of any of his friends, and in complete disguise, as a wage-earner or (as he soon discovers) as a pittance-earner. The average daily existence of the civic "riff-raff" has been as closely observed by Mr. Whiteing as by Mr. Arthur Morrison, but with greater width and a more harmonious vision. This becomes evident when the contrast comes of those chapters wherein are depicted scenes as different from No. 5, John Street, as can be imagined. For the "hero" goes back for a time to his old life, to return for a time, later, to ill-smelling, ill-living John Street, and the men and women whom he has come to know and sympathize with. He goes back with an awakened mind, with quickened thought. It is no restricted faculty that can so surely depict types so distinct as Sir Marmaduke Ridler and his Beau-Brummel of a son, Seton; the genial ruffian, Low Covey (with his delightful bird-warbling weakness); the Piccadilly Amazonian flower-seller, Tilda, and her frailer comrade, Nance; Atkinson, the valet, and Conroy, the slum missionary; Azrael, the horrible anarchist, and the overwhelmingly vulgar, but saintly, and, in a sense, winning, Salvation lass.

On the deeper problems indicated we need not say more than that they are disclosed by one who obviously has long pondered them, and is possessed by their immediate and pressing significance. Mr. Richard Whiteing, in fact, has written a work which must make every thinking man and woman who may read it pause and consider. There are things greater than literary achievement, and Mr. Whiteing, who has achieved so much, owes his success to that knowledge.

The fact that YOUNG LIVES, by Mr. Richard Le Gallienne (Arrowsmith, 6s.), is strictly autobiographical and is, indeed, rather a volume of reminiscences than anything else, must, we suppose, be ignored by the critic; even though it may account for what might seem to him imperfections in the story—a certain looseness in the plot and a reluctance to paint some of the characters too closely. Without pressing these criticisms too far, and dropping all preconceptions, we find this book very delightful reading. It tells the story of "young lives" in a manufacturing town in the north, nurtured within the narrow circle of commercial nonconformity, and rebelling, in their youthful ardour for art, letters, and a fuller life, against the chill routine of business, and the dullness of domestic Puritanism. The stages of their revolt, their aspirations—crude, yet so fresh and buoyant—their loves, their wanderings in the world of art and letters, are told with an easy, descriptive charm. And the description loses nothing by a ready recognition of human sympathies even among those who know no æsthetic life. The disillusionment felt by the young North Country poet on his first visit to London is well told. In an idle hour on a sunny morning after his first night in the Metropolis he had bought some flowers in the Strand and laid them on Goldsmith's grave in the Temple. In the evening he attends an "At home" at his publishers, where the "wits" assemble, and he sees curious types and hears talk of Mallarmé, of Celtic legend, of "strange sins" and of secret societies.

He considered that he had inherited the hard-won gains of the Rationalists. But he came to London and found young men, feebly playing with the fire of that Romanism which he regarded as at once the most childish and the most dangerous of all intellectual obsessions. In an age of great biologists and electricians, he came upon children prettily talking about fairies and the philosopher's stone. In one of the greatest ages of English poetry, he came to London to find young English poets falling on their knees to the metrical mathematicians of France. In the great age of Democracy, a fool had come and asked him if he were not a supporter of the House of Stuart, a Jacobite of Charades. But only once had he heard the name of Milton . . . and never once had he heard the voice of simple human feeling, nor heard one speak of beauty, simply, passionately, with his heart in his mouth; nor of love with his heart upon his sleeve. Much cleverness, much learning, much charm, there had been, but he had missed the generous human impulses. No one seemed to be doing anything because he must. These were pleasant eddies, dainty with lilies, and curiously starred water-grasses; but the great warm stream of English literature was not flowing here.

As he neared his hotel, he thought of his morning visit to Goldsmith's tomb, and tenfold he repented the little half-sneer with which he had bought the flowers. In a boyish impulse he rang the Temple bell, and found his way again to the lonely corner. His flowers were lying there in the moonlight, and again he read, "Here lies Oliver Goldsmith." "Forgive me, Goldy," he murmured. "Well may men bring you flowers, for you wrote not as those, yonder. You wrote for the human heart."

This unschooled and unaffected taste for good literature is, we are afraid, a flower hard to find and worth preserving when found. Mr. Le Gallienne has in this book a very congenial theme, and he never drops into any of the faults of taste which sometimes marred "The Quest of the Golden Girl." There is a note of wide sympathy and of enduring human affection all through it, and it shows to advantage the writer's peculiar gift—that of clothing with an idyllic grace even the most prosaic characters and situations.

There are some points in the character and artistic history of RUPERT ARMSTRONG, by O. Shakespeare (Harper, 6s.), which suggest that the hero is intended as a portrait. The story is one of considerable merit, dealing with a daughter's devotion to her father, of her devotion to his higher and better self as an artist, and of her long and futile struggle to help him to recover his lost ideal. A sincere and felt piece of work, well realized and very well written.

LOVE AND OLIVIA, by Margaret B. Cross (Hurst and Blackett, 6s.), is so called on account of "the sentimental troubles of a clever woman." But these troubles are treated anything but sentimentally. In fact, the author has a pronounced sense of humour, and we laugh with her behind the scenes at the entirely useless conscientiousness of her wrongly assorted pair of lovers, knowing that she will extricate them in her own time. Olivia is an essentially modern heroine, with a saving femininity behind her learning and earnestness of purpose. The man she feels bound to marry is awed by her superiority, and prefers the frivolous type of rosebud girl to a lady lecturer on the classics. The man she does marry, on the other hand, loves her for the ordinary lovable young woman whom he divines behind the lecturer. It is a charming novel.

Mr. William J. Locke's novels, "At the Gate of Samaria" and "Derelicts," cause one to look with interest towards any new work from his pen. IDOLS (Lane, 6s.) is almost melodramatic, but the characters are too skilfully drawn to be called stagey. An imbroglio of perjury, secret marriage, murder, almost takes the reader's breath away, and just as we have begun to understand the characters they act quite inconsistently with our idea of them, just as if they were real people. A trifle more attention to the probabilities would have made the book more convincing, and though the style is admirably firm and clear the author is always too busy with his next coup de théâtre to brighten his effects with the humour and comedy which jostle the melodramatic in every-day life. Sound as Mr. Locke's work is, we feel sure he could give us a still more powerful study of social comedy.

A MAYFAIR MARRIAGE (Grant Richards, 6s.), by Grammont Hamilton, is an unusually entertaining novel written in a frank and original manner. It relates the experiences of Sappho, the gifted, newly-married wife of a young lawyer, and presents us with many cleverly-drawn pictures of people and many humorous situations. It might be described as "Affinities" up-to-date, and "Grammont Hamilton" as the Mrs. Campbell Praed of the 'eighties with an added subtlety, and with humour—that salt which is too often left out of the dish. Now that novels are so often grey in tone, it is agreeable to come across a book like "A Mayfair Marriage." There are carelessly-written passages, and the style is sometimes slipshod, but it is throughout light, witty, and clever.

Mrs. Alexander occupies a respectable place in what we may, perhaps, describe as the superficial school of English novelists. She discovers no new psychological truths, and devises no impressive situations; but she has the knack of stringing incidents together so that a reader with no more serious occupation in hand is lured on pleasantly from page to page. Her latest story, BROWN, V.C. (Unwin, 6s.), has the true ring of melodrama. As Japhet went through life in search of a father, so Brown goes through life in search of a mother. Ultimately he finds her under somewhat sensational circumstances. Having won his honourable decoration by an act of gallantry, he is introduced to the wife of his general. The lady recognizes him as her long lost son (though the general is not his long lost father). It turns out that he is a Viscount, and he marries and lives happily ever afterwards. One can say, without fear of contradiction, that "if people like this sort of thing, this is the sort of thing that they will like."

Mr. Cosmo Hamilton calls his novel, THE GLAMOUR OF THE IMPOSSIBLE (Chatto and Windus, 3s. 6d.), "an improbability," but it is not so distinctly so as many modern stories. Mabel Jefferies falls in love with an artist, Hartley Fennel, and seven young gentlemen from Colonel Wauchope's army cramming establishment fall in love with her. Then Mabel finds that Fennel is married and the seven young gentlemen find that they have been made fools of. The story is fragile, but contains a good deal of clever work in the character sketches of the seven lovers and of Mabel herself. All that happens takes place between Mabel's first and second dance :—

With her first dance a girl knows what must be her particular line in life. If she is rushed at, gazed at wordlessly by everything male, she may adopt the petulant-majestic. If she is only danced with under protest, and is obliged to sit out the latter halves of waltzes with men "whose wind isn't so good as it used to be," the kindly-sweet is her rôle. If, after the preamble round with her hostess's son, she blossoms into a wallflower, then it must be the shocked-religious. The book may incur the charge of flippancy, but we prefer to call it gay and amusing.

Much may be forgiven to the author who produces a captivating heroine. In THE DEAR IRISH GIRL (Smith, Eldor, 6s.) there is, however, little need for forgiveness; it is throughout bright and wholesome, pleasantly written, and with that knowledge of Irish life and character which we have a right to expect from Mrs. Tynan-Hinkson. Biddy O'Connor is a delightful Irish girl indeed. The story is very slight. It has neither an involved plot nor any wealth of exciting incident; it might almost be called a novel reduced to its simplest terms. We have love at first sight, the customary obstacle, and the happy ending. There is little or nothing else, and yet the result is as charming a book as any one need wish to read, which only proves that the most ordinary love story, delicately handled, has a perennial interest. There is something old-fashioned about Mrs. Tynan-Hinkson's method which invests her work with a certain gracefulness none too common in these days. The characters, too, are pleasant companions; there are no villains, unless we except a rather sour-tempered aunt and a suitor who might be considered somewhat pertinacious. It is true that young Maurice O'Hara errs a little on the side of perfection—he is a lady novelist's hero—but he is a good fellow for all that. The Irish servants are admirable.

Mr. Joseph Jacobs has written a long and interesting introduction to the present issue of Adelbert Chamisso's classic PETER SCHLEMIHL, THE SHADOWLESS MAN (Geo. Allen, 6s.), in which he states that this queer work may claim to be one of the few imaginative books containing a clearly new symbolic incident.

It is [he says] the distinction of "Peter Schlemihl" to possess an entirely novel plot. . . . None who has read the book will ever forget the shrinking of the old women and the little boys and the beloved from the man without a shadow. . . . The incident of rolling up Peter's shadow and packing it away invariably recurs to any one who has read the book, and, at the same time, conveys a sense that there is more in the action than mere phantasy.

This is the main point of Chamisso de Boncourt's rather weak, and, towards the end, slightly tedious work. Writing between the days of Jena and the retreat from Moscow, he suffered the full weight of that wave of sentimentality which flooded literature with the coming of the romantic school.

"Schlemihl" has been translated into many languages, often more than once. There have been three editions in English, one by William Howitt, a second by Sir John Bowring, and the third, which appeared in Burns' Novelist Series in 1844, is the one at present reproduced, with certain modifications. Bowring's version was illustrated by George Cruikshank, whose peculiarly semi-grotesque style seems most admirably suited to the weird story. The present volume is illustrated by Sir Philip Burne-Jones, who appears to be devoting himself to black-and-white work. At present he is unaccomplished in this branch of art, such a drawing as that facing page 44 "Fanny perceived only her own shadow before us," cannot be said to adorn this otherwise agreeably prepared edition.

insouciant, and an outlaw, with a kindness for every woman, and an honest sweetheart of his own. When the cart is taking him to Tyburn our shudder is but a shudder of courtesy; for the black horse that is pulled up on its haunches, while its rider flourishes the reprieve, was expected by us with calm certainty. No author would draw Tom Tufton and then let him hang.

The subject of Mrs Aylmer Gowing's story, A TOUCH OF THE SUN (Burleigh, 6s.), is the marriage of an English girl to an Indian Prince, and she is at great pains to show the difference between Oriental and European ideas as regards matrimony. The book has little merit. The plot is somewhat forced, and it is often difficult to see any adequate motive for the action.

Books intended for young people ought not, perhaps, to refer to earthquakes as "seismic disturbances," but that is the only fault to be found with Mrs. George Corbett's LITTLE MISS ROBINSON CRUSOE (Pearson, 3s. 6d.). It is a bright story of a brave girl who took a boat and put to sea, and was lost in a fog, and was picked up by an "outward bound," and was wrecked on a tropical shore, and had many other equally satisfactory adventures.

IN THE SHADOW OF THE HILLS, by Alison McLean (Warne, 3s. 6d.), is as pleasant as everything else written by the author of "Quiet Stories from an Old Woman's Garden." These are some more "quiet stories" of village folk and their love affairs, told with a tenderness and pathos that remind one of Miss Mary Wilkins, and very seldom fall into sentimentality. The book has a frontispiece worth framing—a little October landscape by C. T. Davidson.

THE STORY OF NANNO, by Rosa Mulholland (Lady Gilbert) (Grant Richards, 6s.), is a very simple and pathetic one. Workhouse life is grimly drawn by Lady Gilbert, whom the Dublin Workhouse system would seem to have impressed very painfully. When, later on, Nanno gains an honest standing in the working world for both herself and her child, we are half inclined to regret the scruples that prevent her from accepting the married happiness offered her. She is a dignified and touching figure, and her tale is worth reading.

A WORLD BEWITCHED (Harper, 6s.), by Mr. James M. Graham, is a novel for the leisured reader in a country house. Notwithstanding its attractive title, and a plentiful supply of enchanters, magicians, werewolves, and witches brought to rough justice, its romantic period, its picturesque High Pyrenees, its Basques and its French, it is a little dull to those who already know their Scott and their Dumas. The story enacts itself at the end of the reign of Henri Quatre, when the faith in witchcraft was widely spread, and the persecutions vied in horrors with those of the Spanish Inquisition. There are many very wicked people in the book, who harass the innocent and beautiful, but towards the end Henri comes upon the scene and helps the fortunes of those who have gained our sympathy, and aids in the punishment of the evil-doers. Although occasionally tedious, Mr. Graham has no small feeling for picturesque drama.

HISTORICAL NOVELS.

THE SCOURGE OF GOD, by John Bloundelle-Burton (Clarke, 6s.), deals as much in hard knocks and heroic deeds as "The Clash of Arms" and the author's other novels, and is certainly no less readable. "Scourge of God" is a title which has been given to more than one character in history. This time it applies to Louis XIV. The story is described as a romance of religious persecution. It keeps very closely to historical fact, the sequence of events alone being occasionally altered to suit the plot. The opening chapter, which brings in Mme. de Maintenon, the "woman famous and fatal," and describes the deathbed of the old Princesse de Rochebazon, is among the most effective in the book, none of which is dull.

Mr. R. W. Chambers has chosen a poor title for his latest book, yet ASHES OF EMPIRE (Macmillan, 6s.) is well worth reading. In many respects it resembles "The Red Republic," the scene in both being laid in Paris at the close of the Franco-Prussian War. The resemblance is due partly to the author's method. Thin slices of a double love story are sandwiched in between hunks of historical narrative. The picture of the doomed city, rent by contending factions, while the Prussian shells are bursting in the streets and famine is blanching the faces of its inhabitants, is excellent, but while we would stay to watch it our conductor hurries us off to witness a little domestic drama played in a bird shop where two American war correspondents have come to lodge. The author's fantastic humour crops up in the most unexpected places, but it is when describing battles that he is seen at his best. "Ashes of Empire" will sustain his reputation.

Mr. William Westall follows his successful novel of the Tyrolean struggles for liberty, "With the Red Eagle," by a second vivid piece of work dealing with the characters and history of the rebellion. A RED BRIDAL (Chatto and Windus, 6s.) is intended to form a supplement rather than a sequel to the former romance, completing the story of the fight for the Fatherland. The book is dedicated to the memory of Andreas Hoffer, who is, of course, the main figure in Mr. Westall's picture. Apart from the excellent study of this hero's character, and the general picture of an unusually interesting historic period, the novel tells the love story of Janet Arnheim and her Bavarian soldier, Von Waldersee. All who enjoyed "With the Red Eagle" will find continued pleasure in reading Mr. Westall's latest book.

THE NEW MEREDITH.

The new edition of the "revised Merediths," which we have noticed as the volumes came from Messrs. Constable, has been completed. The last four volumes are:—"One of our Conquerors," with an interesting drawing by Mr. William Hyde, a view northward from London Bridge; two volumes of the "Poems," and "Lord Ormont and his Aminta," with a carefully designed illustration by Mr. J. Leslie Brooke. As we have previously said, this edition practically amounts to a second issue, at the lower price of 6s., of the edition de luxe published last year; the revisions in the novels are the same, and the arrangement of the poems is almost so. The two volumes of verse, while giving the bulk of Mr. Meredith's poems from the publication of "Modern Love," in 1862, to "Jump to Glory Jane," in 1892, and later works, do not include the poems written in early youth, and the so-called "Scattered Poems," which are to be found in the de luxe edition.

The popularity of Mr. Meredith's novels hardly extends to his poems. Landor wrote of another poet:—"Tho' hemp and flax and cotton are stronger for being twisted, verses and intellects certainly are not . . ." and there are poems in these two stout volumes of Mr. Meredith's verse which would be more beautiful if they possessed the quality of simplicity which gave "Modern Love" and "Love in the Valley" so much distinction. Now that the poems are published in so pleasant a form many more people will, perhaps, appreciate them. One might fairly invite the doubtful reader to approach them in the words of the opening lines of the author's poem, "The Woods of Westernmain":—

Enter these enchanted woods,
You who dare.
Nothing harms beneath the leaves
More than waves a swimmer cleaves.
Toss your heart up with the lark,
Foot at pace with mouse and worm,
Fair you fare.
Only at a dread of dark
Quaver, and they quit their form;
Thousand eyeballs under hoods
Have you by the hair.
Enter these enchanted woods,
You who dare.

The poems are also illustrated by Mr. Hyde—the first with a delicate and graceful drawing of Flint Cottage, Boxhill, where Mr. Meredith has lived so long; and the second with a sketch of the chalet in the garden where so many of his later works have been written. As a whole, this edition, reasonable in price and unpretentious but satisfactory in type and outward appearance, may well be said to be worthy of the remarkable series of works which we owe to the genius of Mr. Meredith.

Correspondence.

CANADIAN COPYRIGHT. TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—The Canadian Authors' Society, of which Mr. Ross, the Minister of Education for the province of Ontario, is the chairman and I am the honorary president, has been formed specially for the purpose of arriving at a settlement of the copyright question. Pending its deliberations, I feel under some restraint in expressing my individual opinion.

I may say, however, that there are two points on which in giving my adhesion to any proposal I should personally be inclined to insist.

One is that the question should be treated as Imperial and settled by an Imperial Statute, the special requirements of Canada and the other colonies being, of course, fully and respectfully considered. I can see nothing in this that would conflict with any reasonable theory of Canadian self-government. "Sovereign right," which some have claimed for Canada in this matter, she cannot have in any matter so long as she remains in the Imperial connexion. Her constitution is embodied in an Imperial Act of Parliament subject to alteration only by the same authority.

My second point is that there should not be a "manufacturing clause" requiring a book for which copyright is sought to be set up in the colony for the benefit of colonial printers. That such a provision, sacrificing as it does the universal interest of literature and science to those of a mechanical and local trade, should have been allowed to form a part of the arrangement between Great Britain and the United States has always seemed to me unfortunate, notwithstanding the measure of justice conceded by the arrangement to British authors.

As to any special provisions which may be deemed necessary on account of the peculiar circumstances of our Canadian publishers I cannot pretend to offer an opinion. I am not familiar enough with the subject to foresee the practical working of any particular enactment. For my own part, I must confess that I have always failed to understand very clearly why all that was necessary could not be done by private contract or arrangement. However, I leave this part of the matter entirely to the experts. I can only say, let justice be done.

You need, I think, have no fear of popular excitement in Canada on the subject. Nothing of the kind has appeared, or, so long as Canadian interests receive respectful attention, is it at all likely to appear.

Very truly yours,

March 6, 1899.

THE FIELD FOR MODERN VERSE. TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—In the number of Literature for Feb. 25 I read some allusions to a "field for modern verse," discovered by Mr. Phillips, as to which I beg leave to say a word, which, perhaps, few of your contributors have an equal right to speak. I have always been an interested reader of the mystics, and when Spiritism became the subject of public interest in America, nearly fifty years ago, I entered into a careful and patient investigation of it, lasting for several years, during which I witnessed certain phenomena which, for singularity and difficulty of explanation, are unrivalled by anything I have heard of from the "circles" which pretend to dispense "Light" on the existence of disembodied intelligences. And, in the course of these studies, I became a member for two winters of the circle presided over by Judge Edmonds, the most authoritative exponent of Spiritism in America in those days, and was a nightly auditor of the "communications made through trance or by the governed hand" most of which are preserved for the enlightenment of a sympathetic public in the Proceedings of the circle, the most notable of them being signed "Swedenborg" or "Bacon." Gammon there was, but nothing resembling the flavour of the Verulam article; and the net result of my most conscientious studies was, firstly, that there was no ground for disputing the actuality of the intervention of disembodied intelligences, independent of the control of any of the persons present, visibly, at the sittings; and, secondly, that, without a single exception, the subject-matter communicated "through trance or by the governed hand" was the most trivial and, generally, silly and brainless stuff ever put into words. I did not hear, from all the mediums I ever listened to, a single word which could in any verification be considered worthy serious study, or which conveyed an idea of the state of things after death beyond the induction of the most ordinary intellect, existence after death being premised.

A learned Greek professor in one of the New England universities wrote a book on the subject which he entitled "Apocatastasis," and in which he ransacked the ancient records for notes on the oracles; and in one of these notes he quotes a description of the manner in which Apollo produces the oracle. It is too long since I saw it for me to repeat the ipsisima verba, but the process was simple. The Pythoness being reduced to a state of coma, the God applies a divine pressure to her skull, and under it the brain yields certain forms of speech which were considered as a kind of "brain-dribble," and noted down, being afterward interpreted by authority. I observed in the circle that our Pythonesses, and the males of the species, seemed to abandon themselves to a sort of brain-dribble, and decided to invoke mentally the state of mind which I was witness of. In the contagion of the nevroism I gave myself up to whatever I might feel prompted to say, and in the course of a few minutes I felt a disposition to talk, and gave utterance to all that came to my tongue, without the slightest attempt to regulate grammar or sense. My "communication" was taken down in shorthand, and printed in the Proceedings of the circle as an inspiration, but on reading it I was compelled to admit that it was the greatest nonsense I had ever been responsible for,—pure "brain-dribble." Nor have I ever heard in the circles, or from a medium, anything more valuable, and I think that any man of fluent speech could talk such stuff, or better, by the hour without thinking of what he was saying. The quality of the dribble depends, I suppose, on that of the brain, and perhaps mine is inferior; but I never heard in the circles anything but arrant rubbish. The case of Thomas Lake Harris, to which you allude, is not an exception. Harris wrote poetry before his illumination which, I have heard Lowell say, was better than anything he wrote under "inspiration."

The scientific world, with the few brave exceptions we know, commits a grave error in ignoring the subject of spiritism, dismissing it as imposture because there is so much imposture in it. A careful and impartial investigator would very soon convince himself that it has a basis of scientific fact. The unscientific investigator, examining the evidence, becomes convinced, promptly rejects the conclusions of science, and falls an easy prey to the charlatans and speculators who take the place of scientists to him, and he drifts into the dreary realm of mediumistic "religious" teaching, and swallows as "inspiration" the wash of the circles. If indeed Mr. Phillips is in that vein, I advise him to read Swedenborg, in one section of whose "Heaven and Hell" there is more "field for modern verse" than in all the stuff of all the circles and mediums in England. But Harris and Laurence Oliphant are luminous examples of what superior intellects may come to, dabbling in the lore that lies in "communications made through trance or by the guided hand." From this source I have seen nothing wiser or better than Stead's letters from Julia, which tell us absolutely nothing not known before.—Yours truly,
W. J. STILLMAN.

AN AMATEUR HERALD.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—As you did me the honour to print my letter in your last number (though as you state that "almost every direct statement in the letter is incorrect" I am at a loss to understand why you wasted type upon it), perhaps you will allow me to explain the sources of the errors with which you charge me.

1. I have it on the authority of one of the Heralds, and, in my opinion, the most distinguished member of the College, that grants of Arms prior to the Commonwealth were not recorded in the Heralds' College. No doubt your reviewer is better informed that he is, but a mere amateur may be pardoned for accepting information on such authority.

2. If every man on being created a Peer or Baronet is not bound either to prove his right to bear Arms or else take out a fresh grant (as I have always understood he is bound to do by an unrepealed statute of Geo. II.), why when a near relative of my own was created a Baronet four years ago did the authorities compel him to take out a fresh grant, although his family have borne arms since the beginning of Heraldry, and why did they refuse to publish his name in the Gazette until he did so? This is certainly a matter which requires looking into.

3. If, instead of flatly contradicting me, you care to give me the opportunity, I shall be happy to prove to you that, absurd or otherwise, it has been given in a Court of law that a man may adopt any heraldic device he likes, and after using it for "a certain time," which the Judge did not specify, it becomes bona fide his own. If the decision is in your opinion "slightly absurd," at any rate attribute its absurdity to its author and not to me.

I remain, Sir, yours faithfully,

March 18th, 1899.

Y. Z.

[*] (1) Any member of the College of Arms must be well aware that a large proportion of the Arms recorded there are those which were granted between the reigns of Richard III. and Charles II., the period during which, as "Y.Z." states, no such records were kept. "X." in "The Right to Bear Arms" gives one of these grants, dated 1569, in full as a specimen, and the transcript of it exists in the College, together with numbers of others. (2) Although in both his letters "Y.Z." joins Peers and Baronets in the same obligation, if he will read our note again, he will see that we refer only to Peers—who certainly need not register Arms or pedigree—and not at all to Baronets, who may, as our correspondent avers, be authoritatively required to do so. (3) "Y.Z." states that a rule of Court exists to the effect of his declaration, but omits to show what authority or jurisdiction such Court possessed to make such a rule. "The Right to Bear Arms," in our opinion, very clearly demonstrates that the ordinary Law Courts do not possess any of the necessary jurisdiction to deal with such matters, which are—it is shown—dealt with otherwise by the full authority of the Crown.]

PETRARCH'S LIBRARY.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—The statement in your "Notes" of last week that the 24 MSS. announced to be sold at Sotheby's on April 14 are from the library of Petrarch ought to be received with caution by collectors. The writer of the note does not give a full list; but the mere fact that those mentioned are nearly all by ecclesiastical writers, and that there is not a single classical text among them, is, to say the least of it, curious. It is notorious that there are numerous MSS., professing to be from the library of Petrarch, both in public and private collections; and it is only in recent years that palæographical criticism has advanced sufficiently far to distinguish the true from the false. The leading authorities are M. Pierre de Nolhac and M. Leopold Delisle. The former, in his learned work, "Petrarque et l'Humanisme," after speaking of the many MSS. supposed to be from Petrarch's library, adds:—

Ces indications méritent la plus grande défiance; celles même qui se recommandent d'une tradition du XVI^e siècle n'en offrent pas pour cela plus de l'autorité . . . pour celles qui s'appuient sur d'autres renseignements, il fait ne point perdre de vue la vanité complaisante des bibliophiles, les habitudes de supercherie qui ont régné longtemps parmi eux, enfin la facilité avec laquelle, en ce point, se créent les légendes. ("Petrarque et l'Humanisme," p. 95).

And in a note to the same page he says :--

Il y a une collection provenant de Guregnano, avec l'ex-libris "Fragmentum bibliotheca Petrarchæ," gravé par les soins des Chartreux de ce couvent, et sur laquelle Valentinelli donne détails (Biblioth. manuscripta ad St. Marc Venet. t. i., p. 10). Fr. Arigoni l'a décrite depuis dans sa "Notice hist. et bibliogr. sur 26 MSS.—ayant fait partie de la bibliothèque de F.P., dont l'un avec des notes autogr. du grand poète et les 24 autres probabl. ann. par lui," Milan, 1883. La préface répète les erreurs courantes sur le sujet. Tous les MSS. de Guregnano sont des ouvrages en usage dans les couvents ; il n'y a pas un seul ouvrage classique. Celui qui est d'une autre provenance . . . se trouve être un Silius Italicus écrit . . . au milieu du XV^e siècle !

I cannot help suspecting, though, unfortunately, I am unable to test the questions by reference to the works here quoted, that the collection soon to be on sale may be this very Guregnano collection. There is the same inscription "Fragmentum Bibliotheca Petrarchæ": and one of the MSS. contains Sunday sermons to the Carthusians, entitled, "Linterni Lectio pro Spiritualibus advenis." The villa of Petrarch, which he called "Linternum," was close to the Carthusian monastery of Guregnano.

May I add that the writer of your note is mistaken in saying that Petrarch's legacy of his books to Venice ever took effect, and that "there are yet some to be found in the Ducal Palace"? Modern criticism has proved that the books seen by Tommasini in the seventeenth century in the deplorable condition described were not from Petrarch's library; there is now only one MS. in Venice which is certainly an autograph—a copy of some of Petrarch's own letters.

I am, Sir, faithfully yours,

EDWARD H. R. TATHAM.

Authors and Publishers.

The first county history to appear in Messrs. Archibald Constable's series, which is designed to form a National Survey of England at the beginning of the twentieth century, will probably be that of Hampshire. The scale on which the series is to be may be judged from the fact that this will fill four large octavo volumes. These are partly ready now, and the histories of other counties are being prepared at the same time. The Victoria histories (as they will be called with the approval of her Majesty) promise to form a valuable up-to-date imitation of Domesday Book, giving, of course, an infinitely greater mass of information, and dealing with the past as well as the present.

The first part of the "Fauna Hawaiiensis, or the Zoology of the Sandwich Isles, being results of the explorations instituted by the joint Committee appointed by the Royal Society and the British Association, and carried on with the assistance of those bodies and of the Trustees of the Bernice Pauahi Bishop Museum at Honolulu," is about to be issued by Messrs. Clay. This work is published by the Committee and edited by their secretary, Mr. David Sharp, Curator in Zoology of the Museum at Cambridge. This fauna is of great interest on account of its being rapidly extirpated by the progress of cultivation and the introduction of foreign species which prey upon the original natives. The first part, containing 122 pages Royal 4to, two plates and a map, includes the Hymenoptera Aculeata (Bees, Wasps, and Ants), of which about 200 species, mostly undescribed, have been obtained, and is by Mr. R. C. L. Perkins.

The "Theatrical World" volumes, which Mr. William Archer has published for several years, will this year not appear. The work will, however, to some extent be incorporated with the collection of Mr. Archer's critical papers, literary and dramatic, that Mr. Grant Richards will publish during the Spring. The present intention is to follow this up year by year, producing, as it were, a year-book of criticism, dealing with all that is most vital and most notable in the literary and theatrical history of 1898.

The eleventh volume in Mr. David Nutt's Grimm Library—"The Home of the Eddic Poems"—will contain a translation by Mr. William Henry Schofield of Professor Bugge's second series of "Studies on the Origin of the Scandinavian Stories of Gods and Heroes." The Professor has himself written a new introduction on the Old Norse Mythology. The same publisher announces a translation by Mr. J. Sephton of the "Saga of King Sverri of Norway," which, though composed in the thirteenth century, has never before appeared in English.

Many sporting people will be glad to know that a new edition of Dixon's "Game Birds and Wild Fowl of the British Islands" will be issued towards the latter part of this year. It will be illustrated with upwards of sixty coloured plates especially drawn for the edition by Mr. Charles Whympers.

M. Marcel Prévost is about to begin the publication in Le Journal of a new novel "Les Vierges Fortes," which will be, in a way, the counterpart of his famous "Les Demi-Vierges." The Journal in making this announcement says that the "strong virgins" in question are the girls of the future who in the social mêlée are seeking to make their way without the aid of man and without the preoccupation of love. "Feminist" problems have of late assumed much importance in France, a fact which accounts for the rise of writers like Mme. Jean Bertheroy, Mme. Lesueur, and others whose novels we have noted from time to time, and a revival of interest in George Sand. Economic considerations, questions of the dot, and the influence of cosmopolitanism in French society have offered to the French novelists a whole category of subjects which, faithful historians as they are, they are the first to treat.

A similar subject will be treated by MM. Paul and Victor Margueritte in their new novel, "Femmes Nouvelles," which will be published in the Revue des Deux Mondes, beginning on April 15. They will then have finished a series of studies on "feminist" questions, which they have contributed to the Echo de Paris, and they will substitute for them a new series entitled "Nos Idées." But they are still working on their second novel on the war of 1870, "Les Tronçons du Glaive," which is to form the continuation of "Le Désastre."

In view of the forthcoming production of Robespierre at the Lyceum there is to be a reprint of G. H. Lewes' book about the revolutionary leader. Danton, of whom two lives have just appeared—one by Mr. Hilary Belloc, the other by Mr. A. H. Beesly—does not figure in M. Sardou's drama. Nor does Marat, who has been introduced to playgoers in numerous pieces founded on the story of Charlotte Corday. The drama has an enormous cast, and is being mounted with Sir Henry Irving's usual magnificence. The translation has been done by Mr. Laurence Irving.

Messrs. Macmillan will issue immediately the thirty-fifth annual publication of "The Statesman's Year Book" for 1899, revised after official returns, and edited by Dr. Scott Keltie, Secretary to the Royal Geographical Society. The American war with Spain, the operations in the Sudan, the action of the European Powers in China have necessitated considerable alterations, and other modifications have been made. The maps include one of Africa, showing the railway, river routes, and telegraphs existing and projected; one of Newfoundland, illustrating the French Shore question; and one showing the addition on the Chinese Mainland to the colony of Hong-kong.

Messrs. William Blackwood are publishing a volume on "Holland and the Hollanders" by Mr. David S. Meldrum. The book is intended to give an account of the Dutch people of to-day—the present conditions, social and industrial. The imperial and municipal methods of government, education, and the elaborate protective and draining system directed by the "Waterstaat" are dealt with in separate chapters, while one section treats in greater detail of the special interests of each of the eleven provinces. The work contains over eighty illustrations, chiefly from drawings by Dutch artists.

A tenth edition of Sir Howard Vincent's Police Code is about to be issued by Mr. Francis Edwards and Simpkin, Marshall, and Co., at 2s. It will be brought up to date both as to the criminal law and police practice, and will be preceded by addresses to the police by the Right Hon. Sir William Vernon Harcourt and Lord Brampton, as well as by prefaces by Sir Edward Bradford and Mr. Anderson, Commissioner of the Criminal Investigation Department, over which the author presided before entering Parliament.

Mr. Taylor Innes, the author of "Law of Creeds" and a Manual on the History of Church and State, has completed a monograph on the legal aspects of "The Trial of Jesus Christ." This twofold transaction (the most famous occasion on which two great systems of law, the Hebrew and the Roman, crossed each other) is presented as "probably the most interesting isolated problem in historical jurisprudence." Messrs. T. and T. Clark are the publishers.

M. Hanotaux, ex-Foreign Minister of France, and the historian of Richelieu, announces a volume on the superiority of the "Latin races," a question now very much exercising the Gallic mind. M. Brunetière, the other day at Lille, in a public lecture to the members of the League of the Patrie Française, which he founded with M. Barrès, returned to this all-absorbing theme. He, like M. Hanotaux, does not believe in the superiority of the "Anglo-Saxon."

Mr. Ernest Rhys is engaged upon a popular guide-book to South Wales, a district somewhat neglected by English tourists, in the preparation of which he is to have the aid of some notable collaborators. The volume will probably be published next year by Messrs. Woodall and Minshall.

M. François Coppée was at work on a volume of poetry when political events interrupted him. As soon as he can settle to work again he hopes to complete this book which he calls his "Livre d'Automne." M. Coppée has also two new plays in prospect. One will deal with the first Carlist war of 1832 and the other will show the conflict between the French society just created by the new dynasty in Vienna at the time of Wagram and that of the old régime.

We mentioned some time ago that "Lucas Malet" was stated to be at work upon an edition of her father, Charles Kingsley's works, similar to Mrs. Ritchie's biographical edition of Thackeray. Yet another edition of the kind is announced of the novels of the Brontës, with introductions by Mrs. Humphry Ward, to be published by Messrs. Smith, Elder.

Among the many interesting art books which are to appear here during this year we note that Messrs. Bell have in preparation a book on Botticelli, by Mr. Herbert P. Horne, whose work both as a designer and writer is well known; Mr. H. C. Marillier, who recently supplied the introduction to Mr. Lane's collection of Beardsley drawings, is writing a record of the life and work of Rossetti; Mr. P. H. Bate is preparing a book on the Pre-Raphaelite School: Mr. Walter Crane is following up his work on the Bases of Design with a book on "Line and Form." Mr. Prior is at work upon the fruitful subject of Gothic art in England. All these books are to be fully illustrated.

Messrs. Cassell will publish early in April "The Life of William Ewart Gladstone," edited by Sir Wemyss Reid, containing contributions by Canon MacColl, Mr. G. W. E. Russell, Mr. Henry W. Lucy, and others. The volume will be profusely illustrated.

The Rev. Henry L. Thomson, who was for so many years a well-known figure in Christchurch before he became Warden of Radley and subsequently Vicar of St. Mary's, Oxford, is, we understand, writing a memoir of the late Dr. Liddell. The volume, which will be based upon the Dean's autobiography and correspondence, is to be published by Mr. Murray.

"Fiona Macleod," who, notwithstanding the inquiries of the curious, still veils her personality, will have a new book published in the course of the Spring by Messrs. Constable. It is to be entitled "The Dominion of Dreams" and is in three sections—Tales, with a modern setting; narratives of a purely psychological kind; and Tales with an old Celtic and pagan background. The greater part of the contents is published for the first time. The book has an epilogue entitled "The Wind, the Shadow, and the Soul." One of the longest stories in it, "By the Yellow Moonrock," is the essential part of a short book once announced as by "Fiona Macleod" and then called "The Lily Leven." With the exception of this story "The Dominion of Dreams" is more akin to "The Washer of the Ford" than any other of this author's work. She is also engaged on a book of a wholly distinct nature—viz., a Jacobite romance. In "The Dominion of Dreams" the writer has been occupied with the implicit drama of spiritual things, in the other with the explicit drama of actual things—events, actions, and externals.

Two new books by Mr. Bernard Capes will be published this year. Next month Messrs. Pearson will issue a book of short stories by the author of "The Lake of Wine," and in the autumn Messrs. Blackwood will have ready the novel to which we made reference last May.

"The Philosophy of the Marquise," a story in dialogue by Mrs. Belloc-Lowndes, will shortly be published by Mr. Grant Richards.

The Clarion for to-day contains the opening chapters of Tolstoy's new novel, "Resurrection," to which we referred the other day. The novel will be issued at the same time in French, German, and American papers, and will eventually be published by Messrs. Walter Scott.

A French paper announces that Queen Nathalie of Milan is at work on a novel. The work is said to be in part autobiographical, the scene being laid at Belgrade and Biarritz. The novel will be published in France probably some time this year.

Friedrich Spielhagen, whose seventieth birthday has just been celebrated in Germany, has completed a new novel, entitled "Opfer." The work appears first as a serial in several German newspapers.

Mr. S. R. Crockett's new book, "A Woman of Fortune," will be published in England by Messrs. Hodder and Stoughton. The same publishers are issuing sixpenny editions of Mr. Barrie's "Window in Thrums" and Ian Maclaren's "Beside the Bonnie Brier Bush." These books are to be illustrated by Mr. William Hole.

Mr. B. L. Farjeon's new story, "Samuel Boyd of Catchpole Square," is being published by Messrs. Hutchinson. Miss Arabella Kenealy's new novel, "A Semi-Detached Marriage," will be published next month by the same publishers.

"George Egerton's" new book of stories entitled "Cross Currents" is postponed until the autumn. Messrs. Smithers will shortly bring out a translation by this lady of Hamsun's powerful work, "Sult," and she has also recently written a one-act play, which will probably be presented to the public before long.

The author of "A Dozen Ways of Love," Miss Lily Dougall, will shortly have her new novel, "The Mormon Prophet," published. In this work Miss Dougall follows very closely the main incidents in the life of Joseph Smith, founder of the Mormon sect.

Mrs. Penrose's new novel, "The Fall of a Sparrow," will shortly be ready for the press. She has also recently written a story of a child, but not for children, entitled "Toddles: A Nuisance."

Mr. Hamlin Garland, the realistic novelist of life in the West, is shortly to pay his first visit to England.

For Monday next Mr. Fisher Unwin announces a novel called "Marguerite de Roberval," by Mr. T. G. Marquis, a Canadian author.

Mrs. Bishop will have her new book, "The Yang-tze Valley and Beyond," published shortly by Mr. Murray. It recounts her journeys in Central and Western China.

The Syndics of the Cambridge University Press announce that the facsimile reproduction of the Codex Bezae will be published at Easter.

Messrs. Longman will publish Vol. II. of Sir William W. Hunter's "History of British India" in connexion with the centenary of the founding of the East India Company in the latter half of 1900.

Lord Roberts has written an introduction for "From Cromwell to Wellington—Twelve Soldiers" which Messrs. Lawrence and Bullen are publishing under the editorship of Mr. Spenser Wilkinson.

Mr. G. Holden Pike's "Oliver Cromwell and his Times" will be issued by Mr. Fisher Unwin in time for the Protector's Centenary celebration on April 25th.

Messrs. Methuen are about to publish two more volumes of their "History of Egypt"—"Ptolemaic Egypt," by Professor Mahaffy, and "Egypt Under Roman Rule," by Mr. J. G. Milne.

"The Church and Her Accusers at the Present Time" is to be the title of Canon Hammond's work, which Messrs. Skeffington will publish this season.

Dr. Robert Munro's "Prehistoric Scotland and its place in European Civilization" will shortly be issued by Messrs. Blackwood.

"Roman Life and the Cæsars" will be the title of Professor Emile Thomas' work which Mr. Fisher Unwin will publish here. M. Emile Faguet is preparing a "History of French Literature" in two large volumes.

The original issue of Mr. Bodley's "France" in two costly volumes was beyond the reach of most students, and as the book is one to buy and not merely to borrow, Messrs. Macmillan deserve thanks for bringing out a cheaper edition in one volume so soon.

"The Art of William Morris" will form the subject of the Easter number of the Art Journal to be published towards the end of the present month. The monograph will be written by Mr. Lewis F. Day, and will be illustrated by about fifty designs.

Mr. Fred. T. Jane's book on the Russian Navy will be published by Messrs. Thacker next autumn in two volumes with many illustrations. Some portions will appear serially—the technical parts in the Engineer, some pictorial and social matters in Black and White. Mr. Jane was recently invited to St. Petersburg by H.I.H. the Grand Duke Alexander. While there he was given permission to see all the dockyards, a courtesy which has not, we believe, been previously extended to any Englishman.

The "Histoire du Château de Versailles," which the Société d'Édition Artistique (rue Louis le Grand, 32-34) is to publish for M. Pierre de Nolhac, conservator of the Castle Museum and historian of Marie Antoinette, is now ready to be subscribed for at the price of 280 francs, and the cost of the two volumes after complete publication will be raised to 320 francs. Each fascicule will be sold at twenty francs.

LITERARY AGENTS.

Whenever a new middleman arises, and succeeds in establishing his position on a sound basis, the attitude towards him of the people with whom he desires to do business almost invariably follows certain uniform lines. At first he is told, not without acerbity, that he is a nuisance; then he is regarded, contemptuously, as harmless but superfluous; then it is discovered that he saves so much trouble that it would be difficult to get on without him; and finally the philosopher, regarding him merely as a phenomenon that needs to be accounted for, cites him as the latest example of the familiar evolutionary tendency towards the specialization of function. This, we may safely take it, is what has happened, is happening, and will happen in the case of those literary agents whose recent advent and rapidly increasing importance has exercised the minds of so many excellent people and excited so much controversy. The commerce of letters, like all other branches of commerce, has of late years become complicated in a manner that our forefathers never dreamt of, and it has become imperatively necessary that its different branches should be dealt with by different departments. On the one hand the publisher (originally only a bookseller) has thought it well to give up book-selling, in the narrow sense of the word, and employ agents—the existing booksellers—to sell his books. On the other hand, the author has found that it suits him to employ an agent to sell his manuscripts, instead of hawking them round in person. There is the matter in a nutshell. On each side function has been specialized, on account of the increasing complication of the business. On each side the middleman has made a profit—and, on the whole, has earned it, by enabling better business to be done. A glance at the history of letters shows clearly how the need for the literary agent arose. In the early days there was no use for him because the transactions were absolutely simple. On the one side stood the publisher with a bag of money; on the other side stood the author with a manuscript, or a promise to produce one. "How much?" asked the publisher. "So much," replied the author. Hagglng followed, and a bargain was struck; the author very often getting his money, or a part of it, in advance. The whole thing was as simple as selling a sack of potatoes. An author, who was not satisfied with the offer of a publisher, had always the alternative—so popular, and occasionally so lucrative, in those days—of publishing by subscription; and in any case, there was no opportunity for an agent to render services worthy of a ten per cent. commission.

Nowadays, as almost every popular author knows, the state of things is very different. Take the case of a well-known novelist who, holding the scriptural doctrine that the labourer is worthy of his hire, sets out to dispose of a new novel to the best advantage. He has, first of all to arrange for its simultaneous serial appearance in Great Britain, in the United States, in India, and in Australia. He has then to arrange for its simultaneous publication in book form, in England and America, and for its inclusion in a Colonial library, and in that of Baron Tauchnitz. There still remain to be considered the rights of subsequent republication in serial form, of translation, of dramatization, and of abridgment. Each of these separate transactions may involve the giving of a certain amount of credit; consequently the author requires to be acquainted with the financial standing and repute of each of the firms entrusted with the administration of his property. An author might conceivably do all this for himself. But it is clear that that would involve a close attention to commercial detail which would be as unpleasant to the average literary man as the personal collection of his rents would be to a wealthy landlord.

Like the landlord, therefore, the author employs an agent to administer the property for him. He has, like the landlord, the alternative of selling it; but, still like the landlord, he perceives that the more profitable way is to have it managed by his own man for his own advantage.

Though the conditions which made the rise of the literary agent inevitable are clear, it was none the less strictly in accordance with the nature of things that, when he first made his appearance, he should be described as an intruder, a parasite, a canker-worm eating out the heart of letters. Such things were certainly said of him at the beginning, not only by publishers of unimpeachable integrity and quite average intelligence, but also by a certain number of authors who felt the aversion of the artistic temperament towards everything that is glaringly practical and modern. Yet, when we descend from eloquent generalization to examine the particulars of the charges preferred against the literary agent, we find either that there is little in them or that the responsibility for the offence belongs, properly, to some one else. Any objection that may be felt to him, on the broad ground that he knows his business, can see through the specious clause of an agreement, which, purporting to be a licence to publish, insidiously conveys a copyright, and is not to be imposed upon by loose statements concerning risk, cost of production, and trade customs, may be passed over. Honest publishers do not wish to take advantage of an author's ignorance in such matters, and are only too glad to be protected against the competition of the dishonest publishers (if there are any) who do. There remain two allegations of a more serious order. The first is that the agent, taking purely commercial views of literature, is always urging his clients to over-write themselves for the purpose of coining money; the second, that his intervention is destroying those pleasant personal relations that subsisted between authors and publishers in the past.

As regards the first charge, the agents can hardly be held more culpable than the publishers themselves. They come to the agent with their moneybags and their proposals; the agent merely sees that the proposals are satisfactory, and transmits them to the author who is open to accept them or reject them as he pleases. The answer to the second accusation is the simple one that it is not in accordance with the facts. The relations between authors and publishers were not invariably amiable in the days before literary agents were invented. Lord Byron was presumably jesting when he wrote the poem containing the vigorous line, "You may be d—d, my Murray"; but Dr. Johnson was certainly in earnest when he knocked his publisher down with a folio. Since the rise of the literary agent there is no recorded instance of an author knocking a publisher down, whether with a folio or with any other weapon. On the contrary, now that authors habitually employ agents to attend to the transfer of their literary property, just as they would employ lawyers to attend to the transfer of their real estate, the relations between author and publisher are almost invariably amicable.

Business and sentiment being kept apart, the burden of bargaining shifted on to the broad shoulders of the middleman, and every precaution taken against the mere suspicion of unfair dealing, the growth of friendship has had a far better chance than before.

Prejudices die slowly; but there are already indications that publishers and editors are discovering that the literary agent can be no less useful to them than to the author. He is willing to act for them when they wish to make serial arrangements for work of which they have acquired the copyright. His office is a bureau of information at which they can obtain early knowledge of books worth publishing which will be upon the market presently. It is a great clearing-house of manuscripts from which the wants of unforeseen emergencies can be supplied. It is a permanent address at which business can be done with an author at a time when he is fishing in Lapland, or shooting in the Rockies, or climbing the Himalayas, or bicycling round the world. And, finally, it is a guarantee to the solvent and capable publisher that incapable and insolvent rivals will find it difficult to take his business away from him by trading on the ignorance of authors. These, it will be allowed, are solid advantages, fully justifying that specialization of function which, as we began by saying, the literary agent illustrates. Most publishers already appreciate those advantages; and we shall be surprised if the few others who still hold out do not speedily fall into line with them.

The Publishers' Association have sent out a circular announcing that the Royal Commissioners for the Paris Exhibition of next year have entrusted to them the collection of printed books to be exhibited in the British section, and that they hope to get together specimens of modern British book production that may be really representative of the industry of to-day. The space that can be devoted to the exhibition of printed books is not large, and it is the intention of the Commissioners not to admit any but the highest class of work. Those who wish to exhibit are requested to send an application to Mr. Frederick Macmillan not later than April 4 next, giving approximately the number of volumes that they are prepared to exhibit. Later on, they will be invited to send up the books themselves, and such of them as are considered suitable will be forwarded to Paris.

Is not the business of Anthology-making in danger of being a little overdone? Here we have Professor Arber engaged in editing for the Oxford University Press "A Series of British Anthologies from Collections of English Verse which have appeared at various times"—a series which is, we are told, to contain about "two thousand five hundred entire poems and songs, exclusive of extracts, which will be inserted sparingly." Some three hundred authors will be represented in it, a few for the first time in any anthology; and each volume will consist of three hundred pages of text to which are added an index of first lines and authorities, and a glossary. Of how many three-hundred-page volumes this colossal work is to consist we are not told; but as gathered from a later item of information the presage of their number seems a little alarming. Some inaccuracy has no doubt crept into the statement that "the plan is to identify the respective volumes with the chief English poet of the period treated, beginning with a Dunbar anthology," since this would imply that our national poetry did not "begin" till more than a hundred years after Chaucer, and that the first "English" poet was a Scotchman. Still, if one whole volume is to be devoted even to Dunbar's "period," the series will have stretched to a considerable length before it reaches the poetry of the late nineteenth century.

If this were an "Anthology of Anthologies"—that is to say, a second skimming of the pans with a view of obtaining, so to speak, the "cream of the cream" of English poetry, it would be another matter, although even in that case we rather fancy that Professor Arber would find mighty little skim-milk to throw away at the bottom of the first series of the "Golden Treasury." As we understand the project, however, what is contemplated is not a selection from, but merely, or at any rate principally, a consolidation of, existing anthologies; and no doubt we may assume that every poem in the English language which is of supreme—with many probably which are of something less than supreme—excellence, and which are at the same time not too long to be given entire, will be included. Thus it will have the air of being representative of all that is best in English poetry, whereas, through the necessary exclusion of all our longer poems, extracts from which are to be "only sparingly inserted," it will be nothing of the kind. Yet it is precisely in this assumed character that ambitious indolence ever in quest of new short cuts to "culture" will seize upon it. The truth is that the scholar and the student need no fuller anthologies than they have already got; and that a work of this kind can only serve the purpose of those who wish to "have a taste" in poetry without cultivating it by genuine study of the greater poets in their own works.

Messrs. Sampson Low, Marston, and Co. have just issued their invaluable "English Catalogue of Books for 1898," which is not only a complete catalogue to which reference can be made either under the author's name or the title of his book, but to some extent a Subject Index as well. They add for the first time a "List of Publishers," and it is interesting that more than a hundred firms who are apparently not ostensibly publishers at all have issued books during 1898. We note that the "Dickens" entries fill a column. The Scott and Shakespeare entries come to nearly half those which appear under the same headings in the Catalogue for the preceding eight years. We are glad to see that the English Catalogue is beginning to follow our example in describing the sizes of books by inches. It is a plan which the late Mr. Henry Bradshaw recommended, and the librarian of Cambridge University, whose letter to us on the subject appeared in our issue of December 25, 1897, was encouraged by our practice to introduce it in the University Library, where it is, we believe, now in use.

Danton. A Study by Hilaire Belloc, B.A. 9×5½in., xiii.+440 pp. London, 1899. Nisbet. 16/-

It is a strange coincidence that two lives of Danton should appear in English in the same month; but the interest in Danton has been very much revived in France by the comparatively recent publication of M. Sorel's

"L'Europe et La Révolution Française." In that great work Danton stands clearly out as the hero of the National Defence in 1792-93; and no well-read man, however repulsive to his feelings Danton's methods may be, would question the substantial truth of this view. This, however, hardly justifies an attempt to palliate some of the very questionable things which Danton did, or to excuse the frequent intemperance of his language. Such an attempt has been made, in two very different ways, by the writers whose studies of Danton are now published.

Students of history may feel justly indignant that a serious biographer should at this date give to the world a book of this kind without a single textual reference to support his statements; that he should quote, without naming, "an eye witness," "some historians," "the writer whose observations are here recapitulated"; should think it necessary to refute Courtois, Prudhomme, and Peltier and should accept Barère as an authority. Mr. Beesly thinks that Pitt went to war to maintain the closure of the Scheldt, that Danton knew England because he knew Tom Paine; Lanjuinais is to him a "bragging Breton," Cholet, not Savenay, the "crowning victory over the Vendéans"; the ceremonies of the Catholic faith are "sacerdotal mummeries." His use of the English language is far from perfect, and in one very curious sum in arithmetic the livre tournois is reckoned in 1789 as equivalent to fr.1.44. The book has evidently been thrown off by a hurried and careless pen as a manifesto of adherence to the creed of extreme democracy. Mr. Beesly has great difficulty in impressing Danton into such a service, for Danton's goddess was France, and not any particular form of government. M. Bougeart, the biographer of and enthusiast for Marat, has been principally used by Mr. Beesly. Mr. Belloc uses him also, but relies much more on Dr. Robinet. Mr. Beesly's translations of Danton's splendid but disjointed eloquence are lamentably bald, yet in repeating the foolish old tales of the "horrors of the feudal system" Mr. Beesly can "pile up the agony" in a manner worthy of Dickens himself. We see no evidence of any acquaintance with Sorel except the mention of him in the preface, still less of any study of Lavergne, or Turgot, or Dupont de Nemours. Where does Mr. Beesly get his extraordinary story of the "Montmorin plan of more far-reaching villainy"? Where the statement that Carrier's "noyades" were a copy of the deeds of the Nantese royalists? We steadfastly refuse to believe (on his unsupported authority) that on the eve of September the King's health and that of the Parisians was drunk in costly wines by the prisoners at the Abbaye carousing with their mistresses; that Danton, who was strong for non-intervention, proposed to compensate Piedmont (sic) with part of the Papal States. The "scarcity in Paris was exaggerated and manipulated by Royalist agents"—of course; Hébert said so in "Père Duchesne," so it must be true. But it would be brutal to inflict more blows upon Mr. Beesly's unfortunate performance, and we turn with some relief to the work of Mr. Belloc.

This young writer often startles and shocks us by statements which we would fain believe to be the paradoxes so dear to the minds of scholars of Balliol; and he is too apt to lay the offerings of paradox and antithesis on the altar of style. His opinions, which only appear very occasionally, are more red republican, more communistic than Mr. Beesly's, but he strives to keep them in the background as much as the other strives to bring his to the front. Mr. Belloc has two qualifications for his task. First, he understands and loves France as no Englishman can understand and few love it—we would go so far as to say that he is the only English historian who has made the history of the Revolution and the character of the French people engaged in it real for us; secondly, he is a marvellous portrait painter. His King Louis reaches a high level of skill in delineation; Mr. Beesly's Louis is a satyr or a pantaloone at a suburban pantomime. He gives us the best portrait of Robespierre we remember to have seen in either language. We should have liked to add a third qualification to Mr. Belloc, and at first hoped that we should be able to do so—viz., that he was a careful historian of the best French school. It is true that he does not at critical moments bring unsupported statements to bear out his views, that he is slow to condemn at all, and never absolves nor condemns upon hearsay evidence only. But he is also too apt to bring in picturesque stories to heighten his colours without examining carefully into their origin. He too wholly accepts the Revolution legend. He never seems to conceive that the benefits of the Revolution might have come about in a legal way—that the monarchy had been steadily marching towards alleviation of material conditions ever since the days of Richelieu. In the face of de Tocqueville, Rigby, Taine, Lavergne, he says that the French peasants were more ignorant, more fearful, and more unhappy in 1789 than they had ever been before. One gets accustomed to these things from Mr. Beesly, but one is shocked when Mr. Belloc yields so far to prejudice and tradition. When he tells us that reform in England has as yet been “perhaps fatally inadequate,” that “we lack in England a true middle class,” one sees a trace of prejudice and regrets it.

We may here note a few slight and one or two serious mistakes—e.g., he forgets (p. 22) that the Convention was elected by manhood suffrage. It is not true that the noblesse were exempt from taxes before 1789 (they were exempt from taille for a portion of their estates, and in some cases from all taille, and they compounded too lightly for the vingtièmes). The population of Paris in 1789 is more accurately estimated by Dulaure at a little over 600,000. In comparing a modern with an old French budget Mr. Belloc would have done well to consult von Sybel. It is a little ridiculous to harp upon the gentility of Marat and his “aristocratic milieu,” because he was a specialist in a certain class of diseases. Not on July 15, but on June 27, did the King order (not “permit”) the union of the three orders. The “New Parliament”—i.e., the Legislative Assembly—did not meet till 21st September, 1791. It is tiresome, by the way, to find the three successive French Assemblies continually spoken of as the Parliament. The word “Parliament” conveys something very different to English ears. The faint symptoms of returning order after Varennes, which Malouet hailed not without hope, are surely wrongly described by Mr. Belloc as the “sharp and sanguinary reaction of 1791.” We are surprised that we should still be asked to hear the cheers of the men who went down on the Vengeur (1st June, 1794)—which no contemporary heard, except from Barère's lying report in the Convention. It is ridiculous to speak of the electoral scheme of 1791 for household suffrage as “creating an oligarchy in the towns.” The Girondins were not “even in nominal” power on the eve of the 10th August; they only came back to office on its morrow. We dislike such phrases as the “calculated hypocrisy of Pitt,” and we do not think Mr. Belloc should have repeated the silly stories about his flooding France with false assignats upon no better authority than that the “family of the printer thereof still remain at Newcastle to tell the tale.” Cambon was not on either Committee after July 10, 1793. Hérault ceased to be a member of the Great Committee in the end of December. Toulon fell on the 19th, not the 7th, December of the same year. We cannot swallow Mr. Belloc's statement that the “shallow scoundrel” St. Just (as Danton called him) really believed the accusations he brought against Danton, still less that he was an “apostle.” Nor do we like to admit with Mr. Belloc that “there are conditions under which to burn a man to death seems admissible and just”; and if it sometimes happens in the United States of to-day the lynching of negroes can hardly be accounted a civilized precedent. Mr. Belloc, who has a marked tendresse for the Girondins—and, indeed, makes, in a few lines on page 217, the most valid excuse ever made for them—fails to show that their republic could never have co-existed with Danton's. We protest emphatically against the Constitution of 1793—a document drawn up in eight days, to satisfy popular clamour, by men who never intended to give effect to it—being called “an idol of great beauty which travellers find in a desert place.” That it might long remain in a desert would have been, we think, the first wish of the strong man Danton. More emphatically still, with M. Sorel, but against Mr. Belloc, we protest that the Terror had nothing to do with the Victories. And our final judgment on Danton must be that, while we fully recognize his paramount share in preparing the victories, we cannot wholly acquit the man who blinked at the massacres of September, even if he were, as is alleged, powerless to prevent them, and forged the two chief instruments of the Terror—the Great Committee and the Revolutionary Tribunal. It is, perhaps, unfortunate that, in his judgment on the Terror generally, Mr. Belloc has omitted to consult M. Aulard's great “Recueil des Actes du Comité de Salut Public” (11 vols.) which is now published as far as March, 1794; and the excellent monograph of M. Gros.

Yet, in spite of all these errors, one is amazed at this book coming from so young a writer. In spite of paradox and occasional gush, the style, in the main, is as lofty and pure as is his treatment of his magnificent subject. He is a real and deep thinker upon the forces which go to make nations and societies. Take the following:—

In a settled and traditional society custom is of such overwhelming weight that law can only act in accordance with it—laws can hardly be passed but such as the development of tradition demands.

Does it not make one feel a little uncomfortable to reflect that almost any Bill passed by any assembly with the name of an English Parliament would now be obeyed? Again, only Mr. Belloc (of English writers) has laid his finger on 1790 as the determining year in the history of the Revolution—the year in which, as Taine puts it, the spontaneous anarchy of 1789 became “endemic.” “Charlemagne left his clothes to Germany, his spirit to Gaul”; “That unpleasant fellow, Collot d'Herbois” are master touches.

Mr. Belloc's account of Danton's action on April 18, 1791, would bear some slight correction from Schmidt's “Tableaux” (see vol. 1, p. 24 sqq.), but it is accuracy itself compared to Mr. Beesly's. How truly, too, he discerns the overwhelming anxiety of the Moderates to come to a compromise with the King throughout the summer of 1791:—

They took him back to Paris [after Varennes], they forced him to declarations of loyalty and then, with the folly of desire, accepted as real an emotion they had actually dictated.

Yet he fails (by attributing too much influence to Mirabeau) to see that Louis yielded, not to any desire to revive the monarchy of divine right—in which he probably believed little; we think he only once used the words—but to the pressure of “the Court, the family, the faith.” As regards Danton’s private life, we think Mr. Belloc’s theory of the rapid second marriage a little unlikely, but this is a matter of small moment. We greet Mr. Belloc as a rising star in the world of letters.

TWO IMMORTAL PARODISTS.

James and Horace Smith, Joint Authors of “Rejected Addresses.” By Arthur H. Beavan. 7½×6½ in., vi. + 312 pp. London, 1890. Hurst & Blackett. 6/-

To have been the joint authors of the most famous and successful volume of parodies that our literature contains is a distinction which, considering the unusually perishable character of the material out of which so enduring a work has been wrought, may fairly be called unique. It is as though Horace’s monumentum cere perennius had been moulded in confectionery. Few great poets have escaped the parodist—the strength of their invitation to him, indeed, is generally proportioned to their greatness; yet of all the innumerable mimics which their poetry has provoked, how few have outlived the passing hour! The two authors of “Rejected Addresses” deserve in right of their unexampled triumph over oblivion to be something more to their countrymen than the shadows of a name, and Mr. Arthur H. Beavan has endeavoured in this volume to “materialize” them. His biography is well written and readable throughout—a little too frequently “off the matter,” perhaps, but agreeable reading enough even in its digressions, for which, moreover, one feels that some allowance should be made in the case of lives so comparatively uneventful as those of the Brothers Smith. The somewhat lengthy account of their father, Robert Smith, and the frequent and copious extracts from his diary are, to some extent, irrelevances, but as giving a graphic picture of life in the closing years of the last century they are not unwelcome.

Still, one has the feeling that the main reason why these ex-crescent passages are where they are is the “book-making” reason; and that, though Mr. Beavan has done his biographical work well and pleasantly, he might have done it with perfect adequacy in fewer than 305 pages. For, after all, it is as the authors of the famous volume of parodies and as such alone that James and Horace Smith can be said to interest posterity. The worthy solicitor and the successful stockbroker who rose suddenly into fame between their thirtieth and fortieth year by the publication of “Rejected Addresses,” and who thenceforth became not only literary lions but men of fashion, intimate alike with all the notabilities of both worlds, would, indeed, have altogether disappeared from human memory by this time had it not been for this one achievement in their lives. The rest of the works of James and Horace, the good things that they said, the fugitive jeux d’esprit that one of them contributed to the magazines, even the historical novels with which the other captured a considerable if a passing public, are they not written in water—the water of the flowing stream of Time? Mr. Beavan has given us some few specimens of James’ epigrams—though not the best of them all, the three somewhat risqué quatrains on the liaison of Æneas, pater and pater, with the unhappy Dido—but out of most of the others the original virtue has gone. James’ ballad on the contrast between names and natures:—

Mr. Barker’s as mute as a fish in the sea,
Mr. Miles never moves on a journey,
Mr. Gotobed sits up till half after three,
Mr. Makepiece was bred an attorney, &c., is ingenious, and still mildly amuses; but Mr. Beavan should have quoted its two happiest lines:—

Mr. Metcalfe ran off upon meeting a cow,
With fat Mr. Turnbull behind him.

So, too, with their spoken wit and humour. Their recorded sayings are seldom other than fairly good examples of the “good thing.” As a rule we can acknowledge that they were not only worth uttering at the moment, but worth carrying away and repeating for some reasonable time thereafter; but they lack, one and all, the mysterious vital quality which perpetuates.

Yet how strongly impregnated are the parodies themselves, or at least the best of them, with this quality, a glance at the contents-table of “Rejected Addresses” will suffice to show. Were it otherwise, the book must have perished of the mere perishing of its models. Out of the twenty-one imitations a round dozen are from this cause unrecognizable. For where now are the memories of Dr. Busby, and the Hon. W. Spencer, of “Monk” Lewis and “Laura Matilda,” and William Thomas Fitzgerald? They have their portion with the “weeds and outworn faces” of Jeremy Taylor. “Chaos and Old Night” have swallowed up Kotzebue’s Stranger and the fantastic “stage songs” of the youthful Theodore Hook. Had all the other originals shared their fate, perhaps the one legacy of the Brothers Smith to posterity would have been the ironical couplet of inquiry

Who makes the quartern loaf and Luddites rise?
Who fills the butchers’ shops with large blue flies?

Wordsworth, Coleridge, Southey, Crabbe, Scott, Byron, Moore exhaust the list of those whose names still “say anything” to English readers, if even this can be truly said of the third and fourth; and, fortunately, they happen also to be the names of those who have been parodied with the greatest skill and success. “Honours are divided,” or nearly so, between the two brothers, for if the first four of these seven parodies stand to James’ credit it was to Horace’s description of the Drury-lane fire that Scott paid the delightful compliment of saying, “I certainly must have written this myself, though I forget on what occasion.” And there is no doubt, we think, that though one or two of the elder brother’s contributions run it close, it is on the whole the masterpiece of the collection. Mr. Beavan (who has devoted a very inadequate amount of space to the one work by which his heroes live) observes of them that they are “not so much parodies as distinct literary compositions.” But this is to miss their two-fold claim to admiration. The opening, for instance, of “A Tale of Drury Lane”:—

O’er fair Augusta’s towers and trees
Flitted the silent midnight breeze, &c., is serious, uncaricatured Scott, with all the sober, uninspired beauty of its original. But how, in quite another vein, could the poet’s spirit-stirring roll-calls of warriors and his resonant versified “topography” have been more admirably parodied than in these swinging rhymes?—

With them came Rumford, Bumford, Cole,
Robins from Hockly in the Hole,
Lawson and Dawson cheek by jowl,
Crump from St. Giles’ Pound;
Whitford and Mitford joined the train,
Huggins and Muggins from Chick Lane,
And Clutterbuck, who got a sprain
Before the plug was found.
Hobson and Jobson did not sleep,
But ah! no trophy could they reap,
For both were in the Donjon keep
Of Bridewell’s gloomy mound.

James Smith has nowhere beaten this, we think. Indeed, he shows in his parodies a greater tendency to overstep “the modesty of nature.” On the other hand it must be admitted that he often surpasses his brother in his perception of a poet’s “true inwardness,” and thus is able to achieve that real triumph of the parodist’s art—a faithful imitation of the poet produced without any specific work of his as a model. This is strikingly shown in “Playhouse Musings” which, if it suggests the title of one of Coleridge’s poems, goes no further in the way of direct parody, and yet reproduces with curious subtlety the rather sickly sentimentalism of some of the poet’s earlier work. James, moreover, had a perfect sense of style, which served him even in the depth of the commonplace, and the very perfection of which, when allied to the commonplace, produces an irresistibly humorous effect. What piece of simple narrative has ever been set forth with such flawless elegance as this, in the imitation of Crabbe?—

John Richard William Alexander Dwyer
Was footman to Jurtinian Stubbs Esquire;
But when John Dwyer listed in the Blues,
Emanuel Jennings polished Stubbs' shoes.

The swift and graceful transition from the plain historic mention of the footman's office to the vivid dramatic picture of him at his duties is almost Virgilian in its charm. And the names might have come straight from that mine of quaint nomenclature, the "Bab Ballads."

We should like, we must confess, to have been shown a little more of the literary and a little less of the social side of the Brothers Smith; and if strings of their celebrated and fashionable acquaintances were to be given, Lady Albinia Hobart should not have been allowed to appear in it under the guise of so "fearful a wildfowl" as "Lady Albina Buckinghamshire." There is more than one other place, too, in which the book would have been the better for a more careful correction of the proofs.

THE POPES OF THE RENAISSANCE.

The History of the Popes from the Close of the Middle Ages. From the German of Dr. Ludwig Pastor. Edited by F. J. Antrobus, of the Oratory. Vols. V. and VI. 9 x 5½ in., lxx. + 576 + xxx. + 670 pp. London, 1898.

Kegan Paul. 24/- n.

The most interesting part of Dr. Pastor's fifth volume consists of an elaborate introduction, covering nearly 230 pages and describing the period of the Renaissance, for the most part from original memoirs, correspondence, and other documents. This is valuable, partly as illustrating with almost an excess of detail the moral and social condition of Italy during the fifteenth century, partly as exhibiting both the merits and defects of the historian. Dr. Pastor can hardly be described as a sympathetic lover of art, nor does he display much insight into the labyrinthine and wide-reaching movements of the fifteenth century. His standpoint is that of a devout Catholic, and apparently his chief aim is to show that the state of religion and morals during the period of the Renaissance has been painted blacker than it deserves.

The point hardly needed the elaborate array of proofs which Dr. Pastor accumulates. That the period was not destitute of redeeming elements must be obvious, but, after all, the particular aspect of the Renaissance which the author has in view is not one of primary importance. Writers of wider sympathies, though possibly of less learning than Dr. Pastor, have seen in the Renaissance a stage in the onward march of European civilization, of which the most conspicuous features were an intense passion for the liberation of thought from the shackles of outworn systems and an ardent joy in all things of beauty, whether derived from a Pagan or a Christian source. Dr. Pastor constantly insists on the distinction between the "Christian" and the "Pagan" Renaissance, and he practically interprets the word "morality" in the light of a later stage of culture. But, as Mr. Pater has pointed out, the master minds of the Renaissance period "lacked the very rudiments of the historic sense." They had "no idea of development, of the differences of ages, of the process by which our race has been educated." In their view "the religions of the world were to be reconciled, not as successive stages in a regular development of the religious sense, but as subsisting side by side, and substantially in agreement with one another." Dr. Pastor ignores this crucial point when he condemns the sublime "Last Judgment" of Signorelli at Orvieto, on the ground that the painter "even introduces mythological characters." The same limitation appears when to some of the noblest paintings of Piero di Cosimo and Botticelli he applies the epithet "indecent," or again when he overlooks the fact that the work of these great artists, in its wealth or naturalistic detail, in its quaint introduction of mythological figures, and in its freshness and fulness of promise, represents an early and specially characteristic stage in the art of the Renaissance. In proof of the flourishing condition of religion Dr. Pastor lays stress on the popularity of religious processions, &c., which after all were regarded mainly as a common form of public entertainment, and on the questionable death-bed repentances of various eminent Humanists, such as Malatesta or Lorenzo the Magnificent himself. For appreciative students of the Renaissance, however, such incidents have no special significance. Amid the absorbing interests of a rich and many-sided life, men had little or no thought to spare for death. Above all things they were intensely sensitive to the impressions of the moment, and this characteristic did not desert them in the hour of death.

Dr. Pastor's judgment of Savonarola's career is severe, but more dispassionate than that of some other Roman Catholic writers. On the other hand, he does less than justice to Macchiavelli. It is surely misleading to connect Macchiavelli's name with the Renaissance, or with the Classical Revival. His position was that of a statesman eager to enhearten his oppressed countrymen for the perpetual conflicts with their fierce northern foes. Dr. Pastor, in his account of Alexander VI.'s accession and of his personal characteristics, gives us a striking portrait. He is inclined to charge the Orsini family with the guilt of the Duke of Gandia's murder (1497)—a mysterious crime which has been naturally, but too confidently imputed, to the Duke's brother, Cæsar Borgia. The writer surmises that the Orsini "found in some love adventure the easiest and safest means of putting the duke out of the way," but he admits that the evidence against them amounts only to "a well-grounded suspicion." The sixth volume carries the history down to the death of Julius II. in 1513. The first chapter deals with the decline of Savonarola's influence and his tragic end. Perhaps Dr. Pastor lays too much stress on the effect of Savonarola's defiant attitude towards the Pope. Surely the main cause of his fall was the gradual decay of his magnetic influence over the minds of the Florentines. "He had arrived at a point," says Grimm, "where he must have been a god to hold his ground further." He fell a victim to the rage of a disappointed fanaticism which he himself had kindled and on which he leaned too confidently. It is greatly to Dr. Pastor's credit that he depicts so impartially the career of Alexander VI. He speaks with just severity of the "modern attempts at whitewashing" the Borgian Pope. Indeed, he goes so far as to assert that, "from a Catholic point of view, it is impossible to blame Alexander VI. too severely." He points out, however, that the interests of religion during his reign suffered on the whole less than might have been expected. But it is almost annoying to be told in such a connexion that Alexander "took pains on many occasions to promote devotion to St. Anne," that he revived the use of the Angelus, that he was a determined enemy of heresy, and a zealous defender of orthodoxy in doctrine. In 1500 he even sent two inquisitors, we are told, "to proceed against the very numerous Picards and Waldensians in Bohemia and Moravia who led extremely immoral lives"! Dr. Pastor's account of Julius II., "that mighty scion of the Renaissance," is vivid and picturesque. He more than once points out the affinity in character between the "Terrible" Pope and Michael Angelo. "Both were extraordinary and Titanic natures, in stature beyond that of ordinary men, and such as no other age has produced." In his taut and interesting narrative of the stormy, and in some respects heroic, career of Julius, Dr. Pastor is not apparently hampered by any serious misgivings as to the Pope's aims or methods. He frankly defends the military enterprises of the "Terrible" on the ground that in an age when only material force was respected "the Popes were obliged to consolidate their temporal possessions in order to secure for themselves a standing-ground from which they could defend their spiritual authority." Naturally Dr. Pastor heaps contempt on the "schismatic" and "Antipapal" Council of Pisa (1511), and on the "false theory" of conciliar authority—namely, that a council is superior to a Pope. Naturally also he regards the Lateran Council of 1512 as forming "a landmark in the history of the world." It would be historically more correct to say that both councils were mere landmarks in the obstinate struggle between Julius and Louis XII. of France. The writer himself admits that the first object of the Lateran Synod was "to defend the liberties of the Church against the revolutionary pretensions of France."

The volume concludes with three interesting chapters—the first on the rebuilding of St. Peter's, the second on the relations between Julius and Michael Angelo, the third on Raphael's frescoes in the Vatican. In one of his excellent notes Dr. Pastor quotes a little-known letter of Overbeck which contains a fine appreciation of Michael Angelo's work in the Sistine Chapel. In his concluding passage the historian writes with enthusiasm of the traditional alliance between intellectual culture and Christianity as represented in the artistic taste of Julius. Raphael's decoration of the Camera della Segnatura is no doubt a noble tribute to the genius of a Pope distinguished by the breadth and magnificence of his ideas, and by "a preference even in art for the colossal." We have only to add that Dr. Pastor makes ample use of the additional materials now available for a description of the inner life and public policy of the Roman curia during this period. For access to the secret archives of the Vatican he is indebted to the enlightened generosity of the present Pope.

KING ALFRED'S BOETHIUS.

King Alfred's Old English Version of Boethius De Consolatione Philosophiæ. Ed. from the MSS., with Introduction, &c., by Walter John Sedgefield. 7½×5½in., xliii.+328 pp. Oxford, 1899. Clarendon Press. 10/6

Of King Alfred's work upon Boethius there are two extant manuscripts, one of the tenth century in the Cotton Library, and one of the twelfth century in the Bodleian. These two manuscripts have this important difference—that in the older book the Metra are rendered in alliterating verse, while the later book has them in a prose translation. Thus it will be perceived that the Alfredian work consists of three parts, the prose translation of the prose of Boethius and two translations of the Metra, one in prose and the other in verse. Mr. Sedgefield's edition contains the whole, with the prose Metra in the body of the text, and the poetical version of the Metra appended. This was the order taken by the last editor, Samuel Fox, in 1864, and it is manifestly the proper one. For although the oldest manuscript has the Metra in English verse, yet the prose translation was first made, as is stated in the Preface, which sets forth the authorship of the King.

The distinction of this new edition is that, whereas former editions were founded upon the twelfth century manuscript, with a selection of variants from the older book, Mr. Sedgefield has made the tenth century manuscript the basis of his text so far as it is legible, and by waiting patiently for direct rays of sunlight, he has succeeded in reading some parts which had been given up as hopeless. The Cotton MS. was seriously mutilated by the fire of 1731, and former editors found it easier to use the Bodleian MS. for their basis; but the critical advantage of the new arrangement is too obvious to need any advocacy. By means of skilful typography the reader is always aware what is the authority for every part of the text, down to the minutest details. But besides the Cotton and Bodleian manuscripts, which are the main authorities for the text, there are two subsidiary documents to be mentioned. The first is a fragment of the Alfredian translation which was discovered in 1886 by Professor Napier. This leaf had at one time been used in a binding, and then rescued from this vile use, it had been bound in as the last leaf of the manuscript in which it was recognized by the eye of the discoverer. Mr. Sedgefield has given us the Napier fragment in an appendix.

The second is one of those valuable aids to Anglo-Saxon literature which we owe to the diligent and scholarly pen of Franciscus Junius. The particular service to be noted here is that he made a good copy of the Cotton Metra, and this was made when the manuscript was sound, which in 1731 was so much damaged by fire that his transcript is now in many parts the only authority for the text.

The Introduction, which covers thirty pages, is succinct and lucid, and contains much well-selected information which the student will find very serviceable. Some things there are which to many will be new, such as the discovery of old Latin commentaries on the De Consolatione in which may be found the source of several of the additions and expansions which have been naturally attributed to the authorship of the King. The relation of Alfred's translation to the Latin original is analysed, chapter by chapter, in a neat and skilful statement which adds a new facility to the study of the book. On the question of the general authorship of this translation the editor, after mentioning the different statements, especially one tradition which groups it with Gregory's Dialogues as the work of Werferth, Bishop of Worcester, adds that modern critics have found no reason to doubt that the translation, so far as it is in prose, is entirely the work of the King. But the poetical version of the Metra has been elaborately questioned, and it has been necessary for the doubters to question also the authorship of the Preface, which begins "King Alfred was the interpreter (wealhstod) of this book" and proceeds to assert that both the prose and the poetical versions were his work. The doubt about the poetical version was first thrown out by Thomas Wright in his "Biographia Literaria"; but the discussion of the question took place a few years ago in "Anglia" between the two German Professors Leicht and Hartmann, the former maintaining that the versification is by a later hand. The observation to which he attaches most weight is this—that the alliterating version offers nothing fresh, such as we might expect from an author who had worked over the ground before, but only a weak dilution of the terse and vigorous prose. So presented this appears a valid objection, but it remains to be seen whether this allegation can be sustained.

Of the Glossary the editor says:—"As the Glossary aims at being phonological rather than syntactical or lexicographical, a full record of forms is given, rather than of shades of meaning, though these latter have not been neglected." In his detailed explanations he says:—"The main words are normalised on an early West Saxon basis." An occasional effect of this normalising is that a word may not be found in the Glossary under the initial which it has in the text. Thus for "onlic" the student must turn, not to o but to a, where it appears in its normalised form as "anlic." Sometimes the normalised form is one that does not occur in any part of the text as in "wierthe," under which there is a long and doubtless a complete record of forms, but this form is not among them. This might have been remedied by the insertion of a few references.

Enough has been said to show that Mr. Sedgefield's work is a valuable acquisition, and one that is sure to be welcomed by earnest students of the mother tongue. We would hope that the intrinsic interest of the book may cause it to find a larger public, especially in view of the approaching celebration of the thousandth anniversary of King Alfred's death.

DANTE.

The Purgatory of Dante Alighieri. Part II. The Earthly Paradise (Cantos XXVIII.-XXXIII.). An Experiment in Literal Verse Translation. By Charles Lancelot Shadwell, D.O.L. With an Introduction by John Earle, M.A., LL.D. 8½×5½in., cxxxviii.+100 pp. London, 1899.

Macmillan. 5/- n.

Dr. Shadwell, in the preface to this second instalment of his experiment in Dante translation, admits, what many of his critics suggested at the time, that his previous decision to close his task at the end of the twenty-seventh Canto of the "Purgatorio" was an error of judgment. We are glad that he has now completed a work which was too meritorious to be left in a fragmentary shape. The medium he has chosen is not likely to be generally popular, but Dr. Shadwell is none the less confident that his selection of the Marvellian stanza can be justified. It undoubtedly compels a rigid adherence to the limits of the original, and precludes expansion and padding. To this enforced compression is in large measure due the great merit of Dr. Shadwell's version. There is no blurred outline in his reflection of Dante; it is sharp and clear, and astonishingly faithful.

These last six Cantos of the "Purgatorio" are, perhaps, to the translator, as well as to the reader, the most trying in the whole poem. Though relieved by the episodes of the appearance of Matilda and Beatrice, and of the departure of Virgil, as well as by the exquisite scenery of the Earthly Paradise, it must be confessed that, on the whole, they are rather tiresome. Dr. Shadwell's translation of this part of the poem, however, betrays no signs of weariness; and if it is less attractive than the first portion, the fault lies not so much with him as with Dante himself. The following rendering of the famous passage where the poet first sees Beatrice, and discovers that Virgil has left him, will show that the former high level of excellence is well maintained:—

But we had been by Virgil left,
Of Virgil, father sweet, bereft,
Virgil, to whom I gave me,
And turned to him to save me.

* * *
"Dante, weep not; though Virgil be Departed, weep not yet; for thee
Behoves thy tears be poured
At stroke of other sword."
* * *

In royal wise, but haughty still,
Continued she, as one that will Speak, yet within him stored
Keeps back his sharper word.

"Look well! 'tis Beatrice, 'tis I;
How did'st thou dare that hill to try?
Didst thou not know that this Is man's appointed bliss?"

This may not be the ideal translation of Dante, but no impartial critic will deny that for distinction and scholarly feeling, for fidelity, and for poetical diction it may claim to rank in literature with the élite of English translations.

The most interesting portion of this volume is the introduction of Professor Earle. His recent article in the Quarterly Review on the "Vita Nuova" and the Beatrice question has aroused an interest in his speculations which will certainly not be lessened by his present contribution. We must be content to mention one or two of the most striking of his points. The Gryphon in the mystical Procession, which is commonly regarded as representing Christ, an interpretation which involves several difficulties, in Professor Earle's view stands for "the general body of the Faithful, the bulk of the Christian congregation, the simple folk, the unlettered laity," and is "the complement to the graceful beauty of Beatrice, who represents the élite, the dignity, authority, wisdom, and government of the Christian Church." Matilda, again, is "not a woman, but Woman." Professor Earle is nothing if not original. Some of his speculations are not only original, but startling, at any rate to the orthodox Danteist. Starting with the fact that green is the recognized symbol of hope, he believes in the ultimate salvation, not only of the righteous heathen whom Dante sees on the green meadow in Limbo (Inf. iv. iii.), but also of Brunetto Latini (low down in Hell), who is compared to one of those who run for the green mantle at Verona, and to the winner, not to the one who loses. If we object that the inscription over the Gate of Hell bids those within to abandon hope, Professor Earle replies that "the only credential" of this announcement "is that the mouth of Hell hath spoken it." This is ingenious, especially when we remember that, in spite of this announcement, Hell had on several occasions, on Dante's own showing, been raided by a higher power. Whether he be convinced or not, the reader will find plentiful food for reflection in Professor Earle's suggestion that perhaps Dante may have intended to sow the seeds of a better eschatology than that prevalent in his time. Like many another seer, Professor Earle possesses the convenient faculty of not seeing what he does not want to see, and on occasion he can keep his eyes very tight shut indeed. In the minutely-detailed data, for example, as to the day of Beatrice's death, furnished by Dante in the "Vita Nuova," upon which believers in the reality of Beatrice base one of their strongest arguments, he sees nothing. "This disquisition upon comparative manacles is simply a blind." Whatever may be thought of the soundness of Professor Earle's views, they are certainly refreshingly novel. Even if he makes few converts, he will at least have given a fresh impulse to inquiry, and opened up new paths of speculation.

A "STORY OF A NATION" CONCLUDED.

Austria. By Sidney Whitman, M.A. "The Story of the Nations" Series. 8×5½ in., 402 pp. London, 1899.

Fisher Unwin. 5/-

This is one of the least satisfactory volumes in this series of elementary histories. It is unsatisfactory since it is in a large measure misleading. The system of division of the Austrian Empire which has been adopted for the purposes of this series is not altogether fortunate. It was possible to sever the history of the Kingdom of Hungary from that of the rest of the Austrian Empire, since Hungary has been and is even now a distinct and separate nationality. But, in spite of the difficulty of tracing side by side the growth of two other distinct peoples, it seems barely permissible to draw a hard and fast line between the Austria of which Mr. Whitman writes and Bohemia. Since this course has been adopted, however, it was incumbent upon the compiler of this history to devote at least one chapter of his book to a clear demonstration of the respective values of the Austrian peoples. This Mr. Whitman has not done. In spite of a prefatory note this book, is bound to produce upon the mind of any uninformed reader an erroneous impression of the constitution of the Austrian Empire. While we are willing to admit the difficulties with which Mr. Whitman has had to contend, it was his duty to point out more definitely than he has done that Bohemia is even now the keystone of the Austrian Empire, and that the Austria dealt with in this volume is merely the strip of land south of Bohemia which was colonized by the Germans, the hereditary enemies of the founders of the Bohemian Empire.

In view of the fact that this series has already included a fairly sympathetic sketch of the history of Bohemia by Mr. C. E. Maurice, and that Count Francis Lützow published, in 1896, in English, an admirable history of the same country, we could have found little fault with the ground traversed by Mr. Whitman if he had insisted more definitely upon the points we have mentioned. The first portion of the volume relates, in strictness, to the early history of modern Germany as opposed to that of modern Austria. The internal condition of Europe during the middle ages was so complicated and mutable that this method was necessary in tracing "the record of the history of Austria as connected with the Imperial House." The Slavs at times overflowed into German provinces, leaving Slavonic names behind them for towns and lands, and when they retired the Germans advanced. An extraordinary blunder in spelling the well-known Bohemian names of Vladislav and Vratislav as Bladislav and Bratislav seems to suggest not only the lack of sympathy for the Slavonic peoples which is palpable throughout this volume but also a very considerable ignorance of Bohemian history on the part of Mr. Whitman. From these pages it would seem that the task of subduing the Slavonic nations was of the simplest nature. This was far from being the case. The history of Bohemia begins in the ninth century. It was not until the battle of the Marchfeld in 1278, when Rudolph of Habsburg defeated his former master, Premysl Ottakar II., that the Germans gained a foothold in Bohemia. It was not until the battle of the White Mountain in 1620 that Bohemia ceased to be an independent State.

At this date the history of Count Lützow ends. From this date only the Austrian Empire (excluding Hungary), as we know it, begins. The power of the Habsburgs then became complete. But the perusal of this volume would leave the recent disturbances in Prague and in the Reichsrath at Vienna totally inexplicable to the reader who was uninformed of the older history of the Empire. It is a journalistic commonplace that only the personality of the present Emperor has kept together the various nations under his rule, but it was the duty of the compiler of this volume to have explained the statement. Mr. Whitman's anti-Slavonic prepossessions seem to render him unable to comprehend the feeling of the original peoples of Austria towards the Germanic intruders.

A single sentence in the book, referring to the murder of the late Crown Prince Rudolph, calls for notice in this connexion:—

The heir to the Throne, the Archduke Rudolph, had taken his life while in an abnormal state of mind, induced, if continental rumour is to be believed, by the artifice of enemies of the Royal House.

It would be interesting to learn whether the writer of this sentence intended to throw upon the Czechs the blame for the tragic termination of a love affair, and what is the source of this "continental rumour." The ineptitude of the sentence is insurpassable.

ATHENIAN RHETORIC.

Euripides and the Attic Orators. A Comparison. By A. Douglas Thompson, M.A., D.Litt. 9×5½ in., 193 pp. London, 1898. Macmillan. 6/-

This is a useful piece of work, although more might have been made of it. Dr. Thompson has collected out of Euripides and the Attic orators a number of passages, which he has classified under the following heads:—Physical Theories, Religion and Kindred Subjects, Death and the Future Life, Life in its General Aspects, Ethics, Public Life, Politics, Private Life. The extracts, or at least all such as are important, are given in full, and connected by brief comments. A final chapter sums up the result. If the result is largely negative, this (as the author remarks) is scarcely his fault. At the same time, we wish he had better digested his material. The headings given above will show that his arrangement is somewhat haphazard. It is odd to find Public Life and Politics treated in separate chapters; education, which is placed under Public Life, belongs rather to Private; and, in short, it would not be difficult to rearrange the matter on a more natural principle. The occasional comments, too, are meagre; the whole reads more like extracts from a notebook than a complete criticism or study. Still, scholars will undoubtedly find this collection of passages useful; and although Dr. Thompson has not made a book, he has printed the material for one.

As far as Euripides is concerned, Dr. Thompson follows Berlage's "De Euripide Philosopho"; and his own contribution is chiefly that he has included the orators in his survey. It is always difficult in dealing with a dramatist to distinguish the poet from his characters, and it is not surprising that Dr. Thompson has not always been able to do this. Some of the inconsistencies here noted may very likely be due to that cause. However, after making due allowance for this, Dr. Thompson's quotations make it quite clear that Euripides was continually wavering amid many opinions. Our opinion of him as a thinker will not be raised by this study. His mind was sceptical, he saw the difficulties of the popular faith or superstition; but he was not strong enough to formulate a real and living philosophy, or even to attain to a working hypothesis. He was no prophet like Æschylus, no calm man of the world like Sophocles; he saw life unsteadily, and in parts, now in one part, now in another, but never whole. Fine thoughts there are, but there are many weak lamentations; we feel that it were a nobler thing to bow without quailing before a pitiless Necessity, Fate, Nemesis, than to be content with querulous complaint. Dr. Thompson sees three stages in the thought of Euripides—the first, when he "acquiesced in the generally accepted beliefs; the second period, beginning with the Peloponnesian War and lasting some twenty years, when he was at open enmity with those beliefs; and, finally, the period of his latest dramas, when, though he never returned to his original position, he came to look on his campaign as labour lost, and desisted from the attempt."

The passages quoted from the orators are most disappointing. In matters ethical and religious theirs is always the commonplace view; and it becomes clear that the Athenians as a whole were eminently orthodox, and that philosophical speculations had made very little impression upon them. Even in Demosthenes we search vainly for those magnificent denunciations of wrong and appeals to eternal justice, those profound reflections on statecraft which make such an orator as Burke precious for all time. What we do find is more of the nature of proverbial philosophy. On the whole, we may fairly doubt whether the average Athenian was really as intelligent as the average member of Parliament, at least of Burke's Parliament. We have no space to follow out these reflections. When we observe how many thoughts the book has suggested we become still more convinced of its value. Opinions may change, the most brilliant critics and historians may show bias or exaggerate the importance of this thing and that; but a collection of extracts, if correct and complete (and so these are, on the whole, within their prescribed limits) is independent of shifting opinion or points of view. We must call attention to one error which is almost universal—the use of the phrase "ἀρχων βασιλεύς" (p. 47). No such title was known in Athens; both in books and inscriptions the person meant is called simply βασιλεύς.

ON THE TRANS-SIBERIAN RAILWAY.

From Peking to Petersburg. By Arnot Reid. 8½×5½ in., 300 pp. London, 1896. Arnold. 7/6

To those who desire a clear presentment in brief of the influences bearing upon the predicament of China and the future overland communication with the East Mr. Arnot Reid's book will be of timely interest. It abounds in shrewd observation, and gives the most effective account of the Trans-Siberian Railway that has yet appeared. To travellers his experience will further serve to dispel existing misapprehension as to the risk attending the modern use of the ancient trade route between Russia and China. The same trail by which more than two hundred years ago the earliest Russian Embassy reached Peking offers at the present day but little difficulty and much variety to the duly accredited rover who can sit a horse, endure the rattle of a tarantass, and sustain the restrictions of prolonged railway transport. The author disclaims any title to rank as an explorer; he shows himself admirably qualified to note effects and to judge their causes. Thus critical narrative supplies the place of adventure.

It is natural, in estimating the significance of his journey that we should by a ὑστερον πρότερον attach precedence to its concluding stage, since that deals prominently with the great line which will put a girdle round a vast continent to the very probable derangement of the Old World. Mr. Reid struck the Trans-Siberian Railway at Lake Baikal, its then limit, in September of last year. Begun in 1892, with a distance of 5,000 miles to traverse, and a calculation of thirteen years for its accomplishment, already one half the time and space is covered. There seems small reason to doubt that by 1905 Moscow will be in continuous touch with Port Arthur. That the prime design is political and military rather than commercial is abundantly evident. The very stations are on sidings that the main line may admittedly be kept clear for the passage of an army. The further objects, immigration and development, are fostered inasmuch as they are subsidiary to the first. The railway is a State railway only not in name. Regarding its general benefit to the world Mr. Reid conjectures that it should, in the long run, prove a profitable undertaking, provided it is honestly worked. Siberia is rich in minerals; enthusiasts say very rich. Its wheat already reaches Germany. A mail service between London and Peking may eventually be reduced to eighteen days. Of the travelling accommodation the writer gives a good-humoured picture. It is still experimental; but once a week a train de luxe runs over part of the system, an advantage which he had the ill luck to miss.

In the chapters dealing with China the author exhibits a faculty for unprejudiced discrimination. If we do not wholly agree with the theory that he builds upon a comparison of the Chinese in the Straits Settlements with those of the Mainland, it is because, notwithstanding Dr. Johnson's dictum, we perhaps lay more stress upon patriotism than upon business capacity for the foundation of a durable state. One is rock, the other clay. Mr. Reid admits the Chinese to be devoid of the higher quality. Nothing could be clearer or more concise than his treatment of the question of railways in China. The aims and interests of each separate European Power in this respect are set forth categorically. The key to the situation is found in the Lu-han concession in the hands of the Belgian Syndicate for the line from Peking southward to Hankau on the Yang-tze. Round this the contention is at present closest. But the moves and counter-moves in the jealous game are incessant, and may be protracted until the completion of her own railway, above recorded, puts Russia in a position to play "check by discovery." For lighter incidents in the book we have the journey through Mongolia, which occupied eighteen days, partly on horseback and partly in native carts. The Desert of Gobi had to be crossed, here a very different operation from that which in its western tracts nearly cost Sven Hedin his life. Everywhere the author was received with hospitality and forwarded with help, for which he was as much indebted to the disposition of the inhabitants as to a precise order from the Tsung-li-Yamen.

Mr. Reid's book is one that should be widely consulted, an enjoyment facilitated by the ease with which its several sections may be taken apart, and put together again as a whole. In this it resembles the ingenious ice-breaker ferry he describes on Lake Baikal. It is not many books that would stand the test.

VERHAEREN IN ENGLISH.

Poems of Emile Verhaeren. Selected and Rendered into English by Alma Strettell. 8½×6¼, 34 pp. London, 1899. Lane. 5/- n.

Even so able a writer as Mr. Arthur Symonds failed in his translation of the verse of M. Emile Verhaeren, the foremost contemporary poet of Belgium, and certainly among the six foremost living poets who use natively the French language. And yet Mr. Symonds' task in Les Aubes was easier than that to which Miss Alma Strettell has set herself. Verhaeren is a poet of divers and strongly-marked styles: the author of Les Flamandes, Les Flambeaux Noirs, Les Campagnes Hallucinées, Les Villes Tentaculaires, and Les Heures Claires—to specify perhaps the most distinctive of his books—seems, as a French critic has said, to comprise himself and several others, all called Emile Verhaeren. Miss Strettell—who, as the co-translator of The Bard of the Dimbovitza, has already proved herself a skilled translator—has set herself to represent Verhaeren by less than a score of poems selected from Les Villages Illusoires, Les Heures Claires, and Les Apparitions dans les Chemins. The choice does not seem altogether fortunate. There are finer, more characteristic, in every way more noteworthy poems in the earlier books, and, above all, in Les Campagnes Hallucinées and Les Villes Tentaculaires. That, however, is a matter of opinion. It is, perhaps, hard to understand why there should be a translation of Emile Verhaeren's poetry at all. It is not of a kind to appeal to readers who know nothing of the décor, of the background, of the poet's external materials, while those who do know will certainly be able to read the poems in the original. Miss Strettell, of course, must have thought otherwise, and it may be that she is right. And if a translation had to appear, we are glad to owe it to so skilled and sympathetic an interpreter.

Yet we must say candidly that there is not a single poem which is not obviously a translation, and a laboured translation. All are faithful; every now and then occur lines which genuinely convey both the force and meaning of the original; but the music, the rhythm, the sonorous chant, are lost. The first poem will do as well as any other to test this statement. It is "La Pluie," from Les Villages Illusoires. In the original, "The Rain" is a lovely poem, whose rhythms suggest the sudden rushes and the still, slow falling of the rain itself. Miss Strettell, like nearly all English translators from French, adds superfluous words, apparently in dread of an accusation of bald literalness. In the following lines there is not only superfluity and the mechanical pleonasm of "infinitely" and "endlessly," but a loss in music:—

Long as unending threads, the long-drawn rain
Interminably, with its nails of grey,
Athwart the dull-grey day,
Rattles the green window-pane,
So infinitely, endlessly, the rain,
The long, long rain,
The rain.

We turn to the original, and find

Longue comme des fils sans fin, la longue pluie
Interminablement, à travers le jour gris,
Râcle les carreaux verts avec ses ongles gris,
Infiniment, la pluie,
La longue pluie,
La pluie.

How delicate is

Mouillés qu'ils sont de longue pluie, Tenacement, indéfinie.

and how harsh

With the long rain, tenaciously, with rain Indefinite.

and how from

Et c'est toujours la pluie
La longue pluie
Fine et dense, comme la suie.

all the music has gone in

And still there is the rain,
The long, long rain,
Like soot so fine and dense.

This is neither better nor worse than the rest of the book, and this being so, we cannot give Miss Alma Strettell's new venture the welcome we should like to give.

SERBIAN LITERATURE.

The Vicar of Wakefield (Vekfildski Svesztenik). By O. Goldsmith. Translated into Serbian by Dr. Ljubomir Nedicz. 7½×5in., xxvi.+123 pp. Belgrad, 1898. Serbian Literary Association (Srpska književna zadruka). 2 dinara (1/8)

There is a gravity in the character of the Slavonians which fits them for the appreciation of English literature. "English authors," says a writer in the official organ of the Serbian Academy at Neusatz, "are, perhaps, the only authors in Europe, besides the Russians, who look upon literature as a mission; they are almost alone in their understanding of the word 'earnestness.'" The writer holds our literature up before the eyes of his countrymen as a model for them to follow. "The Vicar of Wakefield" has been translated once into Bohemian, twice into Polish, and three times into Russian. It is an excellent rendering of the classic which Dr. Nedicz now sets before his countrymen. A Professor at the Belgrade University School, a critic by nature and habit, acquainted with English life by a residence in this country, he has qualifications for his task which one hardly dares to look for in a translator. He has furnished his translation with precise and unobtrusive notes upon such mysteries as "true-love knots," "musical glasses," "the controversy between Thwackum and Square," the duties of Squire Thornhill's "feeder," and the like. M. Mijalkowicz, who has been entrusted with the incidental verse, has performed his task eminently well. It is certainly strange to hear Edwin calling Angelina his "white Vila," but the frank Slavonism drives the endearment further home without obscuring the original, and a verse rendering of poetry is none the less true because it is free.

Until forty years ago the English language was unknown among the Serbs, and such acquaintance as they had with our literature was made through the medium of German and Italian translations. When Stephan Stephanovicz laid the foundations of the Servian dramatic school in 1826 with his tragedy, Tsar Urosz, he was largely indebted to Shakespeare for his methods; but he knew Shakespeare only in a German version, for not one of Shakespeare's plays had yet been translated into Servian. The first Servian translation of a Shakespeare play, Romeo and Juliet to wit, appeared three years later, in 1829; and that was the translation of a German translation, and bad at that—"greatly corrupted," says Szafarik. "Uncle Tom's Cabin" (1854), "Lara," the "Giaour" (1856), "Venus and Adonis" (1861), all came into Servia by way of Germany; Chesterfield's Letters (1830) and Goldsmith's "History of Rome" (1841) were translated from the Italian.

Direct translation began in 1860 with Shakespeare's Richard III., followed in 1865 by Dickens' "Battle of Life," and Lytton's "Last Days of Pompeii"—in the "Women's Pastime" Series. Shakespeare has attracted the best energies of the translators, notably of Laza Kostic, poet, critic, and anglophil. "Venus and Adonis," so far from pleasing, had called down the wrath of critics, and been damned as a product of the "hyper-civilization, or, in other words, demoralization of the West." But Laza Kostic's Romeo and Juliet attained the rare honour of a second edition in ten years; Hamlet and King Lear have each been translated twice; and 1882 brought no less than three new translations from Shakespeare into Servia.

Great among translators is Jovan Jovanovicz, whose "Enoch Arden," in graceful rhyming decasyllables, is a Servian classic. It is the only work of Tennyson's known to the Serbs; and even that has come by the by-ways, for Jovanovicz translated from the German, and the Servo-Croatian translator took it from the Italian. Notable among books translated are "Robinson Crusoe" (1873 and 1884), "Pilgrim's Progress," "The Mill on the Floss," Buckle's "History of Civilization" (that arch-delight of the Slavonians, Mill's "Logic," Mill's "Subjection of Women," and Darwin's "Origin of Species." The Literary Association, since it began operations seven years ago, has published along with original Servian works translations from such various authors as Molière, Ariosto, George Eliot, Voltaire, and Potapenko.

When Servian literature rose from the dust of ecclesiastic learning a century ago, it rose by its own natural and national vigour. The popular oral poetry was collected by Vuk Karadzic and his fellow-workers, and became the basis of a new and poetic literature. Foreign influence has played only a small part in its development, and that influence has borne fruit chiefly in dramatic and technical works. The Servians are beginning to feel the lack of imaginative prose; and, for want of a school of novelists of their own, are wisely supplying their need with the best work of the best writers abroad.

HEINE'S "MOUCHE."

Heinrich Heine's Last Days. By Camille Selden. Translated from the French by Mary Thiddall. 7½ x 5½ in., 128 pp. London, 1899. Unwin. 6/-

In the introduction to her excellent translation, Miss Mary Thiddall pleads for a more direct and personal recognition of "Camille Selden," whose fame with us rests almost solely on the fact of her association with Heine. Few English people know that Camille Selden had, on her own account, a romantic history before her meeting with him—being deserted in her girlhood by a husband who, having spent her dot, did not hesitate to get her falsely imprisoned for lunacy. Few know that she was "professor of German" at the Lycée Jeanne d'Arc, besides being the author of critical contributions to the French reviews, and of various original works, as well as the translator of Goethe's "Elective Affinities," and Max Reichard's "Recollections." However, when all justice is done to her achievements and to her personality, she still interests us most strongly as the original of Heine's Mouche. The friendship began in a casual fashion:—

I knew Heine at the close of his life, but had been acquainted with him as writer and poet long before I saw his face for the first time. On one occasion, when returning from Vienna, I was the bearer of a packet for him, some sheets of music, which one of his admirers was dedicating to him. For greater safety, I went myself to deliver these at his house, and, having executed the commission, was on the point of leaving when a sharp pull at the bell resounded from another room. The servant returned, and I was struck by the slightly imperious ring of a voice which forbade her to let me go away. A door opened, and I penetrated into a much darkened room, stumbling as I did so against a screen covered with paper, painted to imitate lacquer. Behind this screen, on a low bed, was stretched a man, ill and half blind. He appeared still young, although he was in reality far from being so, and he must once have been handsome. He raised himself on his pillows and stretched out his hand to me, saying that he was very glad to talk to some one who came from "over there." A sigh accompanied the "over there"; touching words which died on his lips like the echo of some distant and well-known melody. Friendship makes rapid growth when sympathies are exchanged by the bed of a sick man, and in the neighbourhood of death. As I was leaving he presented me with a book and begged me to come again. I took this simply for a polite speech and remained away, fearing lest I might be troublesome to an invalid. He wrote and scolded me. The reproach flattered as much as it touched me, and from this time my visits never ceased until that gloomy February morning when we took him to his last resting-place.

When "Camille Selden" comes to write of Heine's wife, there is an amusing little touch of something not very unlike feminine jealousy about her description:—

She was not at all what I had imagined Frau Heine would be. I had pictured her to myself as elegant, languorous, and slight, with a pale and ardent face, lighted up by great velvety treacherous eyes. What I saw was a simple-looking, stout brunette, with a high colour and a cheery face; one of those persons of whom one says, "She ought to walk and take exercise." What a sad contrast between this vigorous woman, made for an open-air life, and the pale, dying man, who, from the depths of an anticipated tomb, found the necessary energy to earn not only the daily bread, but the wherewithal to buy fine dresses.

Poor Frau Heine! It did not strike "Camille Selden" that possibly that very contrast of vigour and health brought more colour into the life of the invalid than many "pale, ardent faces," with treacherous eyes. As for the fine dresses, who knows but that they were Heine's vicarious share of the pageant of the world? They were evidently an eyesore to the sympathetic visitor of the husband, but quite possibly a satisfaction to the husband himself.

The letters to his friend, written for the most part in great suffering, are chiefly notes imploring her to visit him, and do not add as much to Heine-lore as the prose translations at the end of the little book. The translator has done her work very well.

A YIDDISH POET.

Songs from the Ghetto. By Morris Rosenfeld. 7½ x 4½ in., viii. + 115 pp. Boston, 1898. Copeland & Day. $1.25

These poems in Yiddish, i.e., the German dialect spoken by the Jews of Poland, which are accompanied with a prose translation by Dr. Wiener, of Harvard, are a somewhat notable phenomenon. They are written by a Polish Jew who came to England, and took service with a sweeter, and afterwards migrated to New York, where the condition of affairs in the lower branches of the clothing trade is as bad as, if not worse than, in England. These poems, written in a barbarous jargon, express from the inner side the feelings of a sweated tailor, when the shop clock seems to call him "machine" and cries out to him "sew." To all the questions which the Apreter (operator) raises there is one answer, says Mr. Rosenfeld; when the work has killed him another will be sitting in his place and sewing.

Not all these poems deal, however, with the sweating shop, though all bear the impress of the misery caused by it. A special section is devoted to what are termed National Songs, dealing mainly with the misery caused to her Jewish subjects by Russia in her determination to preserve unity in the national creed. One of the best of these is entitled "The Jewish Soldier," a vision of the heights of Plevna; the soldier's ghost summons up the spirit of his comrades, from whom it asks, "Did I not fall for Russia's honour on this spot?" and the other soldiers lift their hands and swear, "You died nobly for your land." Then the other ghosts disappear—an effective touch—and the Jewish soldier cries out, "Oh Russia! You have separated me from my wife and child, I died in defending your honour, why do you drive away my wretched family? I send a heavy curse to you through the wind."

A curious point is raised by the technique of these poems. No one can fail to be struck by the resemblance in method to Heine's work. Take for instance the following short poem.

Es trillert der Kanarik
In freien Wald altein,— Wer Känn sein Seimche [Heb. joy] fühlen?
Wer Känn sein Freud' varstëhn?

Es trillert der Kanarik
In reichsten Palaz schoen,— Wer Känn sein Wehtag fühlen?
Wer Känn sein Schmerz varstëhn?

That is written either under the direct influence of Heine, or one must attribute the similarity to the influence of race, which would be more than remarkable if it produced so close an analogy in point not alone of method but even of metre. Dr. Wiener in his short introduction does not discuss this point, which would, perhaps, be the most interesting to the outside world. He states, however, that Mr. Rosenfeld is well read in German and English literature, and we may fairly assume an acquaintance with Heine. If so, some of the singularity of these poems disappear, though enough remains to render this little book one of considerable interest from many points of view. The pathos and power of the poems are unmistakable, and the cry of anguish sincere and piercing.

Dr. Wiener gives a glossary and translation (not too adequate for its purpose) which render it easy for the reader acquainted with German to follow the Yiddish. As will be seen from the specimen above, Yiddish is but a dialect of German with a few Hebrew and Slavonic words intermixed—altogether a curiosity of literature and something more than a curiosity.

GREGOROVIVS' HADRIAN.

The Emperor Hadrian: A Picture of the Græco-Roman World in his Time. By Ferdinand Gregorovius. Translated by Mary E. Robinson. 9½ x 6 in., xviii. + 414 pp. London, 1898. Macmillan. 12/- n.

"My first studies in the field of history," says the author in his prefatory note, "were devoted to the age of the Emperor Hadrian." These studies were published by him in 1851; and we have here the product of his revision of them in his old age. "The ceaseless researches of science have produced new documentary evidence . . . (and) with the help of this evidence, especially of the inscriptions, I have re-written my first work, so thoroughly indeed that little more than the plan has been preserved."

His book has the advantage of an introduction by Professor Pelham, in which he draws in outline his own suggestive portrait of Hadrian so far as he figures as a peacemaker, and also gives in the following sentences his criticism upon Gregorovius' picture of the Emperor and his times:—

[He] would have been the last to claim for his essay that it said the final word on Hadrian, and it must be confessed that his work is not all equally good. He is at his best in the chapters which describe the general culture, the literary, philosophic, and artistic movements of the day. He is weakest when dealing with the political history, and with the many technicalities of Roman administration. Here his grasp of the situation is less sure, and his use of technical terms not always correct.

The general justice of the criticism is beyond dispute. No one can call the first part of the book, as a whole, either strong or brilliant. The narrative of Hadrian's reign is, nearly all of it, told baldly, and without any literary merit; the best chapters, perhaps, being those which describe his journeyings in Egypt, though even these are by no means first-rate. Here and there, too, the author's work is, considering the scale on which the book is planned, almost inadequate. He does not, for example, bring out with sufficient emphasis the dark allegations as to Hadrian's relations with his wife, and her hatred of him. There is not a little in this first part of the book that is better done by Merivale, whose pages have a continuous interest and an unfailing brightness of colouring which are wanting in the narrative of the German writer. Gregorovius' summary, however, of Hadrian's physiognomy and character is vividly written, and shows the author at his best.

It has been observed that the busts of Hadrian show a foreign, not a Roman face, possessing neither the Latin beauty of the Julian family, nor the mild gravity of the features of Trajan. It is more finely cut, but it is neither sympathetic nor intellectual. Artificially curled hair hangs over a brow which cannot be called thoughtful, and the short beard, which was said to have been worn to conceal a blemish, is rather a disfigurement than an ornament to the face. Hadrian is said to have let it grow to conceal some scars. This marble face does not convey the impression of all that was contained in the character of this strange man. He was a mass of contradictions, which no single portrait could display. For, on the one hand, we find his delight in the intellect of Greece and in Eastern sensuality, his enthusiastic love for art, his sophisticated versatility, his sound judgment, his statemanship, his humanity and generosity. But there is also the darker side of his capricious temper, his inordinate vanity, his love of irony and of trifles, and his gloomy mysticism. Who could hope to reconcile these conflicting traits in one portrait? We cannot see his bust without asking who the distinguished man is, so conscious of his own power, with the questioning glance and the light observant smile playing round his mouth. It must be the likeness of one who has been sovereign in some sphere of life, and has ruled over the spirit of his age.

As regards the second part of the volume—that which deals with the Roman society and culture of the period—not a little of it also is dull and prosy, while the unnecessary multiplication of short chapters adds an unfortunate impression of scrappiness. But towards the end the writer gives us some admirable work. His chapter on Alexander of Abonotichus—"the Cagliostro of the second century"—is indeed out of all proportion in its length to the rest of the book, but it is capital reading. So, too, the chapters on art are first-rate, while the following description of Hadrian's villa at Tivoli is highly pictorial:—

The villa was as large as a city, and contained everything that makes a city beautiful and gay; the ordinary and commonplace alone were not to be found there. Gardens, fountains, groves, colonnades, shady corridors and cool domes, baths and lakes, basilicas, libraries, theatres, circuses, and temples of the gods shining with precious marble and filled with works of art, were all gathered together round this imperial palace. The large household, the stewards with their bands of slaves, the body guards, the swarms of artists, singers and players, the courtesans and ladies of distinction, the priests of the temple, the men of science and poets, the friends and guests of Hadrian: these all composed the inhabitants of the villa, and this crowd of courtiers, idlers, and slaves had no other object but to cheer one single man who was weary of the world, to dispel his ennui by feasts of Dionysus, and to delude him into thinking that each day was an Olympian festival.

We only wish that the author had shown something of the same literary capacity throughout.

AMERICAN MINIATURES.

Heirlooms in Miniatures. By Anne Hollingsworth Wharton. With a Chapter on Miniature Painting by Emily Drayton Taylor. 8½×5¼in., xx.+250 pp. Philadelphia and London, 1898. Lippincott.

The art of the miniaturist is rapidly resuming its place in the affections of the portrait-lover—far more rapidly, indeed, than can be justified by the meagre supply of competent artists to meet the demand. Miniaturists there are by the score—the two existing London societies boast more than two hundred on their roll of members; but the average of excellence is so low—relatively to the ability of the masters of the past—that the leading practitioners (and those are of no vast ability) may be counted on the fingers of one hand. To three main causes may be attributed this deplorable condition of things. In the first place, disuse—for the introduction of photography almost killed the art, in spite of Chalon's prophecy; in the second place, the attempt of miniaturists to imitate the precise and matter-of-fact qualities of a photograph—and, indeed, copying if not often actually painting over it—so that a frank photograph did practically as well; and in the third, the delusion to which many of the lady miniaturists (for most miniaturists are ladies) and not a few of the men are subject, that miniature-painting does not require the severe, earnest, and devoted application to artistic study which is admitted to be requisite for success in portrait-painting on a larger scale. It seems to be forgotten that fine drawing is a necessity, and that the "help" of a photograph acts like a blight upon true art.

Yet, although the renaissance of the miniature is an undeniable fact, alike in England, France, and America, and although five or even ten miniatures are commissioned to-day for every one that was ordered five years ago, this sudden growth is to a great extent exotic. It has been called into being rather through the enthusiasm of the writers on the miniature—Mr. Foster, Dr. Lumsden Propert, and Dr. Williamson—than by any intelligent recognition of the achievements or exertions of the painters themselves. Already a literature of the subject is springing up; and the art, so long as it proves itself on the upward grade, will doubtless become a cult. The latest book on the subject comes from America, and perchance may have some effect in stimulating public interest in the States.

But it is hardly a book for English readers, although the student of the subject will be glad that it has been done at all and sorry that it has not been done better. The very title of the volume is awkward; the book itself is poorly written and curiously discursive; while, however interesting to a narrow circle of American society may be the chit-chat that occupies so great a part of it, to English readers generally it will be regarded as superfluous. These side-lights upon families whose chief claim to fame seems to be the fact that second or third rate miniaturists painted portraits of members of them are not entertaining. Had the space been occupied by criticism or technical description of the artists' work—which we had a right to expect, but which is almost wholly denied to us—real value would have been imparted to the book. We certainly have interesting new facts concerning American painters—West, Copley, and one or two more—but we have slips and errors that shake our confidence in the writer's accuracy. Thus she speaks of "James Smart" when she means John Smart; of Samuel "Shelly" instead of "Shelley"; of "Fresnay" instead, presumably, of "du Fresnoy"; of "Far.rington" instead of "Farington"; while "Sir Joshua Lawrence" (p. 182) leaves the reader in doubt as to whether Reynolds or Lawrence is intended. She is not aware that it was Chalon who said to Queen Victoria—in reply to the inquiry if photography would not oust the miniature—"Madame, de photograph cannot flatter," and, in commenting on a statement by "Mr." Cunningham (the author appears to be under the impression that Cunningham is a contemporary writer) she appends this egregious footnote :—

Mr. Cunningham seems to have overlooked the fact that Thomas Gainsborough painted even more portraits than landscapes. According to a recent estimate of his work, of the three hundred paintings executed by him over two hundred were portraits, among them some of the most beautiful in England—notably, those of the Countess of Sussex, Mrs. Siddons, and the Hon. Mrs. Graham.

Blunders of opinion, fact, and wit are all in this paragraph. What "Mr." Cunningham said was that "Gainsborough's excellence lay in landscape"—an opinion shared by many people at the present day. To suppose that he was in any doubt as to Gainsborough's portraits is absurd. The enumeration of Gainsborough's most famous and most popular portraits of ladies is surely unnecessary, while the only "recent" estimate of the painter's pictures accounts for nearer 1,000 than 300, of which the portraits number, not 200, but more than 700. We may complain, also, that neither in the main portion of the book, nor in Miss Taylor's historical chapter, have we any reference to Petitot, Antonio More, Zincke, Russell, Ross, Newton, or Mr. H. T. Wells, while it is irritating to find that nearly every one of the numerous women dealt with is described as "beautiful," none as only pretty, while Margaret Champlin is both "a belle and a beauty." Otherwise amusing is the author's explanation that it must have been Buckingham Palace which Miss Sully visited, by reason of the lady's vivid recollection of its "beautiful marble halls"—unless, indeed, Miss Sully is poking fun at that woful example of poor and often tasteless decoration.

When the time comes for the history of miniature-painting in America to be written, "Heirlooms in Miniatures" may be of real use to the judicious compiler of the book that is to be; but in the meantime this study will not help the art world very much. Not that there is any lack of books that would have assisted the author to produce a volume of greater excellence than this.

OTHER NEW BOOKS.

The story of Napoleon's captivity at St. Helena has been told many times and from many points of view. A DIARY OF ST. HELENA (Innes, 5s.) gives us yet another version of it. The journal in question was kept in the years 1816 and 1817 by Lady Malcolm, and contains a record of the conversations of the de-throned Emperor with her husband, Admiral Sir Pulteney Malcolm, then in command of the Cape station, which included the island of St. Helena. As an account of the treatment of Napoleon by Sir Hudson Lowe, it inspires more confidence than the prejudiced narratives of Sir Hudson himself on the one hand, or of Las Cases and O'Meara on the other. A perusal of it makes it pretty clear that both the gaoler and his captive meant well, and that all the trouble arose because they were constitutionally incapable of getting on together. Sir Pulteney had his own little differences with Sir Hudson, but he admits that he did not deliberately lay himself out to bully Napoleon, though his unfortunate manner gave Napoleon the ineradicable impression that this was his design. That is the conclusion to which careful comparison of the rival statements has always led impartial readers; and now we have it confirmed by independent testimony.

Napoleon's table-talk has a perennial interest for most of us, and the diary gives us plenty of his obiter dicta on military and other matters. Here is a note, for example, on the Eastern Question :—

Speaking of keeping the Grand Seignior in full power, "France," he said, "ought never to consent to the dismemberment of Turkey. When I was at Tilsit I used to talk jolly (bavard), call the Turks barbarians, and that they ought to be turned out of Europe, but I never intended to do so, for when I looked at the map I saw it was not for the interest of France that Constantinople should be in the hands of Austria or Russia."

And here is yet another statement of Napoleon's view of the strategy and tactics of the Waterloo campaign :—

"Wellington ought to have retreated and not fought that battle, for had he lost it, I should have established myself in France; but had I been obliged to follow the English and Prussians, in the end I must have been beaten by the junction of the allied armies. Wellington risked too much, for by the rules of war I should have gained the battle. I calculated that General Grouchy would have kept the Prussians in check till I beat the English; and he ought to have done so."

The diary, though very interesting, is quite short. A brief introduction, which explains everything that needs explaining, is contributed by Sir Arthur Wilson, who, as editor, also throws in an occasional footnote.

Mr. Harry Vandervell has done for the modern cargo steamer what Dana did long ago for the sailing vessel (or "wind-jammer," as Mr. Vandervell would probably term it). Shipping before the mast as an ordinary seaman, he gives us in A SHUTTLE OF AN EMPIRE'S LOOM (Blackwood, 6s.) a graphic description of a five months' voyage round the world. The author has a keen eye for character, and brings vividly before us all the various discomforts and slender alleviations that go to make up fo'c's'le life. Mr. Vandervell stuck to his work gallantly, but a perusal of his book is not likely to induce many aspirants to follow in his footsteps. Eternal scrubbing of brass work, holystoning decks, painting and varnishing, trimming coal in the bunkers, and then more scrubbing and polishing, does not appeal so readily to the youthful imagination as most tales of life at sea. But, in spite of the seeming monotony of his existence, Mr. Vandervell has produced a thoroughly interesting book—a book, too, not without value to those who have the welfare of our merchant service at heart. If his account is read as widely as it deserves to be, it will at least serve to clear away a good many of the misconceptions that prevail concerning the life of a modern sailor. What strikes the layman most forcibly is the immense waste—waste of stores and waste of labour—in some departments combined with the extreme of penuriousness in others. "The owners have put the paint on board, and it's got to be used somehow, or dumped overboard," as one of the hands remarks. There are many excellent yarns. "A Shuttle of an Empire's Loom" is well worth buying. The book is as good as the title—and that is no light praise.

The Syndics of the Cambridge University Press have done well to publish the interesting collection of CASES OF INTERNATIONAL LAW DURING THE CHINO-JAPANESE WAR (10s.), prepared by Professor Sakuyé Takahashi, of the Japanese Naval Staff College, who was attached as legal adviser to the admiral commanding the Japanese squadron during the war. This appointment in itself bears witness to the respect for legality prevailing among his countrymen. What would a British Admiral say to being encumbered with a legal adviser on active service? Besides the well-known case of the Kow-Singh, the chief international incidents of the war arose out of the somewhat ludicrous proceedings of one John Wild, an American adventurer, who is said to have offered to put an end to the war "at small cost and without losing ships or men, except by a stray shot at long range." For $300 he could make an ordinary ocean steamer more than a match for the most powerful battleship, and he knew how to capture warships without destroying them, and to silence forts' batteries or ships without the use of gunpowder or torpedoes. Convinced that Wild was no mere visionary, the Chinese Minister in the United States shipped him, together with one Cameron and a disguised Chinaman as assistants, on board the Gaelic for Yokohama. At Yokohama the Gaelic, though her ulterior destination was neutral, was searched by the Japanese authorities. Wild and his companions were undoubtedly contraband persons, and might have been seized as such on board a vessel bound for an enemy's port, but in this case the destination of the vessel was neutral, and the doctrine of continuous voyages, which has been applied not without question to goods consigned to a neutral port with an ulterior hostile destination, has never been extended to persons. Wild and his associates got away from the Gaelic, but they were afterwards seized at Kobe on board the French vessel Sydney, bound for Hong-kong, and their seizure was acquiesced in. The fact that they were proceeding in a belligerent service distinguishes the case from the Trent, where Mason and Slidell were seized on board a British ship while proceeding in the capacity of diplomatic agents to this country. Wild and Cameron were released on parole, but Cameron raised a new question by breaking his parole, and again falling into the hands of the Japanese on the capture of Wei-hai-wei. Mr. Takahashi discusses the question whether he might not in strictness have been put to death for breach of parole. Happily the Japanese authorities abstained from this step which Professor Westlake condemns as opposed to international law. The volume contains other matters of interest, and is provided with a preface from Professor Holland and an introduction from Professor Westlake.

It is well known that Egidio Colonna, who was Professor at the Paris University in the thirteenth century, and for 22 years Archbishop of Bourges, wrote, for the instruction of Phillippe le Bel, whose tutor he was, a Latin treatise entitled "De Regimine Principum." Editions of it were published in 1473, 1482, 1489, 1498, 1502, 1556, 1585, 1598, 1607, and 1617; and it has been translated, in whole or in part, into Hebrew, Spanish, French, English, Portuguese, Catalan, and Italian. Mr. Samuel Paul Molenaer, of the University of Pennsylvania, now gives us a transcription of the French version, from a MS in the possession of Mr. John Edward Kerr, junior, of New York, under the title of LI LIVRES DU GOUVERNEMENT DES ROIS (Macmillan, 12s. 6d. n.), together with appendices, a critical introduction, and a sufficiency of footnotes. The editor is, perhaps, over sanguine in anticipating that the book will appeal to others besides "the limited number of professional scholars" for whom "it is primarily intended"; for no one not a professional scholar is likely to know early French well enough to read it, even though he may be interested, as Mr. Molenaer suggests, "in the evolution of pedagogy and political science." Professional scholars, however, will not fail to recognize that Mr. Molenaer has rendered them a service in making the book accessible to them.

To the Library of Useful Stories Mr. James Mark Baldwin contributes THE STORY OF THE MIND (Newnes, 1s.). The title suggests metaphysics, but this branch of the subject is avoided. Transcendental considerations are ignored, and the mind is treated merely from the point of view of the experimental psychologist. Everything, in short, is straightforward and above-board; and the least intelligent reader will generally be able to attach a meaning—though not always, it may be, the right meaning—to what Mr. Baldwin says. A wide public may be interested in his explanation of the phenomena of hypnotism, and in his discussion of the vexed question whether men of genius are necessarily to be regarded as lunatics. On the other hand, his proposals for the application of the truths of psychology to education are, perhaps, rather ingenious than practical. Here, for example, is advice for the treatment of a boy who suffers, as do so many boys, from what Mr. Baldwin calls "fluidity of the attention."

Keep him out of the concert recitations, where his tendency to haste would work both personal and social harm. . . . Shield him with the greatest pains from distractions of all kinds. . . . Give him usually the secondary parts in the games of the school, except when real planning, complex execution, and more or less generalship are required; then give him the leading parts. . . . Deductive logic is not a good discipline for these students: empirical psychology or political economy is a better introduction to the moral sciences.

This sounds an admirable programme; but we should be interested to see the author trying to put it through in a public school. The attempt to offer the captaincy of the games as a reward for fluidity of the attention, if made, for example, on the eve of the Eton and Harrow match, would assuredly bring about a situation which would require quite other gifts than those of the psychologist to deal with it.

In a new edition of Canon Isaac Taylor's HISTORY OF THE ALPHABET (Arnold, 2 vols., 21s.) there is not much change beyond a reduction in price. Perhaps more notice might have been taken of the progress made by epigraphical science since its first appearance; but the author is justified in claiming for his original conclusions—e.g., that of the derivation of "runio" characters from Greek sources—that they have been tacitly accepted. His book still remains the best English authority upon its subject as a whole.

A PIPE OF CARVED OLIVE-WOOD.

I.

With flowers chased and filigree
Of leaves around the bowl and stem,
Across the seas 'twas brought for me
A present from Jerusalem;
Now on my mantel-shelf it lies,
The alien child of orient skies.

II.

Haply in Kedron's rocky dell,
Ere Saladin the host o'erthrew,
By steep Siloam's limpid well
This olive-wood erst drank the dew;
Or in far days that men forget
It graced perchance Mount Olivet.

III.

Nay, where the oaks of Mamre gleam
Down that wide glen where Hebron lies
And of past glory loves to dream
As from its tower the daylight dies,
There haply Rachel plucked the fruit
Where spread this olive's parent root.

IV.

When from this carven bowl arise
Thick clouds of incense round my head,
Strange visions mount before mine eyes—
A resurrection of the dead—
Of dynasties long past and gone,
Of empires lost and victories won.

V.

I see the creeds and systems pass
That shaped the world in years of yore;
They meet my gaze as in a glass,
They go, and they return no more;
Crude phantasms of the human mind
That thro' dark ages ruled mankind.

VI.

O antique world, so calm, so still!
What Pyramids of hope and fear
'Twas thine to build with wizard skill
While mute the Sphinx sat watching near,
And Life and Death remained for thee
A dark, an unsolved mystery.

VII.

Not Cæsar and not Pharaoh now
In Egypt, or in Rome, abide;
Gone, gone for ever from each brow
The conqueror's wreath, the victor's pride!
Yet still the Night brings back the Dawn
To heath-clad hill and dewy lawn.

VIII.

And children where the lilies blow
Are blithe amid the buds of May;
And still the Hebrew maidens go
With fisher-lads at close of day
Where gnarled olives glimmer yet
By Jordan and Gennesaret.

SAMUEL WADDINGTON.

Among my Books.

My books have two peculiarities that mark them out from other people's books. The first is their garish and perpetual condition of newness; the second their extraordinarily miscellaneous nature. Both would perplex a beholder not in my secret. But for an occasional delicate dog's-ear or faint pencil mark, my books have all the look of a freshly-furnished villa drawing-room. There is no intimacy in their air, no well-fingered binding on which the title must be searched for under the soft blurring brought by time and the handling of a caressing reader; but for a significant slope of their covers which tells of an armchair drawn all too near the fire, their demeanour keeps one at a repellent distance. They are prudish, virginal, immaculate.

Then, their variety would seem to point to a fine chaos in the mind of any one being who could deliberately plan the herding together of such incongruous companions. What has the dignified, ponderous biography of a statesman, all footnotes and steel engravings, to do with the last and wildest shriek of distraught neurosis in the way of a problem novel? If night lends voices to my books when I have callously left them in their painful proximity to one another and gone away, what words will be exchanged between the modest little S.P.C.K. production, with the picture of a death-bed on its cover, and the sinister books, with the strange designs in black and shaded yellows, supporting a lurid title? Will the flabby expanded novelette-contingent step in as go-between—its wicked baronets and bigamist-earls linking it with the one, its blameless heroines and matrimonial climaxes with the other?

If their variety is bewildering, the monotony of my books will be found no less amazing. Granting that my library was incomplete without one record of the heiress whose uncle's will compels her to marry her unknown cousin, is there any necessity for half-a-dozen several records of her? Her name may vary from Lilian Vavasour to the more subtly convincing Jane Black, her hair from a "wealth" to a mere competence, but her experiences will inevitably be the same. She will become enamoured of the cousin, either in his disguise of the Penniless-Manly one, or in his proper person; in the latter case, some adventuress will persuade each of the two that the other is only feigning love from interested motives; and quite a creditable show of proper pride will keep them apart until a not unbearably distant last chapter. This kind has wide margins and the print is generous. It is all alike. Yet I have some seven of it at this moment, and every line of each specimen has been read by me, digested, and—reviewed. The word is better out.

One sentence is invariably to be expected when a stranger surveys my glossy rows. "All those! but of course you don't really read them all." Do I not? Let the opening sentence of a book drop it never so surely into one category or another: let the author's name convey never so absolute a conviction of what I have to expect:

let the title be fatal and the end as obvious as the dome of St. Paul's on a clear day: do I not patiently read on until every chapter has been searched for the possible humorous touch, the new idea, the "one just man" among the characters who shall not be stuffed with sawdust? Not until the epilogue is reached, with its happy couple on a sunny lawn, watching the gambols of a first-born, invariably male, do I inscribe the fly-leaf with the sign that means "Harmless—no good" to my initiated eye. The reviewer is supposed to come like a Balaam, firmly resolved to curse; to cut three pages and skim them with a fixed frown, which deepens as the author's gems of wit and pathos force upon him the hideous duty of a reluctant blessing, or lightens into the grin of a demon as he finds a split infinitive on the fork of which to hang envenomed raillery. It is never so much as conceived of him that he should welcome a pearl found on his midden; that his appreciation should be intensified an hundredfold by force of contrast; that he should have to water down a growing enthusiasm that threatens to become mere gush by the chastening thought that the book is not so far above all other books as it is above the last twenty that have saddened his life; that Tomkins is not necessarily Thackeray because he is worlds better than Thompson, and too good to be mentioned in the same day with Smith.

Women are the chief purveyors of my books—women of every kind, beginning with the guileless country lady who has once had a story inserted in the local paper; her friends have assured her that she "ought to write," and she does write, ungrammatically and diffusely, along the line of least resistance. She prints at her own expense, acquires a village fame which uplifts her till her death, and never loses that pathetic dream of "profits" which survives the still-born book by so many decades. Possibly, even, she realizes the dream. For I have deliberately come to the conclusion that there is a reading public to whom staleness is a joy and originality a drawback. There is a placid satisfaction (I have felt it myself) in knowing what is going to happen in one's novel. The sorrows of all the deserving characters cease at once to be unpleasantly harrowing. We are behind the scenes, and we look forward mildly to the pronounced "scoring" that will be theirs in the last chapter. It is like sitting comfortably at the melodrama, ready to hiss the villain as he pursues the heroine before the very curtain; no fear need mingle with our hiss. He will be "foiled" in the next act without fail. No insurance company would take him now. So I never fall fiercely upon the poor little obvious books; and if I call them "gentle," the sting is likely to be but lightly felt. To call a would-be horrifying novel of the "decadent" type "kindly," "pretty," or "well-meaning" is far more securely enraging.

They are dying out of my lists, those "decadent" books, and my appetite and digestion benefit by their death. The novel most in favour just at present seems to be the life history of some rather clever young woman who shows a quite uncanny precocity in the years when she ought to be stealing jam, and is excusably misunderstood by a "Philistine" family. We have always had her in our midst, more or less; but now she comes into it before she can walk and stays there till she can walk no longer. With a guileless confidence in our interest, and a frankness sometimes embarrassing, she pours out the entire contents of her soul, accumulated for years, and safely delivered at last in some hundreds of pages of small print. She is nearly always a woman's conception. The male novelist has a delicacy about intruding in the nursery; he prefers his heroines to be of marriageable age and considerably sillier! This last is a very marked sign of the times. Women's women, in fiction, are getting more and more cultured, logical, athletic, and formidable generally; men's women remain precisely the deliciously wayward and distracting creatures they always were. It is often a humorous sight when it comes to the lion's turn to make the statue.

The word "humorous" reminds me of one little point on which I think poor women writers have hardly had fair play. Let any impartial observer count the number of times that this sentence or a variation thereof appears in reviews. "Above all, Miss Blank possesses the gift of humour, so seldom found in writers of her sex." Now, it is precisely this spirit of humour which has saved many a female production from my utter wrath. The style is often unwieldy to a degree, the characters preposterous and the plot past praying for; yet there will be a saving humour in the thing quite distinct from wit, which may be there too. And if I were a man I suppose I should constantly be writing, "However, Mrs. Dash cannot be denied that rarest gift of her sex, a sense of humour"; and each fresh exception would only establish the rule a little more firmly in my mind.

There is enough to be said about my books to fill a volume, but it cannot be said here. I should like to vent my hoarded spite against the books that are neither good nor bad, and leave me nothing to say about them; also on the books that have a quite indescribable, horrid print which makes me blink: these last have disciplined my soul more usefully than any other kind, for I have never yet "taken it out" of the author. Then I should like to hint to cherished friends that a book sent straight to me "just for a word of mention," because the author is "such a charming girl, a friend of the Browns," quite regardless of the fact that the Editor has probably handed its duplicate already to one of my hated rivals, doth work like madness in my brain. But there is no more room and no more time. They are waiting for me in stacks—loved and loathed, wearisome but how welcome—my poor, incongruous Books!

ALICE HERBERT.

A TRAGEDY OF ALL FOOLS' DAY.

As the sun came brightly through the window-blinds—it was the first morning of April—Gabriel Harvey rose earlier than usual and descended to the little garden at the back of his house.

His garden was his great love. After twenty years of service in one of the many departments of State Revenue, Gabriel received a salary of three hundred a year on which he supported a wife and a constantly increasing family in a suburb south-east of London. He was, like all good Englishmen, devoted to his children, and he did not think of the imperfections of his wife. But his aspirations and ambitions were centred in his garden.

His life was monotony and routine. The train engulfed him in the morning and vomited him at night. On Sunday he went to Church, took his children for a walk, and in the evening, perhaps, one of his official acquaintances would come to smoke. Then they talked of their remote prospects of promotion, their chief clerks, and their work.

Gabriel was a detail in an official machine, but a detail with nerves. He lived in a perpetual anxiety lest in any way, by some trivial blunder or breach of regulations, he should incur the wrath of his chief. To him his chief clerk—a worthy man who had risen after forty years of work and suppression and avenged himself for past wrongs by bullying his inferiors as he had been bullied of old—was a martinet of terrible presence and power, wielding thunderbolts. When he was called before his chief Gabriel trembled, hastily attempting to remember all the faults he might have committed. If the errand were unimportant Gabriel exulted. If he were blamed, he was miserable for a week. In the great machine for the ingathering of revenue Gabriel and his chief were almost equally insignificant units, but to the former it seemed that his peace of mind and almost his bread and life were dependent on the sovereign will of his superior.

The thought of his bondage depressed him now, and even was accentuated by the radiant sky above and the freedom of the little birds that chirped and fluttered about him, irresponsibly happy. He envied their liberty. If he had only three hundred a year for which he need not work, he would take a little house somewhere in the country, with a large garden which would allow the planting of innumerable vegetables, and he pictured himself in a continued bliss of idleness, walking down green lanes, leaning over gates to discuss the state of wheat or turnips, or smoking a calm pipe in the evening while the rays of the sunken sun made pink the higher bands of cloud, and twilight settled on the earth under the green and gold of the horizon.

But he dismissed his dreams, and for an hour turned his attention to his flowers and seeds.

The rattle of the lid of the letter-box and the postman's knock at the front door lifted him from his stooping attitude and he walked slowly into the house. A single letter lay on the mat. He picked it up and, as the address was in an unknown hand, examined the envelope curiously while he returned to the garden. Failing by external means to discover the sender he opened it.

He was compelled to read the letter twice before he grasped its meaning. Then he passed his hand over his forehead, uttering an inarticulate exclamation.

It ran thus :—

“ 217, Lincoln's Inn Fields,
“ 31 March, 18—

“ Dear Sir,—We regret to inform you of the sudden death of your uncle, Mr. John Harvey, which occurred on the 30th instant. By his will which is in our possession you are appointed sole executor and universal legatee and devisee. . . . We await your instructions and remain, “ Yours faithfully,

“ MAYNE AND BROADBENT.”

Gabriel stood stupefied. His one thought repeated itself. “ Five hundred a year ! ” it re-echoed, for that, he knew, was the amount of his uncle's income. Then he turned, sprang into the house, flew up the staircase and, bursting into his bed room, alarmed his wife, a big, coarse woman who, with bare arms and a mouth full of pins, was arranging her thin hair before a mirror.

He threw the letter before her.

“ Read that ! ” he exclaimed, triumphantly.

She glanced at it without lowering her arms. Then she dropped them, the pins from her mouth and her hair at the same time.

“ Oh Gabriel ! ” she said, helplessly.

“ We are rich,” he cried, beside himself, waving the letter in the air and dancing.

Her caution, sharpened by years of compulsory economy, soon asserted itself.

“ You must go and see them at once ” she said. “ You will have to arrange for the funeral. It is fortunate the children have black dresses, but I shall have to buy a new jacket.”

Breakfast was a scramble, and Gabriel went up to town in a first-class carriage, though his season-ticket only permitted him a third. He wished to tell every one of his good fortune, but the nine other men in the carriage were strangers to him and besides were each immersed in a newspaper, ignoring him. He was suffocating with suppressed emotion when, as he alighted at Waterloo, he caught sight of the portly figure of his chief.

As a rule Gabriel had been exercised in endeavours to avoid him when they met outside the office, but to-day he was a capitalist, an independent gentleman. He fell into step with his chief who glanced up in surprise at Gabriel's blithe “ Good morning ! ”

“ I am afraid the office will have to dispense with my services for the future,” he began.

The other gave voice to an “ Ah ! ”

“ I heard this morning,” he continued, “ that I have been left eight or nine hundred a year ”—he exaggerated to the extent of his chief's salary—“ and so I shall be seen no more in that . . . ” He pointed, in default of a word, to the white porticoes of Somerset House across the river.

“ It is not a place for a self-respecting man,” he went on, proceeding to enlarge on the grievances of the Government clerk. When they parted at the threshold of the building, he had reduced his chief to a white-hot anger. Gabriel laughed and walked quickly towards Lincoln's Inn Fields. The knowledge that the time for signing the attendance-book at the office had gone by increased his sensation of freedom.

Having arrived, he walked leisurely round the square, searching for No. 217. Then he stood still, and was puzzled, for the numbers did not run so high. He stopped a messenger-boy who could not assist him. Then he approached a policeman who informed him there was no such number.

“ But I have a letter from that address,” he said, pulling out the great communication to reassure his memory.

“ There is no No. 217 in Lincoln's Inn Fields,” the policeman repeated, stolidly.

A horrible fear seized Gabriel. He trembled as he turned, and his knees shook as he retraced his steps round the square. Then, being still unsuccessful, he fled back to his office. The vast grey quadrangle seemed to regard him contemptuously as he crossed it almost running.

He entered the portals of his department, dived down dark passages, mounted tortuous stairs, and found himself in his room. Half-a-dozen men looked up with amusement at his hasty entrance.

“ Good morning,” he exclaimed hurriedly, “ I want the ‘ Law List.’ ”

He found the red volume, turned the pages backwards and forwards, but no mention of the firm of Mayne and Broadbent delighted his eyes. At his dismayed expression a simultaneous roar of laughter broke from his friends who had watched him minutely. As he looked up in terrified surprise, one more kindly than the others approached him.

“ If you are looking for Mayne and Broadbent,” he said, “ you will not find them. To-day is the first of April.”

One man laughed, but the others were silent, as Gabriel, white and open-mouthed with nausea, with a cold sweat breaking out from his forehead and limbs, clutched convulsively at a table.

“ My God ! ” he said softly, “ My God ! ”

Notes.

The William Black Memorial seems pretty certain now to take the form, suggested some little time ago, of a lifeboat. Other suggestions were a cot in a Highland hospital, a scholarship at the Scottish University, or a fishermen's and shepherds' shelter near Oban. The lifeboat is much better than any of these. The sum needed to purchase it is £2,000, and subscriptions are flowing in actively. The committee that is being formed already includes many well-known names, including Mr. J. M. Barrie, Sir Walter Besant, Mr. G. H. Boughton, Mr. Colin Hunter, the Marquis of Lorne, Dr. Macleod, Mr. J. MacWhirter, Sir Theodore Martin, Mme. de Navarro, Sir Wemyss Reid, Lord Strathcona and Mountroyal, the Duchess of Sutherland, and Mr. Kipling, who telegraphed his wish to serve from America last week. The treasurer is Lord Archibald Campbell, care of Messrs. Coutts, 59, Strand, W.C.

Mr. Herbert Spencer's subscription portrait by Professor Herkomer is being engraved, and the engraving is to be offered at specially reduced terms to all who subscribed for this testimonial. Mr. C. R. Chisman, Lululaund, Bushey, Herts, is receiving applications for proofs. The engraving has been done by Miss E. Gullard, one of Professor Herkomer's pupils.

In a sparkling after-dinner speech at the Authors' Club, on Monday, Sir George Trevelyan defended himself and the school of historians of which he is a shining example against the grave charge of making history picturesque. As the nephew of his uncle he was practically committed to this line, and he was probably quite as well aware of the particular perils of picturesqueness as any member of his audience. The fact of the matter is that the picturesque and the laboriously accurate historian are equally apt, in their several ways, to be misleading. The one too frequently draws a picture which a minute examination of the facts shows to be wrong, as Carlyle notoriously did in the case of his "French Revolution." The other bombards the reader with such a hail of facts, interrupted by so many careful references to authorities, that the average reader never succeeds in seeing the facts as a concatenated whole. To the fact that he has tried so hard, and, on the whole, so successfully, to steer a middle course between these two extremes Sir George Trevelyan owes his own high reputation. In enlarging on the "consolations" of the literary, as contrasted with the political, life, he spoke, perhaps, rather the language of the amateur than of the professional. The literary man, he suggested, was not required to be an opportunist, as the politician is. He may, of course, if he is a literary man of ample private fortune, who need never work against time, take the lofty line that it is not his business to give the public what it wants, but the business of the public to want what he thinks good for it. Unfortunately not all literary men are in this fortunate position.

Some weeks back we noticed a performance at the Théâtre de L'Œuvre of Measure for Measure, which, as we said, "possibly owing to the frank nature of the intrigue, is now seldom seen upon an English stage." This reason, which has deterred managers from representing one of the most impressive of Shakespeare's comedies, accounts for the inevitable cuts which would render Miss Wallis' praiseworthy performance of the heroine of Measure for Measure, at the Kennington theatre, scarcely intelligible to any one who was not already acquainted with the plot. Nevertheless, the hearty welcome accorded to this performance of one of the less known of Shakespeare's plays is most gratifying to all who are interested in the revival of Elizabethan drama.

A correspondent writes to us concerning the latest edition of Mr. Meredith's works which we noticed in the last issue:—

Your reviewer pointed out that the present two volumes of "Poems" do not contain many of those verses which appeared in the édition de luxe, but even that collection must be very far from complete. Not long ago I chanced upon an old volume of Once a Week—one of those greatly sought after by the collectors of the early black-and-white men—and happened upon some verses by Mr. Meredith that I fancy must be very little known even to the Meredith enthusiasts, for I find no mention of this particular poem in the "George Meredith," published in 1890, which contained a generally excellent bibliography by Mr. John Lane without, however, any note of this poem.

The Meeting.

The old coach-road thro' a common of furze,
With knolls of pines, ran white :
Berries of autumn, with thistles and burrs,
And spider-threads, droop'd in the light.

The light in a thin blue veil peer'd sick,
The sheep grazed close and still ;
The smoke of a farm by a yellow rick
Curl'd lazily under a hill.

No fly shook the round of the silver net,
No insect the swift bird chased ;
Only two travellers moved and met
Across that hazy waste.

One was a girl with a babe that throve,
Her ruin and her bliss ;
One was a youth with a lawless love,
Who claspt it the more for this.

The girl for her babe humm'd prayerful speech,
The youth for his love did pray ;
Each cast a wistful look on each,
And either went their way.

These verses, which seem to anticipate something of the sentiments of country roads and commons to which Mr. Hardy has accustomed us, are illustrated by Rossetti in a direct and admirable fashion. An agreeable volume might be made of these little remembered poems of Meredith which appeared long ago in magazines, with reproductions of the original drawings by Millais, Hablot K. Browne, Tenniel, and others now equally famous.

No doubt the omission which our correspondent points out as occurring in the second edition of Mr. Le Gallienne's "George Meredith" will now be supplied, as we see that Mr. Lane is about to publish a fifth and revised edition. This new issue has been greatly needed, as Mr. Meredith has added considerably to his works since the bibliography was originally compiled.

The preface to the first bound volume of Cassell's New Penny Magazine, which we have just received, draws attention to the fact that the experiment of producing a magazine for a penny has been tried before. It was tried, in fact, as early as 1832, by the Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge—an association which, guided by a committee comprising such notable names as those of Lord John Russell, Henry Hallam, and Rowland Hill, published a vast quantity of improving literature on subjects as various as gardening and brewing, geography and the differential calculus. This early Penny Magazine, concerning which the hope was expressed that it "may be taken up and laid down without any considerable effort," consisted of eight pages of the size of the Saturday Review, with a few little woodcuts—mostly views and portraits—in each number. Fiction is avoided ; instead of it we have geographical articles on Poland, Van Diemen's Land, and the like, antiquarian papers on Luxor and Old Somerset House, and essays of an instructive character. Cassell, with its sixty pages of matter, and profusion of pictures, gives us a great deal more for our money than did the miscellany of the Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge. Yet that insignificant looking miscellany started off with a circulation of 160,000 a month, and continued to exist for a period of fourteen years.

An article in the current number of the International Literatur Bericht criticizes succinctly, but from a vantage-ground of superiority, some of the leading English novels of last year. The German critic complains of the "heaviness and lack of humour" of Mr. George Moore's "Evelyn Innes," of the "glaring improbabilities" of "Gloria Mundi," and the artistic construction of "The Open Question." He smiles and shakes his head at the "naïveté" of Mr. Anthony Hope who, in "Rupert of Hentzau," "affects to invest modern German life with the romance of an extinct mediævalism." Henry Seton Merriman is referred to as "the prime favourite of British literary mediocrity," while complimentary allusion is made to "Isabel Carnaby" and Kassandra Vivaria's "Via Lucis." The language of "Aylwin" is "insufferably stilted and laboured, and the plot and development of the story childish and out of date." With regard to Mrs. Ward's "Helbeck of Bannisdale" we are told that the adverse criticism aroused by its pseudo-Catholicism was the only fleeting interest attached to it, for the rest the novel is "langweilig in the extreme," and "devoid of a spark of humour." It is turning the tables with a vengeance when this charge of dullness and want of humour is brought against our novelists from a Teutonic quarter.

A correspondent writes :—

No doubt your reviewer is correct in suggesting that "Young Lives" is to some extent autobiographical, but if Henry may be taken for Mr. Le Gallienne, the author certainly introduces himself again in the chapter called "The Wits," and I would suggest the application of some other descriptions in this chapter to individuals who are already sufficiently hardened by journalism to bear such treatment. Does Mr. Lionel Johnson see himself as Mr. Le Gallienne sees him? "Among them a pale-faced lad of about fifteen, miraculously self-possessed, stood with his back to the chimney-piece, speaking in 'the Oxford voice.'" Does Mr. W. B. Yeats recognize himself as possessing a face that "half suggested a faun and half suggested a flower. A small, olive-skinned face, crowned with purple black hair that kept falling in an elf-lock over his forehead, and violet eyes set slantwise. He was talking earnestly of fairies in a beautiful Irish accent." Then there is a "short, firmly-built, clerical fellow, with a head like a billiard ball in need of a shave, a big, brown moustache, and enormous spectacles," which is intended, I imagine, to be the author of "The White Man's Burden," "he is all for muscle and brutality—and he makes all the money." There is the Shelley-voiced young man who speaks of Mallarmé's latest sonnet and the Empire ballet, and suggests Mr. Arthur Symonds; and the great critic "blustering red-headed" who is surrounded by admirers who say "How brilliant," "How absolute." Those who have read Mr. Henley's reviews of Mr. Le Gallienne may be able to guess who this is.

A number has reached us of the Bookfellow—a minute monthly magazine devoted to the interests of literature in New South Wales. Published at the office of the Sydney Bulletin, it surveys the subjects which come under its notice in the trenchant personal style which that satirical organ has made peculiarly its own; not only reviewing the books of Australian men of genius, but also discussing their private affairs and characters. There is a character sketch, for example, of Mr. Henry Lawson, the Australian poet, whose work is dealt with in our "Australian Letter" on another page. It begins with literary criticism to the effect that "his grammar is shaky and he has small sense of literary proportion." Then we get on to the statement that "he reckons loosely in money matters and is sociable to excess," and, finally, we have a detailed account of Mr. Lawson's dealings with his publisher, the precise figures being cited in support of the proposition that "nobody expects a poet to be a man of business." After this the editor's complaint that Australians, on the whole, are "too self-conscious" seems to come with a particular propriety.

The burning literary question of the hour in Australia relates to the supply of review copies. This is the situation :—

Nearly all the papers receive a very precarious supply from the publishers; and, in order to eke out notices, some of them are glad to rely on booksellers' bounties. This is bad; for the bookseller has a keen eye to his own interest, and is accustomed, when there is dead stock on hand, to foist a copy of the Awful Unsaleable upon the reviewer as a bonus for giving him a copy of the Fresh Saleable. "And try and give us a real good notice now!"

This is cheerful reading for English authors who are conscious of having been praised by the Australian Press. But there is worse :—

Some booksellers are getting into a habit of lending a book for review—"and please mention our name prominently"—with an injunction to return at once "because the other paper wants it before Saturday." The ox treads out their corn, and is muzzled in defiance of Holy Writ. No wonder bookselling pays.

The "Trinidad Reviewer" (Robinson Printing Company), a kind of year-book and guide-book combined, compiled by Mr. T. FitzEvan Eversley, devotes a section to the literary history of this important West Indian possession. We read :—

The possession of intellect will not, we suppose, be denied the Trinidadian; but, while we are obliged to recognize the occasional flash forced into being by the natural wealth pressing behind it, we cannot be blind to the fact that the best is not, and has not been, made of the evident brain-force in the island. In every branch of literature we have noticed the promptings of young Trinidad striving for utterance, often with astonishing success; but why the effort is not more general, not more sustained, is the question that is naturally suggested.

This state of things, it appears, is attributed by some to the climate and by others to "satisfied desire"; but Mr. Eversley more sagaciously ascribes it to the fact that there is no money in literature in Trinidad, and that "the Trinidadian has not yet reached that stage of philosophical refinement when he will be willing to work for the improvement of his intellect."

The fact remains, however, that the Trinidadians have written a certain number of books which Mr. Eversley duly catalogues and subject-indexes. He gives us seven entries under the heading of history, three under that of geography and topography, four under that of chronology, and enumerates eight political, two educational, and five dramatic works, together with three novels and one collection of poems. On this dearth of poetry in the island, Mr. Eversley comments luminously thus :—

Not that the muse is sterile here, the contrary is the case; but her inspirations are spasmodic, and though really good verse is often to be seen in the local papers, yet the muse is not loved with that devotion that alone can secure satisfactory fruition. Mr. Devenish then stands alone, and deservedly so, and to him without a grudge and with truth may be applied the title, "Poet of Trinidad."

It only remains for us to express the hope that Mr. Devenish will, some day, give us the opportunity of introducing to the attention of a wider public those poetical compositions which have crowned him with glory in his native land.

Many readers will be surprised to learn that Goethe's "last love" is still alive. Freifräulein Ulrike von Levetzow, the lady in question, recently celebrated her 95th birthday. Goethe met her at Marienbad in 1823. He was 74 at the time, but conceived so strong a passion for the beautiful nineteen-year-old girl that he wanted to marry her. She, however, is said to have refused him, and he was left to celebrate his unrequited love in his "Marienbader Elegie." Of late years Freifräulein von Levetzow has resided on her own estate at Tribnitz in Bohemia. She enjoys excellent health, and takes an active interest in every movement for the relief of the poor of her district, where her birthday was made the occasion of a remarkable torch-light procession.

Arthur Schnitzler's three one-act plays, Paracelsus (which first appeared in Cosmopolis shortly before the demise of that periodical), Die Gefährtin, and Der grüne Kakadu (a grotesque), all have for their theme an intrigue intended or accomplished. Schnitzler is the most promising dramatist of the young Viennese school of littérateurs. Lieberlei, the play with which Schnitzler made his mark a few years ago, is known outside Austria and Germany, as are his brilliant contes collected under the title of "Die Frau de Weisen," and "Anatole," a volume of masterly dialogues saturated with the indefinable charm of the "wienerisch" temperament. The son of a celebrated Austrian physician, Schnitzler's most remarkable achievement in fiction so far is his novel "Sterben," a unique and powerful study of the symptoms, whims, and sensations of a consumptive doomed to die slowly at the side of a healthy and high-spirited mistress who refuses to desert him.

Not many readers when handling a book take the trouble to notice the work of the printer; yet it is not an altogether uninteresting study to compare the work of the different presses of the country employed by the publishers for book printing. Until a few years ago the bookbinder used to attach to the inside cover of each book a tiny paper label indicating his name and address, but that has fallen into disuse. The publisher now generally commissions an artist to provide a design, and then places it in the hands of the binder to be cut in brass. All that the bookbinder is responsible for is in the folding of the sheets and the neatness of the cloth case. Whilst the work of the cloth bookbinder is thus curtailed, the printer's remains, of course, unimpaired, and he never hesitates at placing his colophon—a relic, perhaps, of a compulsory requirement when the printer of a book was held equally responsible with the publisher for the character of the publication if it fell within the arms of the law.

In some instances the publisher may be the creator of a style, but it is more often the work of the printer-artist. The other printers employed by a publishing house are ready to fall into the same style, so that there is frequently a continuity of design carried out in the various books issued by a publisher. Often, however, the printer is hampered by the conservatism of the publisher and the question of price. When he has a free hand, which does not happen too frequently, the work he is able to turn out is a pleasure to the practised eye. The best class of book printing is in the hands of very few houses and those who know can tell from the printed page the place of its birth. The high scale of prices which some London printers are compelled to charge for their work, owing to enhanced cost of rent, labour, coal, &c., has not been without its advantage to provincial houses, some of whom, especially from Scotland, have within recent years obtained a good footing in London. But as the London firms do not care to see the work passing their doors, many of them have opened works in the country so as to be able to compete on a better footing with the Scotch trade.

Amongst the various efforts that have of late been made to introduce new features into the bindings of books, one of the most pleasing is an outcome of the revival of the art of enamelling. The great difficulty has always been to avoid the air of heaviness which inseparably attaches to a book covered with metal plates. So far the best results have been attained by the French binders. Many of them are brilliant and charming pieces of work, especially those in which, as in the bindings of the recent édition de luxe of Pierre Loti's "Madame Chrysanthème," the enamels have been limited to one, or at the most two, cameos let into the leather. But it is not likely that this effort will meet with general success. There is always a certain sense of incongruity attaching to large book covers with metal on them merely for decorative purposes. A typical example of this incongruity is the binding used for Mr. Quilter's recent edition of "The Pied Piper of Hamelin." The metal bosses formerly put upon folio bibles and other large and frequently used books were for utility, not ornament. Such books always stood apart, they were never placed in rows on shelves in a library. When metal has been used on smaller books it has also seldom been successful, except when used with velvet. A good example of this latter method is the well-known Latin book of Meditations which belonged to Queen Elizabeth. In this case the cover is of velvet, and it has on it small, thin gold plates exquisitely enamelled, but these decorations are used only for the corners and centre of the binding.

In his literary reminiscences of Coleridge De Quincey forestalls the charge of plagiarism which he supposes may "eight hundred or a thousand years hence" be brought against Coleridge. But, judging by the results of last week's book sales, it would appear that Coleridge as an author is in danger of becoming extinct long before that period is reached. In one sense the Lake School has fallen upon evil days—they are not now considered by book collectors as "big" enough to collect. First editions of Coleridge, Wordsworth, Southey, and De Quincey went, in the sales referred to, for a few shillings each, the highest prices reached being £1 3s. for an excellent bound copy of "The Friend," by Coleridge, and £1 10s. for an equally good copy of "The Watchman," by the same author. This last work seems always doomed to be somewhere near the "fourpenny box." It was its failure to take as a serial that drew from Coleridge the pathetic complaint that, by the time the seventh number was published, he had the mortification of seeing the preceding numbers offered for sale at a penny apiece.

Among the books sold by Messrs. Sotheby last week the following were the most important:—"Arabian Nights" and "Aladdin and the Enchanted Lamp," 13 vols., Payne's translation, £16; Matthew Arnold, "The Strayed Reveller, &c.," somewhat soiled, but an otherwise good copy, £3 5s.; "Alice in Wonderland," first edition, £8; Westmacott's "The English Spy," with coloured plates by R. Cruikshank, in first-class condition, £17 10s.; "Life and Labours of H. K. Browne" (Phiz), illustrated with plates by "Phiz" and G. Cruikshank, £12; Collection of 82 seventeenth century broadside ballads, folio, black letter, £41; Cromwelliana, a detail of events 1642-1668, illustrated with 432 fine portraits and plates, 2 vols., Westminster, 1810, £31; Kelmscott books, Chaucer, folio, £57 (the value of this book was enhanced by the fact that it was bound in stamped morocco leather by the Guild of Women Binders, and is the largest piece of work yet undertaken by that Society); Shelley, 3 vols., vellum, £20 5s.; "The Shepheard's Calendar," £8 10s.; and "Atalanta in Calydon," vellum, £9 5s. A copy of the rare first edition of this work, 1865, occurred later in the sale, but it fetched only £3 15s. Swinburne, "Poems and Ballads," first edition, £2 2s.; Tennyson, "Poems," 1833, a much cut down copy, £2 2s.; Ackerman, "The Microcosm of London," 3 vols. with plates by Rowlandson and Pugin, in splendid condition, £10 15s.; "The Faerie Queene," edited by T. J. Wise, large Japanese paper copy, in parts as issued, £12; Whitney, "A Choice of Emblems," 1586, the only known manuscript of this work, which probably belonged to the Earl of Leicester, £32; Staunton, "Shakespeare," 15 vols., édition de luxe, £5 5s.; Thackeray, "Works," 24 vols., édition de luxe, £10 5s. These last two sets went for much less than their real value, for they were finely bound and their illustrations were in spotless condition. The prices paid for them serve, however, to mark the continued recession of the édition de luxe which has been so pronounced during the last two years.

Historical students, particularly those of America, cannot fail to be interested in the "Ymago Mundi" of Cardinal Pierre d'Ailly, a perfect copy of which will be sold by Messrs. Sotheby on April 12. This book was printed at Louvain about the year 1483 and possesses great interest by reason of its association with Columbus, who is said to have formulated his belief as to the existence of a great western continent from a study of it. His own copy was seen many times by Las Casas who copied some of the notes which the great navigator had made in the margins, most of which, he explains, were verifications of certain historical passages contained in it. This identical volume, the only one which can be identified with Columbus prior to his discovery of America, is in the Columbine Library at Seville, where it was handled by Washington Irving who observes that "it illustrates his researches and, in a manner, the current of his thoughts while as yet his great enterprise existed in idea only." No copy, perfect or otherwise, of the "Ymago Mundi" has been offered for sale for many years.

Australian Letter.

THE AUSTRALIAN VOLKSLIEDER.

The older generation of Australians, mainly English, not only by birth, but by early training and associations, continue to regard the "Bush Ballads" of Adam Lindsay Gordon, some few of the lyrics of Henry Kendall (himself a "native-born" Australian), and the prose writings of Marcus Clarke, the novelist, as the highest development of Antipodean literary genius. But in the quarter of a century that has passed since these writers achieved their well-earned local fame an entire social transformation has taken place, which may be briefly summarized by saying that Australia has become Australian. This social transformation—politically, as we know, Australia is still loyal to the British Crown and connexion—has not been without its effect on the local literature; and a new race of "Bush bards" has sprung up, whose wide-spread popularity is itself a sure test of their strong and successful appeal to Australian, as distinguished from English, sentiment and aspiration.

It is by no means an easy task to bring clearly before the minds of English literary students the sudden and enormous popularity of this new school of Australian bards, whose racy and vigorous ballads of "up-country" life appeal so irresistibly to the new generation at the Antipodes. It is true that Adam Lindsay Gordon, for all that he was "Anglo-Australian," made an equally irresistible appeal to those whom he called "the old colonial school" of his own day; and he is still held in affectionate memory by all classes of Australians, including the new "native-born generation," as the national poet. As his friend and editor, Marcus Clarke, truly observed, Gordon's "Bush Ballads and Galloping Rhymes" were "the beginnings of a national school of Australian poetry." But any one at all familiar with Gordon's poems will at once recognize that the great bulk of his writings have no real connexion with Australia. This, of course, is the case with his most ambitious and most faulty work, "Ashtaroht: A Dramatic Lyric," a kind of formless medieval drama, reminiscent of Faust and Manfred, which, however, contains two of Gordon's finest lyrics. Even that rattling set of racing rhymes, "How We Beat the Favourite," is entirely English; he, indeed, expressly styled it "A Lay of the Loamshire Hunt Club."

"Aye, Squire," said Stevens, "they back him at evens."

What can be more English? In Australia "squires" are as unknown as nightingales. So it is with a vast mass of Gordon's verse, which was quite as much the offspring of his early Gloucestershire life and up-bringing as of his later experiences as a mounted trooper and horse-breaker in Mount Gambier. When we turn from Gordon's "Bush Ballads" and "Sea Spray and Smoke Drift"—so many of which are but echoes of Old England—and take up "The Man from Snowy River," by Mr. A. B. Paterson, or "In the Days When the World Was Wide," by Mr. Henry Lawson, we are conscious of an entire change both in the character of the verse and the environment of the poet. These latter are veritable Australian literary products; they are the lyrical outpourings of men who know no other country but Australia, whose memories are not filled with the sights and sounds of English rural or civic life, and to whom even the familiar images of the English poets are, in a sense, "foreign."

In my opinion it is the absolutely un-English, thoroughly Australian style and character of these new bush bards which has given them such immediate popularity, such wide vogue, among all classes of the rising native generation. Just consider for a moment, in the light of our own experiences in England, the enormous success of Mr. Paterson's "Man from Snowy River." In an essentially matter-of-fact colonial community, with a population far less than London alone, scattered thinly over a whole continent, this book (price 5s.) sold out four editions in less than four months after its first publication in Sydney. What would our own poets, from the Poet Laureate to the youngest rhymers, think of this as the public reception of a first book of verses? Go where you will among the rising generation of Australians, so exclusively and vehemently addicted, for the most part, to cricket, football, and horse racing, you will find numbers of young men painfully ignorant of Milton, Byron, Keats, Wordsworth, or Tennyson, but bubbling over with the lilting bush ballads of Paterson and Lawson. These are, in fact, the genuine Australian Volkslieder. "The Man from Snowy River" has recently been published in London by Messrs. Macmillan, and I must ask my readers who are interested in the subject to peruse the contents for themselves, as I have no space for adequate quotation. Despite the fact that Lord Rosebery is said to admire the muse of Mr. Paterson (in his own country, by the way, he is known as "Banjo" Paterson), it may be doubted if the ordinary untravelled Briton, even with a taste for "ballad metre-mongers," will see all that his colonial kinsmen so greatly admire in this collection. But the experiment is worth making.

Henry Lawson, whose "In the Days when the World was Wide" is the true companion volume to "Banjo" Paterson's, is more representative of what may be called Australian "working class" sentiment than his rival. Lawson, indeed, writes of Paterson as the "City Bushman," and gives expression to many a Byronic sneer at those who, living in the sweet security of Sydney or Melbourne streets, sentimentalize about the delectable "up-country" life of drovers and stockmen. He has all the frank directness of one who can afford, by reason of bitter, undeniable, personal experience, to express his real sentiments about the sordid surroundings of the Australian city slums, and the gruesome hideousness of the "Back Blocks." He writes of these things in a way that "the mere Englishman" would hardly dare to do. Listen to his "Australian Bards and Bush Reviewers"—another "hit," I fear, at the too idyllic Paterson:—

If you sing of waving grasses when the plains are dry as bricks,
And discover shining rivers where there's only mud and sticks;
If you picture "mighty forests" where the mulga spoils the view—

You're superior to Kendall, and ahead of Gordon, too.

If you swear there's not a country like the land that gave you birth,
And its sons are just the noblest and most glorious chaps on earth;

If in every girl a Venus your poetic eye discerns,
You are gracefully referred to as the "young Australian Burns."

But if you should find that bushmen—spite of all the poets say, Are just common brother sinners, and you're quite as good as they—

You're a drunkard, and a liar, and a cynic, and a sneak,
Your grammar simply awful, and your intellect is weak.

It is as well to bear in mind that before you can "cuss and swear" against Australia you must be not only an "Australian native," but, like Mr. Lawson himself, one who has never visited England. If an Australian bush bard were to write in this style after a trip to London, he would be indeed doomed!

Henry Lawson has just published a brief autobiographical sketch which is, in many ways, as suggestive as it is frank and outspoken. A coach painter by trade, he was nurtured on Henry George's "Progress and Poverty" and itinerant Yankee Freethought lectures. Naturally, he became a Republican Trade Unionist of the most pronounced type; and, at an early age, took to versifying for the Sydney Bulletin. Having got into contact with newspapers, Lawson assisted to write and even edit Trade Unionist and working-class journals in Queensland and elsewhere—a precarious mode of living, it would seem, from which he constantly had to go back to house painting in the bush townships and sheep shearing on the stations. Then he wandered away to New Zealand:—

Towards the end of '93 I landed in Wellington with a pound in my pocket—just in time to see the women vote for the first time. Got a little painting to do now and then and a guinea (5s. "out of the editor's pocket," I understood) from the N. Z. Mail for 1½ col. rhyme called "For'ard." And I wrote some steerage sketches at the rate of 5s. a col. Did a three months unemployed "perish," and then went with a mate to a sawmill in Hutt Valley for a boss who had contracted to supply the mill with logs. We two "bullocked" in a rough wet gully for a fortnight—felling trees, making a track for the bullocks, and "jacking" logs to it over stumps and boulders. But we were soft and inexperienced, and at the end of the fortnight the boss said we weren't bushmen—which, strange to say, hurt me more than any adverse criticism on my literary work could have done at the time. The boss had no cash; and my mate was only restrained from violence by the fact that he was a big man and the boss a little one. He gave us each an order for our wages on the owner of a sawmill in Wellington, and, as we had no money for railway fares, we tramped it—twenty miles without tucker or tobacco. These orders have not been cashed yet.

Many of these hard personal experiences of colonial life have been used by Henry Lawson in his little volume of prose sketches, entitled "While the Billy Boils," a book which Mrs. Campbell Praed, the Australian novelist, assured me made her feel that all she had written of bush life was "pale and ineffective." Personally I do not rate Mr. Lawson's prose sketches so highly as Mrs. Praed; but they have all the writer's painful fidelity to truth. Lawson is the "realist" of Australian life, whether in the city slums, or the lonesome bush.

It is rather singular to find, amid all these hardships of a wandering working man's life, that Lawson sets down his profits (£200) on his two books, "In the Days When the World Was Wide" and "While the Billy Boils" as though he were disgusted with this reward for "the cream of twelve years' literary work." All things considered, I think he might be thankful for it, as literature was, after all, his "crutch," not his main support.

My advice [he writes] to any young Australian writer whose talents have been recognized would be to go steerage, stow away, swim, and seek London, Yankeeland, or Timbuctoo, rather than stay in Australia till his genius turned to gall or beer. Or failing this—and still in the interests of human nature and literature—to study elementary anatomy, especially as applied to the cranium, and then shoot himself carefully with the aid of a looking-glass.

FROM THE MAGAZINES.

Mr. Rider Haggard in Longman's continues his "Farmer's Year," and tells us that he has discovered the extraordinary value of the dock:—

To begin with, there are eleven varieties of dock, if not more; various grubs and caterpillars feed upon them, and they have medicinal properties. But their main use is the discovery of that admirable institution the Colonial College in Suffolk, who have found out that one British variety of dock produces four times as much tannin as does oak bark, which tannin is believed to be perfectly suitable to trade purposes, though this is a point that cannot finally be decided for about a year. If the tannin is good, behold a new industry! But any land will grow docks—plant them once, and a dozen crops might be taken in succession. Will not this fact be apt to bring down the price of tannin to a point at which it would barely pay to extract it?

He has also been studying the neighbouring parish registers, on which he makes an interesting observation:—

I fancy that in those early days the common practice was for the clergyman to make rough notes of these events in a commonplace book, which at any convenient time were entered up into the register by a travelling clerk, who wrote what was in those times considered a good hand, and did such work for a fee. In several of the registers about here I have observed what seems to be the same handwriting appearing contemporaneously.

Mr. S. G. Tallentyre, in the same magazine, has an interesting study of Chesterfield as a letter-writer.

In the Cornhill, a clever literary causerie appears, which we hope may be the precursor of others, called "Conferences on Books and Men." The writer believes in Sortes Virgilianæ, and finds in the "Shepherd's Calendar" various forecasts of recent events month by month. To a friend who questions him as to the Church crisis, for instance, he shows its adaptability:—

I showed him first in the Eclogue for May the story of the Fox and the Kid, which tells how a foolish youngster was fascinated by a Pedlar's pack of trifles, and in the event carried off by the Pedlar, who was a disguised Fox. I noticed my friend gave a great start as he read the opening lines, which paint the Goat's tender solicitude for her wayward son:—

Kiddie (quoth she) thou kens't the great care
I have of thy health and thy welfare—and I heard him mutter "Kens't" several times under his breath, but he did not betray further the cause of his emotion. "In that poem," I said "you will find all the arguments used by the enemies of the Church of Rome. Then in the Eclogue for July you will get the case against the High Church party in our own communion, put from the Low Church point of view. It begins thus:—

What ho! thou jolly shepherd swain,
Come up the hill to me;
Better 'tis than the lowly plain
As for thy flock and thee.

And ends, of course, with the warnings of celestial vengeance:—

One day he sat upon a hill
As now thou wouldest me,
But I am taught by Algrind's ill
To love the low degree;

For sitting so with bared scalp,
An eagle soared high,
That weening his white head was chalk
A shell-fish down let fly.

"Such prophecies," I said, "tend to fulfil themselves again and again, for as long as there are foxes there will be kids, and as long as there are vales there must be hills, and, as Bacon says, 'The vale best discovereth the hill;' but if you wish for a more particular prediction, you will find what you want in the Eclogue for September, which celebrates the mingled boldness and discretion of the Bishop of Rochester, under his Latinised title of Roffen; in an allegory to which I doubt not you yourself from the study of the papers can supply the interpretation."

The writer, by the way can hardly have kept in touch with recent fiction, for he refers to the "Among My Books" article in Literature of February 4, which was signed C. E. Raimond (Elizabeth Robins) as "an account by a lady with two names of 'The British Merlin.'" "Fell Walking Records," by Mr. W. T. Palmer, in the same magazine, is a subject of an out-of-the-way and interesting kind. On September 1 of last year Mr. R. W. Broadrick started from Dungeon Ghyll, where he had arrived by bicycle from Windermere. He had started at 3.30 a.m., and made the tour of the Scawfell group, reaching Keswick at 12.50.

On the way to Skiddaw the climber missed the path and had to wade through knee-deep heather for about an hour. Keswick re-reached, he made for the Sticks Pass, by which route he gained Helvellyn-maen by 7.40. Mr. Broadrick went hard from here, hoping to get into the Grasmere valley ere complete darkness fell. At Grisedale Tarn, however, the last gleams faded; he missed the way, and after stumbling across very rough ground (the south face of Seat Sandal) he reached the top of Dunmail Raise at 8.50. The walk to Windermere, 13 miles, took 2 hours 55 minutes—a fine performance considering previous exertions. The total distance was 60½ miles in the time of 20½ hours. Mr. Broadrick's cycle played a very important part in the day's work, placing him while still fresh at the foot of the mountains; but, deducting the 12 miles and 1 hour thus passed, the performance remains a great one—48½ miles for 19½ hours. The total of height ascended is 13,450 feet, with a fatigue equivalent of 66 miles level, ignoring the 12 miles cycle.

Mr. Shee tells again the story of the First Folio of Shakespeare, and M. C. Regnier gives a detailed account of the dull, prison-like barrack life of a French conscript.

In the Pall Mall Mr. G. S. Street takes, pro hac vice, the place of Mr. Quiller Couch under the title of "From a London Attic." Mr. Henley is in future to conduct the literary causerie at the end of the magazine, but Mr. Street, we are glad to see, is to continue his reflections from the Attic Window. Students of the Bismarckian political methods should read Mr. Karl Blind's "Prince Bismarck's Witches' Kitchen," which gives some curious personal experiences. The reproductions of some of Franz Lenbach's wonderful portraits—of Bismarck, Liszt, Moltke, the Pope, and others—are the most interesting illustrations in this number, which, however, also contains some further "Sketches in Egypt," by Mr. C. D. Gibson.

FICTION.

A Duet with an Occasional Chorus. By A. Conan Doyle. 7½×5¼in., viii.+330 pp. London, 1899.
Grant Richards. 6/-

In this latest of his novels Mr. Conan Doyle has apparently determined to show the admirers of his stirring romances and ingenious detective stories that he can be mildly "domestic" enough to satisfy the fiercest thirst for literary milk-and-water. A "Duet with an Occasional Chorus" is simply a story of the married life of a very commonplace young man and a quite colourless young woman—a story beginning with the interchange of love letters between the young couple and ending with the birth of the first baby. Frank Crosse is an assistant accountant in an insurance office at £400 a year. Maude Selby has a dot of £50 per annum, and on this they set up housekeeping in the usual small suburban villa, where the usual troubles with their servants and the tearful wrastlings of the inexperienced young housewife with "Mrs. Beeton" are duly chronicled in a manner not much more remarkable, to tell the truth, than that of the familiar jesters on the subject in the pages of the cheap weekly papers. The method employed by Mr. Doyle to lift his novel above this level and give a "cultured" tone to it has a certain innocence of its own. Before their marriage the young couple meet for an afternoon "outing," and having discussed the rival claims of a matinée and of the "Australians at the Oval," they finally decide on doing Westminster Abbey. Whereupon there follows a couple of chapters of "adapted guide-book" after this style:—

Tennyson, the last, almost the greatest of that illustrious line, lay under the white slab upon the floor. Maude and Frank stood reverently beside it.

Sunset and Evening Star.
And one clear call for me.

Frank quoted. "What lines for a very old man to write. I should put him second only to Shakespeare had I the marshalling of them."

"I have read so little," said Maude.

"We will read it together after next week. But it makes your reading so much more real and intimate when you have stood at the grave of the man who wrote it. That's Chaucer, the big tomb there. He is the father of British poetry. Here is Browning beside Tennyson—united in life and in death. He was the more profound thinker, but music and form are essential also."

"Who is that standing figure?"

"It is Dryden. What a clever face, and what a modern type. Here is Walter Scott beside the door. How kindly and humorous his expression was."

And so forth, and so forth. Again, after a few pages of post-nuptial billing and cooing, we have a couple of chapters about Mr. Samuel Pepys, including an account of a visit to his tomb in St. Olave's, and familiar reflections on the relation between Pepys and his wife. Then there comes a little money trouble of the young couple, followed by an abortive attempt on the part of the ladies of Woking—the only real touch of comedy in the book—to form a Browning Society. Then the mild excitement of a visit paid to the wife by an old flame of the husband's—a lady of the "siren" order—who is touched (see penny novelette passim) by the sweetness, and goodness, and simplicity, of the young wife, and repents her of her mischief-making intentions, and "suddenly puts her arms round Maude and kisses her on the cheek," exclaiming "You are a good sort and I hope you will be happy." After which we get a chapter entitled "No. 5, Cheyne Row," describing a visit to the Carlyle Museum, and containing informing passages of this description:—

They spent their early years in Scotland, you know, and he was a man going on to the forties when he came to London. The success of Sartor Resartus encouraged him to the step. His letter describes all the incoming. Here is his comment written after her death.

By this time we have reached the "last note of the duet." It is turned into a trio by the birth of the baby, and after a final letter to the author from the young mother containing a most vivid and graphic description, a whole page long, of the behaviour of the infant in his bath and his attitude towards his feeding bottle, the "story" comes to an end.

Of course it is not impossible to construct an amusing, an interesting, even a powerful novel on materials as slender as these; but unfortunately it requires qualities which are far from being conspicuous in Mr. Doyle. Subtlety of observation and delicacy of character-drawing are not his forte; and though he is not lacking in the humorous faculty, it requires a broader canvas and more strongly contrasted individualities to allow it adequate scope. It is apparently his consciousness of his inability to interest his reader in the singularly commonplace life-story of his personages which has led him to resort to the artless device of making them exchange views with each other on the denizens of Poets' Corner, and the matrimonial relations of Mr. and Mrs. Carlyle. The result is a book, which is certainly quite unworthy of Mr. Conan Doyle's reputation, and which, indeed, considering the sort of work that he has accustomed his numerous admirers to expect from him, is, we cannot refrain from saying, a rather daring experiment on the docility of his public.

Calmann Levy. Fr.3.50

M. René Bazin has already established himself as a writer of serious merit, a novelist of an old-fashioned distinction, with a delicate power of observation and a loftiness of view and sentiment, a kind of smiling, tolerant austerity. He has the good fortune not to be Parisian, and he goes straight to nature for his theme, and the humanity which he delights to depict is bounded by hedges and long white country roads lit by sunrise and sunset glories, by evening star and placid moonbeams—is steeped in the scents of hay and blossoming bud, in the many fragrances of shepherd life. Not that, like M. André Theuriet, he wanders in sentimental solitude among the woods, and evokes a provincial society of not more moral value and far more vulgar than the worn-out milieu of Paris. M. Bazin studies peasant life in the spirit of George Eliot, of George Sand, of Pereda, of Hardy in his prehistoric day—before he fell under the influence of Zola, and discovered that vice should be just as rampant in pastoral scenes as in city purlieus. M. René Doumic speaks of the writer's most striking quality, that of distinguished gentleness, as "douceur angevine." M. Bazin's mildness may or may not be the mark of his province, but whether personal or territorial, it is singularly engaging. When Maupassant and Flaubert remembered Normandy, it was not to make us love their native province, so perhaps M. Doumic is right in regarding "douceur" as an Angevine quality, just as Daudet has taught us that gaiety is the eternal note of the South.

Nothing that M. René Bazin has written can compare with his new novel. It has all the charm, with the closer fidelity to nature, the intenser, more vibrant modern note, of George Sand's "Mare au Diable." It has the sadness, the hopefulness, the quaint beauty of "Silas Marner," with a loftiness and penetration all its own. Rousille, the farmer's daughter, is a figure that remains in the memory as a fine revelation of a simple rustic nature. This is her portrait:—

With the full oval of her cheeks, the pure bend of her brow, slightly narrowed at the temples by two closely platted bands, the straight lips, which seemed as ready to lift themselves in a laugh as to drop in crying, she looked like those growing maidens who walk in processions, carrying a streamer. Alone the eyes were those of a woman ; her eyes the colour of a ripe chestnut of the same hue as the hair, in which dwelt, in which glowed a tenderness quite young, but already serious and dignified, and as if sure to last.

The whole novel breathes this mingling of dignity and grace. The love-making is grave, undemonstrative, without endearment, explosion, any evidences of passion. When Rousille flings defiance at parental tyranny, she says that Jean Nesmy has "her friendship," and Jean, talking of his hopes and present sorrow to his mother, says that Rousille has "pledged him her friendship." But what fidelity, what depths of sentiment, what unconscious heroism, underlying this placid, ungracious tenacity. When Jean, expelled from the farm because of his presumptuous love for Rousille, writes to her, one sees the simple fellow that he is :—

"We talk of you, mother and I. and I often say that I am not as happy as I was before I knew you, or as I should be if every one at home knew you. But mother won't believe that you have a friendship for me, because we are too poor. If only she saw you she would understand that it is for life. I will come one evening while the men are still outside, and you are perhaps thinking of me as you are making the soup in the big room. And when you hear me, Rousille, open the window, and tell me, with one of your little smiling glances, tell me that you always keep me in your friendship."

We see Marie Rose reading this simple letter over and over, and lifting her wide eyes upon the landscape to recall the image of Jean Nesmy "in his tight jacket with white buttons, with his bony visage, his eager eyes that only smiled for her when, his work finished at the fall of day, the reaping hook hanging from his bare arm, he stood and looked at the sheaves of corn he had cut down and tied together in the stubble."

But the book treats, with profounder meaning, of farm life and of the decay of the land. The portraits of the disappointed optimist, the farmer and his three sons, are extremely powerful, and from the opening to the last page the book never falls below the high level of a work of art.

Although in a modern novel the author is often content with a plain heroine, it would appear to be a fixed law that a story of bygone times must have one of "perfect loveliness." Mr. S. H. Burchell, in THE DUKE'S SERVANTS (Gay and Bird, 6s.), follows the ancient custom. One of his fair women, Kate de Vaux, is so wondrously beautiful that Harold Lincoln is impelled to propose to her at the very first interview. In one respect he has departed from established usage. For while most romances relating to a remote period are filled with thrilling adventures, this story pursues through many chapters a comparatively uneventful course, and the author saves up his excitement for the finish. His work suffers from an excess of "local colour"; but many readers will like it, especially those who are averse from bloodshed. Mr. Burchell has made a very careful study of the period, and if he takes occasional liberties with historical persons—for instance, with Felton, the assassin of Buckingham—he has nevertheless given us a series of interesting pictures.

OFF THE HIGH ROAD, by Eleanor C. Price (Macmillan, 6s.) is a simple but very pleasant story. Viola Fairfax has a bad guardian, who, for the sake of keeping her fortune in the family, wishes her to marry his son. Viola objects, runs away, and from a country town, advertises for quiet lodgings "off the high road." A lucky chance brings her to the cottage of Mrs. Downes, a tenant of Colonel Dampier, whose son Edwin, promptly falls in love with the beautiful truant. The author can write the Queen's English, and write it, moreover, gracefully and with directness.

THE SHELLBACK; OR, AT SEA IN THE SIXTIES, by Alec. J. Boyd, edited by Archie Campbell (Cassell, 6s.), concerns the fortunes and misfortunes of an Australian young gentleman, who, for the love of adventure, shipped under a Yankee captain, "a most delightful man," as he appeared on the surface, but a demon of brutality as events proved. The narrative, with its business-like appendices, has evidently been compiled from actual facts, and is sufficiently blood-curdling to stir the most sluggish imagination. It will prove a treasure-trove to boys, and, despite

Mr. Campbell's pious hope to the contrary, should certainly cure them of any wish to be sailors.

Redland, as Mrs. Coulson Kernahan knows it, is a highly favoured part of the country, with a quite extraordinary flora. In her novel FRANK REDLAND, RECRUIT (J. Long, 6s.), we read that May had come, and the purple of the heather mingled with the yellow of the gorse flowers "also that "the tall foxglove peeped out from its environment of meadow-sweet," and "the little copses had shows of wood anemone, hyacinth, and cuckoo-flower." Not bad, at one and the same time—and in May! In addition to its unequalled floral attractions, Redland possesses a mysterious black-robed lady, living in a villa whose rooms are "furnished and perfumed with something of Eastern splendour," with a daughter of more than mortal innocence and beauty. How Frank Redland falls in love at first sight with Fanchette, who apparently has the brains as well as the manners of a kitten, how the Squire, his uncle, goes through the long deferred ceremony of marriage with Fanchette's mother, while Frank marries the artless daughter—all this the story goes on to disclose, ending, of course, with the beautiful sight of Fanchette gambolling on the lawn with her child. The novel will probably be popular.

THE RAPIN, by Henry de Vere Stacpoole (Heinemann, 6s.), is a study of life in the Latin Quarter; and the indications are that the author has studied the Latin Quarter from a distance. His heroine is modelled on Mimi Pinson, but cannot cook an omelette. The Parisian grisette who cannot cook an omelette is so exceptional that she may be ignored. We are also introduced to a princess, living in the Faubourg St. Honoré, who receives actresses and out-at-elbows painters from Montmartre—a thing which the princesses who live in Paris never do. This, it must be allowed, is not encouraging. Yet if Mr. Stacpoole would write only of the things he knows about, or would seek information concerning the things he wishes to write about, he could produce a really good novel, for he certainly possesses the rare power of telling a story.

Mr. Julian Ralph begins his new novel in a manner that may disconcert some readers—namely with a conclave of spirits round the bedside of a dying man. It will be a pity if his Etherians, as he calls them, prevent any one from persevering with the story, for AN ANGEL IN A WEB (Harper, 6s.) is better worth reading than a good many books that begin in a more orthodox fashion. The young lady with whose fortunes we are chiefly concerned is well drawn, and the dangers to which she exposes herself in her innocence, and from which the watchful Etherians, aided by some more mundane friends, ultimately rescue her, are exciting enough. The two villains are less convincing than the rest. Christmas, the kindly old beggar, is the most original and perhaps the most effective figure. Mr. Ralph writes pleasantly and unaffectedly, but we confess that his spiritualistic machinery annoyed us a little at first. The book is a good one, but it would have been better without these Etherians.

Mr. Harley Rodney is by way of being a humourist. He has several qualifications for the part—a crisp, rather smart style of writing, a neat hand at dialogue, and an eye for a comical situation. But there is a certain puerility about HORATIO (Digby, Long, 3s. 6d.) that is sometimes irritating. In his nomenclature Mr. Rodney has gone to the extreme of absurdity: we have a Colonel Bloup of Tump Farm, a Mr. Peasances, in the Explosives Office, a colony of Bow-wow-wow, and so forth. Names of this sort add nothing to the humorous value of a book; they merely produce an atmosphere of unreality that annoys the reader. It is something to Mr. Rodney's credit that, even with this self-imposed handicap, he has contrived to make "Horatio" readable. The hero is not a bad character-study, and, although his adventures are generally farcical and sometimes wildly improbable, he manages to enlist a little of our sympathy. There is plenty of incident in the book. Told with a little more restraint it might have been quite amusing.

POOR HUMAN NATURE, by Elizabeth Godfrey (Grant Richards, 6s.), bears every sign of having been written by one who knows her subject, or, at any rate, that particular section of it which dwells in little German towns and centres its interests in Wagnerian opera. These opera-folk are altogether convincing, with their little jealousies and scandals, their large generousities and enthusiasms, and, above all, their thoroughly German outlook on life. Few Englishwomen could have drawn a hero like Ehrenfried Dahlmann and risked the sympathies of the reader by making him so intensely German. Still fewer, perhaps, could have contrasted little Hedwig so cleverly with the Englishwoman Clare without overdoing the difference out of national prejudice. One more achievement must be put to the author's credit; she can give charming descriptions of scenery which are never tedious, for they show us what they try to show. Here is a glimpse of a sweet German village :—

It was so still that the broad river carried in its bosom a perfect picture of the village on its brink, line for line, tint for tint. First the fringe of rushes, with their plummy heads pointing downwards; then the edge of the boatbuilder's yard, with its stacks of huge logs and deep shadowy slips. The stout piles on which the jetty ran out seemed to go down, down into fathomless brown depths, broken by a silvery gleam on the glassy surface where the current broke against them. Beyond the rushes a low reddish-grey wall, over which lilac bushes, loaded with blossom, leaned to look at their own reflection; beyond them, again, a small, quaint church, deep red, very drowsy-looking, more than half steep-pitched, tiled roof, broken with those odd dormer windows one only sees in Germany, looking like eyes with half-shut lids; flanked with an onion-shaped bell-turret, weather-stained on one side to a vivid emerald green. Behind the roof the shadows grew confused, dark green and misty blue, where the wooded gorge wound away into the heart of the hills. . . . Suddenly the peaceful picture was broken into shards, churned into foam, by the advent of an intrusive little steamer, which came puffing up to the jetty with a long trail of smoke behind it. Nobody wanted it; for no one landed or went on board, though it heralded its approach by a shriek which brought out an official in a peaked cap and brass buttons from a little wooden house, like a jack-in-the-box. A few minutes, and it tussled off down the river to Blankenstadt; the smoke vanished away, the swirls died down into stillness, and the picture formed itself again.

SOME SPORTING STORIES.

It has often been said that those who know all about sport cannot write, and those who can write know nothing about sport. Thus we are in general somewhat indifferently supplied if our taste be for novels in which hunting and betting are the main features. The author of M'GINTY'S RACEHORSE AND OTHER STORIES (Redway, 4s. 6d. n.), "G. G.," tells us quite candidly, in his preface, that he has both the knowledge and the power of expression necessary, but we confess we are a little disappointed. The writer certainly has an immense amount of knowledge of the shady side of sporting life, and is able to tell his tales in the argot of the sporting Press with great fluency and finesse, but many of them are sadly wanting in point and character. The volume is interestingly illustrated by Mr. R. J. Richardson, who seems to know his subject as well as the author. In RIDING (Redway, 4s. 6d. n.) the same pseudonymous writer is far more interesting; these notes and experiences in regard to a sport in which most Englishmen think their country easily first are fresh, informing, and entertaining. SPORTING ADVENTURES OF CHARLES CARRINGTON, ESQ., AND OTHER STORIES (Redway, 6s. n.) is just the book for a sportsman who likes to pick up a volume now and then and read a short article or essay on his favourite subject. He will not turn in vain to this collection, for all sorts and conditions of sport are dealt with here by "Old Calabar" and other sporting writers; "Old Calabar" has an article on "Sporting of the Past and Present Day," in which he lashes our time and praises the old with great spirit and wisdom. Pigeon shooting, the large "bags" and the heavy lunches, Polo, and the present style of bowling are none of them spared, but on the other hand he speaks with discretion and kindness of the modern bicycle, and in all he says shows a just point of view and a sense of what makes for the dignity of sport. If only for this writer's articles, the present volume might well be recommended to the sportsman who would wile away an hour or two.

The book is described as with "illustrations by Randolph Caldecott"; this is highly misleading, as there is only one reproduction of a drawing by Caldecott included, and that has already been published in one or more books of an earlier date.

There is a remarkable Senior Wrangler in BY BERWEN BANKS (Hutchinson, 6s.), by Allen Raine, who quotes poetry freely and rambles about with a sketch-book, never thinking of mathematics until a cowman whom he is painting reminds him "to put seven buttons on both of those two legs." The plot shows a want of ingenuity and relies too much on coincidence, but the story contains a very careful description of Welsh manners and customs, and for that reason cannot fail to give pleasure to many readers.

Messrs. Grant Richards send us SHANGHAIED: A STORY OF ADVENTURE ON THE CALIFORNIAN COAST, by Mr. Frank Norris (3s. 6d.), which Mr. W. D. Howells reviewed in Literature, when it appeared in America under the title of the "Moran of the Lady Letty." We welcome the arrival in England of this romantic story, over which Mr. Howells, who described it as "a fresh and courageous invention," confessed to have "gasped in the crucial moments."

The Hon. Mrs. Henry Chetwynd knows how to string a plot together, and her new book, THE MEMBER'S WIFE (Pearson, 6s.), runs easily enough without being at any time remarkably brilliant or sadly dull, while some of its political detail is convincing and entertaining.

ODD ISSUES, by S. Squire Sprigge (Smithers, 4s. n.), is a creditable, if not a brilliant, collection of short stories, several of which have been printed before. They are not short stories of quite the best kind. The expanded anecdote is more frequent than the moment saisi. Still, the work is good of its sort, and the book would well beguile a tedious railway journey. The first story, "Mr. Bonnany's Bishopric," is quite amusing.

KNIVES OF DIAMONDS, by George Griffiths (Pearson, 3s. 6d.), is rather reading matter than literature. But it is such good reading that the point need not be pressed. The book is a set of short stories, illustrating the romance and adventure of illicit diamond-buying. Devoid of the finer qualities of fiction, they would help to pass the time on a journey pleasantly.

TOM BENTON'S LUCK, by Herbert Elliott Hamblen (Macmillan, 6s.), and THE GIFT OF BONAPARTE, by Robert Shortz (Routledge, 6s.), are a couple of books frankly improbable, but not the less readable. The first will be enjoyed by the young, the very young person, being a tale of the sea, and of the usual charming girl, Kitty, so familiar to us in nautical novels. Mr. Hamblen is an American, and Tom sails under the United States flag. The unsophisticated of all ages should appreciate the second book, a rattling story of excursions and alarms, with a heroine incomparably beautiful, a first-person-singular hero incomparably brave, and supers no less distinguished than Lannes, Berthier, Masséna, and the Little Corporal himself. Napoleon strides the stage in the traditional manner, frowning portentously, pulling people's ears, and making unscrupulous love to pretty women. First Person Singular acts as his right-hand man, saves his life more than once, and occasionally teaches him his place. Which is all just as it should be.

Obituary.

DR. GOTTLIEB WILLIAM LEITNER.

The death at Bonn from pneumonia of Dr. Leitner removes the most remarkable linguist of the age. Born at Pesth, the direction of his studies was determined by the fact that he got his education at Malta, Brussa, and Constantinople. His knowledge of Oriental languages was so remarkable that, when the Crimean War broke out, he was appointed First Class Interpreter, with the rank of Colonel, to the British Commissariat. After the peace he lectured for a while at King's College, London, on Turkish, Arabic, and Modern Greek; but the most notable and useful part of his work was done in India. Appointed to the post of Principal of the Lahore Government College, he made it his aim to interest the natives, and more particularly the native Princes, in educational affairs. To this end he paid many visits to the capitals of independent States, and by undertaking to make the languages of the East the medium of instruction in the science of the West induced many Maharajahs to subscribe.

The Supreme Government rewarded him by giving the new University of the Punjab its Charter of Incorporation.

Besides the University, every educational enterprise, direct or indirect, elicited Dr. Leitner's keen sympathy and energetic co-operation. He founded literary societies and free public libraries, and published newspapers in the Urdu, Arabic, and English languages. As director of the Lahore Civil and Military Gazette he had Mr. Rudyard Kipling for his assistant editor, and printed many of the "Departmental Ditties." After his return from India he founded the Mosque and Indian Institute at Woking, and for ten years edited the Asiatic Quarterly Review. He had written on "The Theory and Practice of Education," "The Races of Turkey," and "The History and Literature of Mahomedanism in their Relations to Universal History." How many languages and dialects he was acquainted with is uncertain; the estimates of the writers of obituary notices range between twenty-five and fifty.

THE DECADENCE OF MAGAZINES.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—I offer you as to the point the following by Matthew Arnold in his Essay on Copyright :—

Second-rate commonplace literature is what the ignorant require for catching the first desire for books, the first gleam of light; the day will presently dawn for them as it does for the child, who by degrees, as he learns to read, learns to understand also; and in fifty years from this time (1880) the bad and middling in literature will be unable to find a publisher, because they will be unable to find a market. . . . Let us all do our best to bring about such a consummation, without, however, too confidently counting upon it.

Your obedient servant,

March 26, 1899.

CLAVERHOUSE AND WILLIAM OF ORANGE.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—May I be forgiven for taking some little exception to that portion of your notice of Loyal Lochaber which would seem to imply that the statement that Claverhouse saved the life of the Prince of Orange rested practically on the not too trustworthy authority of the Grameid?

"Memoirs of Dundee," by an Officer of the Army, London, 1711, says :—

For at the Battle of St. Nuff, 1674, when the Prince of Orange was dismounted, and in great Danger of being taken, he rescued him, and brought him off upon his own Horse. His Highness requited this brave Action by making him Captain of one of his Troops of Guards.

I am well aware that Lord Macaulay (Hist. of Eng. III., 289, Note; ed. 1855) says this story was invented by "some Jacobite" many years after they were both dead; none of the statements, however, upon the strength of which Macaulay discredits this story are to be found in my copy of the Memoirs. I should say that my edition is the first (1711), whereas Lowndes, Aytoun, and Mr. T. F. Henderson all refer to an edition of 1714. The account, upon the face of it, bears all the appearance of being a genuine narrative, though, doubtless, the book would be peculiarly distasteful to the Whig historian, as containing a too truthful account of the Massacre of Glencoe.

I require some better authority than that of Lord Macaulay for discrediting these Memoirs. The Times, January 11, 1856, closed its very able review of Vols. III. and IV. of Macaulay's History with these words :—"It is read and it will be re-read; it will go down to posterity; it will pass to distant nations and foreign climes, and it will be a κρίμα ἐς αἰ-—but it is not the History of England." Macaulay's hatred of the Stuarts was hereditary; his great-grandfather, Aulay Macaulay, "a minister of Harris"—though hardly of the Gospel—endeavoured to earn blood-money by betraying Charles Edward; Aulay's son, John, a "minister of South Uist," having supplied him with the necessary information.

I may also say that Mr. T. F. Henderson (whose bitterest enemy would hardly accuse him of Stuart or Jacobite prejudices) adds :—"The gallantry of Claverhouse at Seneff was, however, mentioned, though without specific details, in laudatory verses addressed to him on New Year's Day, 1683" (Dict. Natl. Biog.)

Yours faithfully,

F. L. MAWDESLEY.

Delwood Croft, York, March 25.

P.S.—To say that Mark Napier records the incident in his Memoirs of Dundee I., 181, would, perhaps, be laying myself open to the charge of quoting an authority almost as partial to the "Last of Scots" as was Macaulay to the Dutchman.

POISON IN FICTION.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—With reference to the paragraphs which have appeared in Literature on my poisoning story, "Mithridates, the King," may I respectfully beg to be absolved of having read "Ausonius"? And, though I have an old-fashioned taste for some of Dryden's poems, I cannot plead guilty to having ever seen his "Don Sebastian." What the poisons were that I indicated in this story I have now forgotten, but any student of drugs will know that Mr. Rayleigh Vicars is right as regards the two he mentions. For some drugs are in their natures antagonistic, that is, their characteristic, full toxic effects are exactly contrary, and, if by chance certain quantities (varying, doubtless, with the idiosyncrasies of the subjects) were administered, little evil would result. A romancer may, on occasion, I think, be allowed to be the Fate of his creatures, and found a story on this unlikely possibility. I may note in passing, that pharmaceutical authorities rightly distinguish between antidotes and antagonistic drugs. Thus, though the latter may be antidotes, antidotes are not necessarily antagonistic in the limited sense.

I am, Sir, yours truly,

MORLEY ROBERTS.

AN AMATEUR HERALD.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—When you tell me that "any member of the College of Arms must be well aware that a large proportion of the arms recorded there are those which were granted between the reigns of Richard III. and Charles II.," and I have it on the authority of one of the most prominent members of the College that the reverse was the case, I cannot help feeling that a misunderstanding must have crept in somewhere, and I hope the next time I go to London to ascertain how the mistake has arisen. When you tell me that peers are no longer obliged at the time of their elevation to the peerage either to prove a claim to arms or to record fresh ones, I am bound to conclude (and I am pleased to think it) that the old statute has been, without my knowledge, repealed so far as it affects them. These, after all, are mere trifling side issues, and do not alter my main contention. But when you tell me that I omit to show what authority or jurisdiction a Court of law possesses to make a rule concerning the right to bear arms, the answer appears to me, though I am not a lawyer, an extremely simple one. If a Court of law has not this jurisdiction, who has? In early times the Crown delegated this jurisdiction to the Heralds' College. That was in the days when heraldry had a practical importance. Does the college still possess it? No; for it has no power to punish those who transgress its rules, and any schoolboy ought to be aware that a law which loses its sanction, or penalty in the case of non-compliance, ceases ipso facto to be a law at all; for sanction is an essential part of law. Formerly the heralds possessed and freely used this sanction; now they have lost it—in other words, their right to adjudicate has lapsed (like so many other rights) with time, except in the case of newly-created baronets (for you tell me they have no longer any jurisdiction over peers).

Their authority being dead, the only court of appeal in such cases became the common law Court, and the ground of appeal was that some one had appropriated the property of somebody else. But, owing to the absolute impossibility of determining to how many claimants a coat of arms really belongs, the law Courts very wisely washed their hands of the whole concern, and left every man quite free to bear any arms he pleased; so, as I said in a previous letter, the bearing of arms became, and is, simply a question of conscience.

As an illustration of what I say:—In olden times the heralds had the right, in fact it was a part of their duty, to visit the parish churches and tear down all armorial scutcheons which were erected without what was then proper legal warrant. Now, suppose Sir Albert Woods and his satellites were to visit your parish church and mutilate your family monuments, to whom would you appeal for redress, and would the law Courts or the Crown be likely to sanction such an arbitrary proceeding?

I remain, Sir, yours faithfully, Y. Z.

* * Unless we are to believe that the author of "The Right to Bear Arms" has invented the whole of the documents he cites in this work, the jurisdiction, about which "Y. Z." inquires, is obviously fully possessed by the Earl Marshal of England, whom the Sovereign continually addresses as "You, Henry, Duke of Norfolk, to whom the cognisance of matters of this nature (arms, &c.) doth properly belong," and we are content, pace "Y. Z.," to acquiesce in the Sovereign's formal recognition. The College of Arms as clearly possesses adequate authority to deal with the arms of peers as with those of all other classes of the community, and we never stated anything to the contrary. And, though the House of Lords does not punish those who illegally assume and use titles, this does not prove that its authority in these matters is ipso facto dead. The destruction of spurious armorial insignia to which "Y. Z." refers, was, according to "X.," directed by Commissions from the Crown to the Kings of Arms under the Great Seal (vide "The Right to Bear Arms," p. 89), and, if a similar Commission were issued to the Kings of Arms at the present day, we imagine that the sanction of the Crown would be as effectual now as it was then. If "Y. Z." will read "The Right to Bear Arms" more carefully, he will find all his questions answered therein much more completely than can possibly be done within the limits of a note of this description.

[We fear that we cannot afford space to continue this correspondence.]

Authors and Publishers.

Sir Henry Craik is at present engaged upon a work which, beginning at the date of the union of the Parliaments of England and Scotland, traces the social and industrial development of the latter country since that time, and shows the extent to which Scotland has profited by the union.

The Stuart Papers, the calendaring of which is to be one of the next labours of the Historical Manuscripts Commission, consists chiefly of correspondence of the Chevalier St. George (James III. of the Jacobites, and the Old Pretender of the Hanoverians) and his son, Prince Charles Edward. This correspondence passed into the hands of the latter's brother, the Cardinal Duke of York, on whose death it was purchased by George IV. The papers lay for some time at Cumberland Lodge, but after the accession of the Queen they were put into some sort of order and were placed in Windsor Castle, where they now are. Partial use of them has been made by several historians, but the manuscripts have never been systematically arranged. The promised "full calendar" will be an important contribution to the history of last century.

Towards the end of April Sir Monier Monier-Williams, the Boden Professor of Sanskrit, will bring out a new edition of his Sanskrit-English Dictionary, containing about 60,000 more words than the previous edition. In his preface the author justifies the application of the Roman alphabet to the expression of Sanskrit.

The Frederick A. Stokes Company, of New York, has among its spring books a new collection of verses by Mr. Stephen Crane. About five years ago, before Mr. Crane became known through the appearance of "The Red Badge of Courage," Messrs. Copeland and Day, of Boston, brought out his verses in a curiously-printed little volume called "The Black Riders, and Other Lines," which passed through two editions.

Mr. Francis Gribble is engaged upon a literary history of Geneva, written with special reference to the existing literary landmarks. The subject practically begins with Bonivard, the prisoner of Chillon being also the official historian of the Republic; Calvin, Beza, Casaubon, Gibbon, Rousseau, Voltaire, and Madame de Staël are among the other writers whose relations with Geneva will be described; and publicity will also be given to some facts not generally known concerning the career of Madame de Warens. The main narrative will end with de Saussure; but there will be an account of the visits paid to Geneva of John Knox, John Evelyn, Milton, Addison, Goldsmith, Dr. John Moore, Byron, Shelley, Goethe, Chateaubriand, and Alexandre Dumas.

Two interesting medical works may be looked for shortly. Messrs. Baillière, Tindall, and Co. will publish "The Administrative Control of Tuberculosis," by Sir William Broadbent and Mr. John Broadbent—a timely volume on a subject that has been much discussed during the winter. The other book is Sir Douglas Powell's Lunleian Lectures on the principles which govern treatment in diseases and disorders of the heart. This will be issued by Mr. H. K. Lewis.

The Victorian county histories, mentioned in this column last week, will, no doubt, embody the information contained in the accounts of all the counties that were published one hundred years ago by the Board of Agriculture. The Board was not then a Government Department, but it received a Government subsidy. One of its most valuable legacies to the public was this series of county records, edited by Arthur Young. Mr. Jasper More asked Mr. Balfour in the House of Commons last week whether he would not recommend that they should be reprinted. Mr. Balfour replied that he could not advise spending public money upon them. Mr. Jasper More thinks that some one among the publishers should take them in hand, but we fear he is not likely to meet with more encouragement from them than he received from Mr. Balfour.

"How to Do It," a little book published in Stockholm by the Hon. Lady Pakenham and Mrs. Winalow for the benefit of the English Church there, contains original contributions in a few lines from the King and Queen of Sweden and Norway, Sven Hedin, and other distinguished Swedes, with translations; as well as from the Primate of Ireland, the Bishop of Salisbury, Max O'Rell, May Crommelin, Edna Lyall, Maxwell Gray, Miss Braddon, and others. It can be obtained through any bookseller in the United Kingdom, and wholesale from Messrs. Simpkin, Marshall and Co.

An interesting work on Africa is being published in America by the Fleming H. Revell Company. This is a record of the many missionary agencies that have been at work in the Dark Continent. Under the title, "The Redemption of Africa," Mr. Frederic Perry Noble discusses first the aborigines and their religions, and then the efforts that have been made to plant Christianity among them. Mr. Noble was secretary to the African Congress at the Chicago World's Fair and has a wide knowledge of his subject. He deals with it in an impartial spirit as between Protestants and Roman Catholics. He does not allow that Mahomedanism is still a great spiritual force in Africa; he believes that its power is being weakened by European influences. But he does not think these influences have any good effect without Christianity, and is not in agreement with the advice often given to missionaries to civilize the barbarian before they try to make him a Christian.

Mr. George Eyre Evans is issuing a book called "Midland Churches: A history of the congregations on the roll of the Midland Christian Union, with biographies of their ministers, from 1662 to 1899," which will be published by subscription (Herald Press, Dudley). The registers belonging to these churches, some 40 volumes, now in Somerset House, have been inspected by the author, and numerous interesting and quaint extracts will be given in extenso; and the 23 recently recovered monumental brasses, at Whitechurch, are described, and their measurements and line-for-line inscriptions printed for the first time.

A selection from the writings of the late Arthur Laurensen, the Shetland antiquary, to be published shortly will include some interesting papers dealing with Northern antiquities, translations of two Norse lays, and some original poems. It will be edited by Miss Spence, who has written a short biography of Laurensen for it, and will be published by Messrs Johnson and Greig, Lerwick.

The Professor of Semitic languages and literatures in Cornell University, Mr. Nathaniel Schmidt, will publish in the course of the year a work dealing with the various aspects of the Messianic question from a thoroughly critical standpoint.

The Historical Manuscripts Commission appointed two years ago by the American Historical Association will print in its third report a classified index to the items relating to American history scattered through the seventy-seven volumes published by the Royal Commission on Historical Manuscripts. For its fourth report the Commission will present a volume of the Correspondence of John O. Calhoun, voluminous remains of which have been collected for this purpose.

M. André Theuriot has written a delightful preface for the new edition of Michelet's "Montagne" just brought out by Calmann Lévy. Literature has had more than once occasion to note the unique charm of the writer. M. Theuriot has recently added to his already long list of stories "Le Refuge" (Lemerre), and "Lys Sauvage" (Fasquelle). The very breath of the woods is in these books and gives them their distinction in the French literature of to-day. For this sylvan note we can forgive the writer the somewhat old-time sentimentalism of his plots. No one else in France seems to care nowadays as much as he does for fresh air and the open country.

The price of Messrs. Goupil's book illustrating the great masters in the Louvre Galleries is said to be £36 net. The descriptions of the pictures are by well-known French writers, and the work is being issued in twelve parts containing in all some 300 illustrations.

German art publishers are very active just now. Velhagen and Klasing are publishing a sumptuous edition of the Four Gospels in Luther's translation, with reproductions from the finest paintings illustrating the life of Christ by the great Italian, Flemish, and German masters of the 14th, 15th, and 16th centuries. The first two volumes of a series of books on modern German painters deal with the art of Arnold Böcklin and Max Klinger (Berlin: Schuster and Loeffler), and a new and beautifully illustrated work by Ernst Haeckel, entitled "Kunstformen der Natur," is being issued in parts by the publishing firm of the Bibliographical Institute in Leipzig and Vienna. Twenty-six heliogravures from the finest paintings of Frans Hals, including the pictures at Haarlem, with explanatory text either in Dutch or German by the librarian of the Amsterdam University, are announced for publication by Kleinmann, of Haarlem. The reproductions we have seen are excellent.

Translating novels is not, as a rule, a royal road to wealth; but Mr. Curtin, the American translator of "Quo Vadis," is said to have made £5,000 out of his enterprise.

The Catholic Truth Society are publishing "The Catholics of Ireland under the Penal Laws of the Eighteenth Century," by Cardinal Moran, and "The Gospel for the Children," by Mr. B. F. C. Costelloe.

Mrs. Aubrey Richardson has, it is stated, completed a book entitled "Famous Ladies of the English Court."

Among the authors who will act as stewards at the Authors' Society Dinner on May 4 are included Sir Edwin Arnold, Sir Robert Ball, Sir Martin Conway, Sir Walter Besant, Sir Norman Lockyer, Sir John Lubbock, Sir Herbert Maxwell, Sir Frederick Pollock, Sir Richard Temple, Sir Henry Thompson, Mr. E. F. Benson, Mr. Austin Dobson, Dr. Conan Doyle, Mr. Thomas Hardy, Mr. Anthony Hope Hawkins, Mr. George Meredith, Mr. Frankfort Moore, Mr. Henry Norman, Mr. Morley Roberts, Mr. Herbert Spencer, Mr. J. M'Neil Whistler, and Mr. I. Zangwill. Among the ladies filling the same office are the Duchess of Sutherland, Lady Florence Dixie, Mrs. W. K. Clifford, Miss Florence Marryat, Mrs. Humphry Ward, and Miss Charlotte M. Yonge.

THE READING PUBLIC.

To most people the reading public means the public which reads the books that are talked about, reviewed at length in the newspapers, and eagerly asked for at the libraries. This is the public which is appealed to by the publishers whose names are familiar, by writers of biography and records of travel, by the poets and novelists who are making the literature of our time. It is a public that consists of educated people, conforming to certain standards of taste and of manners—standards which must be observed by those who write for them; and swayed by fashions which show themselves just as clearly in the books they read as in the clothes they wear. It is by the winds of fashion that publishers (and, in many cases, authors too) trim their sails; and, as far as regards the writers whose work receives any consideration from professional critics, this small minority does constitute the reading public. Yet what a very small number it is! If, instead of confining the phrase to this limited meaning, we think of the reading public as including all who can and do read, how insignificant numbers does that other picked and trained public appear. For so many years the school boards have been doing their work, for so many years a shallow education has been spreading over the land, and we want reading matter. Their taste is not fastidious, their demands are easily satisfied. A few columns of printed jests, a few pages of "information"—useful or useless, it seems to matter little which—some lurid or va little highly-spiced "society gossip," and the craving is stayed. When it returns by another budget of the same kind Whiteing has lately given us a scathing kind of entertainment provided in the il which delight "No. 5, John-street." put it, in their hearts and imaginations, and just such a refuge is offered to them in the books of Mr. Charles M. Sheldon, to which we referred at the beginning of last month as having given us the "sensation" of the present publishing season. There must be many people belonging to that inner "reading public" who have never even heard of Mr. Sheldon, and probably only a few of those who have noticed the remarkable outpouring of edition after edition of his books will have taken the trouble to look into them. Yet the "boom" in these small unpretentious volumes is the greatest that the publishing trade has known since the appearance of the late Edward Bellamy's "Looking Backward." It is estimated that altogether four million copies have been sold in the United States, where they first came out, and in this country. The most striking of the series, "In His Steps, or What would Jesus do?" was offered to an English publisher some two or three years ago, but it was declined, and for a time Mr. Sheldon was little heard of here. Then it seems to have been discovered, only a few months back, that the books had not been copyrighted in Great Britain, and a number of publishers at once rose to the occasion. Some of them, it is understood, are paying the author a royalty, but the majority are content to issue the stories without troubling about the precepts they enforce. They are issued at various prices from one penny upwards, and up to the present they are selling in enormous numbers as fast as the publishers can print them. Here is evidence in striking form of the immense mass of people, quite outside the ordinary run of book-buyers, who are ready to buy books that just suit their taste. How novelists, who are gratified with a sale of two or three thousand, must long to reach this great multitude! What is the secret of Mr. Sheldon's success? We shall see whether others can win popularity by his methods. There is no doubt that he will have imitators, but whether they will succeed as he has done is more than doubtful.

For the one quality in his stories which seems to account for their popularity is their intense earnestness. Of literary merit they have very little. There is no attempt to develop character or even to draw a picture of life as it is. It is with life as he conceives it ought to be that Mr. Sheldon is concerned. There is a certain rough effectiveness about some of his more dramatic scenes and a kind of moving pulpit eloquence in passages of declamation. But it is not by being eloquent or dramatic that the pastor of the Central Congregational Church, Topeka, Kansas, wins readers. They are attracted by the simple sincerity with which he tries to put before them his ideal of life as he believes the founder of Christianity would have it lived. Sincerity is not a quality that is easily imitated, and that is why we do not think imitators of Mr. Sheldon are likely to have much success. Of course there is a good deal in these endeavours to remould life nearer to the heart's desire of an earnest and imaginative follower of Christ that must make even the sympathetic reader smile. Cigarette-smoking, for instance, is an offence, in Mr. Sheldon's eyes, even more pernicious than writing sensational stories for newspapers. Card-playing is a snare of the Evil One, and heaven can only be won by teetotallers. Indeed, the editor and proprietor of a daily paper, who figures in "In His Steps," seriously puts it to his assistant whether he can go on printing advertisements of whisky and tobacco, and finally decides to reject them all. But the smile soon dies away as one recognizes the genuineness of the man's pleading. He writes from his heart, and, though his language is commonplace and his method without originality, his earnestness enforces respect. A really great literary artist, with such a burning purpose behind his words, might move the world. St. Francis of Assisi moved it in the thirteenth century by much the same sort of teaching—still more, of course, by practising what he preached in his own person. Whether he knows it or not, Mr. Sheldon is a "brother minor"—at any rate in his writings. In the simplicity of his message, in his devotion to the ideal of the service due from all Christians to their fellows, he is a follower of St. Francis; and he has shown that the Franciscan ideal has not yet lost its marvellous power to move humanity in the mass. It is a consolation to find a series of widely popular stories which has so much to recommend it. Those who really care for literature, as distinct from "something to read," are always likely to be the few. It would be well if the many never read anything of less wholesome tendency, or less stimulating to thought, than these books, which were written to be read in instalments at Sunday evening services in an American church. They may not be to our taste as fiction, but at any rate it is well to recognize the merit they have, and they have certainly shown us in a fresh and striking manner how little we usually appreciate the meaning of the phrase the "reading public."

A few weeks ago we expressed our regret that the usefulness of the British Museum Library was limited, in so many ways, by the lack of funds. The announcement is now made that the Museum trustees have just received a legacy of £50,000 for the "improvement and extension of the library and reading room." The actual extension of the reading room is not, perhaps, urgently required; it is only on an occasional Saturday afternoon that there is any difficulty in getting a desk there. But there are plenty of other ways of spending the windfall usefully. Large as the collection of books is, there are gaps in it which it would be well to fill, and there is plenty of bibliographical work which ought to be carried out without delay. There are vast collections of pamphlets waiting to be classified and catalogued on the same lines as those French Revolutionary tracts of which Mr. Fortescue has just made a list invaluable to students; and there is the great task of subject-indexing the whole library in the way in which the books published during the last fifteen years or so have already been subject-indexed. These are things which, one has often been told, would be done if the money were available. Now that the money has been inherited it may be hoped that they will be put in hand at once.

A further suggestion which occurs to us is that the trustees might perhaps see their way to building private studies, connected with the reading room, which students whose credentials were good enough might be allowed to hire. To many readers the convenience of such an arrangement would be invaluable. It is not merely that they would appreciate the privacy—though, as is well known, it was his passion for privacy that led Carlyle, when writing his “French Revolution,” to leave a good many rare and important works unconsulted because he was not allowed to take them home with him. It would also be a great saving of labour to many readers to be able to use a typewriter when documents had to be copied, and to dictate memoranda to a private secretary without being called to order by an attendant. There may be obstacles to this proposal of which we are not aware, but we believe that it would produce an adequate return upon the capital invested.

The particulars of the early life and “beginnings” of MM. Erckmann and Chatrian which M. Jules Claretie has recently published in the Temps are extremely interesting, but they are also exceedingly tantalizing. They serve principally to whet a curiosity which they are insufficient to satisfy. It is of the long career of conjoint industry, the union of consentient effort, for years so exceptionally close and complete, and at the last so tragically broken—it is of this, of course, that one is anxious to know the history, and not, or only in a very minor degree, of the accident of its commencement. For an accident of course it was; no combination so felicitous was ever deliberately devised. To have arranged it beforehand would have been to insure its failure.

One would have guessed, without the help of M. Claretie's information, that the two lads came to Paris without any idea of working in “double harness,” and that it was the mere chance of Chatrian's signing his first production with his comrade's Teutonic name as being likely to make it more acceptable to the then Parisian public—a fact which pretty plainly indicates their period—that brought them into permanent collaboration with each other. A happier marriage, judged by its fruitfulness and the health, strength, and attractiveness of its offspring, was never contracted. Community of interest alone may have done much to strengthen the bond between the couple; a cynic, perhaps, may say that it did—and in these cases always does—everything, and that when two artistic hearts are found beating as one for many years together, it merely means that the owners of the two hearts do not see their way to destroying so valuable an asset as their joint popularity, and having each to build up anew a separate reputation for himself.

But here, as usual, cynicism a little overshoots its mark; for, after all, this explanation carries with it the more pleasing corollary that each of the two partners must have been creditably free from that vanity and jealousy of the artist which might have induced either of them to think that he was, in fact, “the firm” in his own person, and was in reality quite independent of a coadjutor who, on the other hand, was entirely dependent upon him. Why this “fair companionship” was at last broken up—to the remorse, it is said, of the partner who survived the disruption the longer of the two—is just one of those things that, from a worthier motive than that of mere idle curiosity, one may excusably wish to know. In fact, the complete story of this most famous of literary partnerships ought certainly to be told. For unity, amity, and duration it has had only one parallel among ourselves; and that was a collaboration between two journalists whose artistic susceptibilities had been scored out by life-long application of the “blue pencil,” and who belonged to a profession of compromise.

No doubt it assists to cement the union of hearts across the Atlantic to remember that we are all “subjects of King Shakespeare.” But in a democratic age some kind of equality should be maintained in the kingdom, and all the good things should not go to one class of its subjects. The rapidity with which First Folios and other Shakespearians are being absorbed by America is becoming really serious, and it is all the more urgent because it so easily escapes public notice. Mr. Sidney Lee raises the alarm once more in the Cornhill, and we sincerely hope that private owners, auctioneers, and, last but not least, the Government may realize the gravity of the case.

Mr. Quaritch confesses that “Perfect copies are usually sold by us dealers to American collectors. They thus get scarcer and dearer every year.” One unique copy went over the Atlantic in 1897. Another, known to be in England recently, has gone, and is supposed also to have found its way across the sea. The whole Shakespearian collection of Mr. Halliwell Phillips, who spent a large fortune and a long life in acquiring it, is now in Providence, Rhode Island, U.S.A. Shakespeare's birth-place has not, it is true, yet been transported bodily to America, though we fancy the removal has been seriously suggested, but as time goes on we shall without a doubt gradually lose all material memorials of him except those which are already safely housed in public libraries.

Unfortunately, it is not a matter of patriotism or conscience, but simply of pounds, shillings, and pence. The private collection of which the merits were extolled so warmly by Lord Crawford a little while ago is valueless as a permanent national possession. At any moment it may fall into the hands of an owner who regards it purely as an asset, and the Court of Chancery, if its leave has to be obtained, may take the same view. The auctioneer can hardly be expected to be patriotic; and the Treasury itself, even if it be in a generous mood, is not all-powerful against millionaires who are individually within a measurable distance of being able to buy up the national debt. Moreover, American buyers form a much larger class than English. Apart from the pure ardour of the Bibliophile, the desire to establish links with the past, the love of historical relics and associations, especially of a material kind, acts much more widely in America than in England. Something should surely be done by the Government in this matter to save for the country the treasures it still possesses.

England in the Age of Wycliffe. By George Macaulay Trevelyan, Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge. 9×5½ in., xiv.+380 pp. London, 1899.

Longmans. 15/-

The first book of a writer who bears two names honoured in the world of letters will be gladly accorded a friendly welcome, and there will be few students of English literature who will not hope that the promise of this volume may ripen into work still more worthy of the stock. Mr. Trevelyan has set himself the task of describing English life, and telling the tale of English history in Church and our national life sank into sloth to the brief years of glory that followed. But there is little that can be read of Englishmen but a feeling of shame. It is in literature that we have left names worthy to be honoured, and it is from this source that we draw the darkest and the truest times. Chaucer, Langland, Wycliffe, are names that must needs be noteworthy as long as English literature survives, and it is round them that the main interest of Mr. Trevelyan's painstaking investigation hangs. Chaucer and Langland give him vivid illustrations of the life, sordid and pitiful, that he presents. Wycliffe is the centre of his work.

Two parts of this book strike us as being of special interest. First, we have a singularly vigorous, lucid, and complete picture of the Peasants' Rebellion of 1381. While we doubt if Mr. Trevelyan has laid sufficient stress on the communistic influences that influenced the leaders of the revolt, or on their connexion with an ill-understood propaganda of Wycliffism, we cannot doubt that he has given us by far the best account of the Rising of "hurling-time" that exists. In support of this is the core of the book. All the social history of the time springs from it or leads to it. We cannot praise too highly the patience of investigation, or the clearness of presentation, which have given us this record, so complete, so judicious, and so interesting, of the most important social revolution in our history. This part of the book, whatever may be the fate of the rest, must survive; and indeed, we are inclined to wish that Mr. Trevelyan had made it the basis of a single work which should deal solely with the Rising, its causes and its results.

The second main subject—perhaps, in its author's eyes, the most important—in Mr. Trevelyan's book is Wycliffism. We say the movement, rather than the man who gave it its name, because it seems to us that in such a passage as the following Mr. Trevelyan expresses the importance which it has in his eyes, and which has induced him to select the early years of the movement for special study.

Lollardry [he says] was but one of the many channels along which flowed the tide of lay revolt. Chaucer, Langland, Gower, John of Gaunt, the rebels of 1381, the townsmen rioting against monasteries, the Parliament men who demanded the confiscation of church property, those who would not do penance, those who refused to appear in the church Courts, those who would not pay tithe, were all striving in the same direction. Lollardry offered a new religious basis to all. Under Henry the Eighth all these forces rose together and swept away the medieval system. The King did it, the nobles took the spoils, but the nation reaped the advantage. The Northern counties, which had not shared in Lollardry or in any of the kindred movements, rose to protest in the Pilgrimage of Grace; but the South of England, which then meant the strength of England, stood by the King. In the reign of Richard the Second many laymen had thought the existing power, property, and privileges of the Church to be an evil, but a sacred evil. The Lollards asserted that ecclesiastical evils were not necessarily sacred. The triumph of that view was the downfall of the governing Church, and it preceded by thirty years the Elizabethan adjustment of doctrine and ritual.

It is this thesis which is elaborated in the three hundred and fifty pages of a very sober and complete investigation. Mr. Trevelyan shows how widespread was the effect of Wycliffe's teaching, and he traces the scanty signs of its permanence—here, as we think, greatly exaggerating the importance of the few cases of sporadic survival. He clearly throws himself on the side of those who regard the English Reformation as inevitable—as a great lay movement—as due only very indirectly to Henry VIII.'s weariness of Catherine, and to what Bishop Stubbs calls "the Evangelical obliquity of Anne Bullen's eyes."

All Mr. Trevelyan's work is very careful and conscientious, if a little lacking in vitality. It is rarely that he allows himself a grim humour, as when he says of William Smith, of Leicester—"he is a most interesting person, and it is a pity that he had not the crowning courage to endure martyrdom." It is rarely that he shows himself unacquainted with the language or methods of the time he writes about, as he seems to do when he remarks upon a document in which one William Dynot declares that he will "worship images," that the question before him "to simple minds may appear no other than this—whether to practise or not to practise idolatry"—surely a strangely narrow construction of the word "worship," unless every one married to-day by the Church of England "promises to practise idolatry." It is rarely that he wanders into error outside his own subject, as where he says that "in the early Church the monk and the parish priest were the only religious influences"; or into exaggerations, as where he asserts that the friars "even gave out that any man or woman who put on a friar's dress at the hour of death could not be damned"; or that he has failed to observe the importance of the facts he has laboriously illustrated, as he appears to do when he lays so little stress on the fact that Wycliffe's only political support came from John of Gaunt and Percy. On the whole, he most commendably avoids the fault of over emphasis, the besetting sin of young historical writers. He tells his tale very fully, and very quietly and soberly.

Mr. Trevelyan's book, then, is one of promise. If it lacks genius, vivacity, power, and can hardly be considered of direct originality, whether in conception or treatment, it is a thoroughly sound and creditable performance. Its examination of Wycliffe's work and influence is most praiseworthy for persistence and patience. Its account of the social history, culminating in rebellion, is really a first-rate piece of investigation and description.

The reader is much helped by three excellent maps.

Tennyson: A Critical Study. By Stephen Gwynn. 7½ x 5½ in., viii. + 234 pp. London, 1899. Blackie. 2/6

This is the second of the purely literary contributions to the "Victorian Era Series," Mr. George Gissing's excellent monograph on Charles Dickens having been the first. In his "Critical Study" of Tennyson, Mr. Stephen Gwynn has had in one sense a more difficult, because a more obvious, task to perform. Dickens is still—and will doubtless always remain, nay, deserves to remain—a name of contention. The battle of Realist and Idealist, of farce against comedy, of sentimentalism versus self-repression, will for ever probably be fought over his urn, and new aspects of the conflict, new weapons for the waging of it, will be for ever presenting themselves. But there is certainly some ground for Mr. Gwynn's plaintive lament in his preface, that it seems to him "impossible to say anything that is at once new and true about Tennyson." Of course the impossibility is not absolute; and, moreover, the thing which is not "at once new and true" is always worth saying again by any one who can put it with more convincing force and greater freshness of form than have been given to it before. Indeed, to do this is in effect to add to both its characteristic qualities; it becomes new again with a true newness, and true with a new truth. Naturally it is not given to many critics to achieve this, or even to him who can achieve it to perform the feat very often. Mr. Gwynn, for instance, has found it beyond his power of accomplishment in the chapter in which he deals with "Tennyson's Views on Religion." No side of the poet's genius has been more frequently discussed than this; it interests thousands of British minds to which poetry and even literature in general say nothing; and the beaten track over which the critic has now to pass is so very much beaten, trodden everywhere, in fact, into so dusty a footpath, that to find a single green blade of novelty by the wayside would be little short of a miracle.

The poet's "political opinions," again, the history of which had really little to do with his genius, but is simply that of the views of the average English Liberal who so glowed with enthusiasm for "progress" in the fifties, and so mourned over his disillusion in the eighties, form a subject hardly possible to illuminate by original remark. Mr. Gwynn has a fairer opportunity when he comes to the strictly literary part of his subject. "Tennyson's Outlook upon Nature" is dealt with in a very interesting chapter, and is ably and appreciatively discussed. What is especially well brought out is the rare, if not unique, concurrence in the poet's nature-pictures of the faculty of minute observation and exquisite workmanship with that free and noble breadth of handling "which suggests whole landscapes in a few touches." Who would suppose that this gem-like picture of the dragon-fly—

An inner impulse rent the veil
Of his old husk; from head to tail
Came out clear plates of sapphire mail.

He dried his wings; like gauze they grew,
Thro' croft and pasture wet with dew,
A living flash of light he flew.

and this stormy sunset "after Ruysdael"—

To-night the wind began to rise
And roar from yonder dropping day;
The last red leaf is whirled away,
The rooks are blown about the skies.

The forest crack'd, the waters curl'd,
The cattle huddled on the lea,
And wildly dashed on tower and tree,
The sunbeam strikes along the world—are from the same hand? We have had, and perhaps have, poets who could have done either to equal or almost equal perfection. But where is the living poet who could have done both?

On the Idylls—next to "In Memoriam" the most hackneyed subject of the commentator—Mr. Gwynn has much that is interesting to say. The contrast between Tennyson's and Malory's treatment of the Arthurian legend is, of course, a commonplace of criticism; but its salient points are here exhibited with a skill and an impartiality which have not been brought to bear by some previous critics upon the task—though it was perhaps an error on the side of excessive conscientiousness to devote some two-and-twenty pages to a verbatim reproduction from Malory of the "Story of Elaine" in order to show how differently it has been handled by the medieval chronicler and the modern poet. Of the shorter Poems, Mr. Gwynn writes with what appears to us to be sound discrimination. He is perhaps just a little too enthusiastic over "Ulysses," which, though undoubtedly in the first class, is hardly such a "good first," in the language of the Oxford Schools, as more than one other poem less effusively extolled in this volume. Of "Maud," which has never yet received its due from the English public—even if from English criticism—we are glad to see that its latest critic is an ardent admirer; and he is to be commended for his spirited attempt to rescue the fine and unjustly depreciated "Funeral Ode to the Duke of Wellington" from the neglect which, from the very day of its publication, has been its lot. With regard to the former poem we have to condole with Mr. Gwynn—unless negligent proof-correction disentitles him to condolence—on the dreadful substitution of "quiet" for "grief" in the touching stanza:—

Oh! that 'twere possible
After long grief and pain, &c.

"Where do the words come from? we ask ourselves over lines like these," remarks the author all unconsciously. The answer is, of course, that the first six and the last two words come from "Maud," and the seventh, the word "quiet," from the brain of the demon compositor. Mr. Gwynn, however, may console himself; there are those who have suffered worse things than this. It has not befallen him to have the word "lonely" appear as "lovely" in the surpassingly beautiful line from "To Virgil":—

All the charm of all the Muses often flowering in a lonely word.
Yet this disaster once actually happened, and the victim of it still lives.

Mr. Gwynn's admiration of his poet ends well this side of fanaticism, and of some of the most favourite productions of Tennyson's middle period he can speak with refreshing plainness. As thus:—

The Miller's Daughter every one will allow to be charming; I cannot allow it to be more. Lady Clara Vere de Vere and the Lord of Burleigh plainly belong to the epoch of John Leech's ringleted young ladies; they are early Victorian with a vengeance, and to my mind perfectly intolerable. Worse still is the May Queen, which is throughout in a false key of pathos. Yet these three poems were perhaps more widely popular than any of his other work; they appealed to the public which now reads Tit-Bits. A later poem, the Children's Hospital, had the good fortune to be less read, but was very unworthy of its author.

Strongly expressed as these judgments are, we imagine that there will not be much dissent from them among competent writers of to-day. On some of the greater poems Mr. Gwynn's pronouncements are not so likely to pass unchallenged. His preference, for instance, of "The Vision of Sin" to the "Two Voices" as "by far the more interesting" of the pair, will probably divide opinion; as assuredly will the dictum that "Lucretius"—which, by the way, Mr. Gwynn elsewhere speaks of as "among Tennyson's finest poems"—cannot be ranked "among the masterpieces." It may not, perhaps, deserve to be rated, as Professor Jebb is said to have rated it, "above all the poet's other work," but for the combination of tragic power, dignity of utterance and philosophic depth, it assuredly stands very near the place thus assigned to it. Most people, again, will find a strong touch of the fanciful, no doubt, in the comparison of "St. Simeon Stylites" to Browning's Cardinal ordering his tomb in St. Praxed's; as also in the further statement that this poem "marks strongly enough Tennyson's dislike to all the extravagances of asceticism." To make up, however, for his general undervaluation of the "Lucretius," Mr. Gwynn incidentally gives its author too much and his subject too little credit in one passage. For though it is true enough to say of the lines beginning

The gods who haunt
The lucid interspace of world and world,
Where never creeps a cloud or moves a wind, &c., that they "rival Lucretius in his own stately beauty," it would have been only fair to the Latin poet to add that three of the best of them are merely a close paraphrase of the noble description of the sedes quietæ Divûm in the "De Rerum Naturâ," iii., 18-22.

"Style" and "metre" are always contentious subjects, whoever treats of them; and, though Mr. Gwynn discusses them acutely and informingly, many of his theories will, we suspect, be far from commanding general assent. The history of the "In Memoriam" metre as here given is a curious one; but it is perhaps a little too much so for the requirements of the case. We have Tennyson's own specific averment that he did not borrow the measure from Lord Herbert of Cherbury, whom until 1880 he did not know to have ever used it; and the pages which Mr. Gwynn devotes to the question whether he may not have met with the poem of one P. L. Courtier, published forty odd years before, and have imitated it by a sort of process of unconscious cerebration, are surely a little superfluous in the face of Tennyson's own simpler account of the matter. "I believed myself the originator of the metre until 'In Memoriam' came out, when some one told me that Ben Jonson and Sir Philip Sidney had used it." Thus we have no fewer than three forerunners of the author of "In Memoriam," each one of whom may well have arrived at it quite independently; and it would surely be nothing wonderful if so obvious a variation of the ordinary octosyllabic quatrain—suggested, too, as is its a, b, b, a rhyme-scheme by the well known structure of the first four lines of the sonnet—had suggested itself to a metrist of ability far inferior to Tennyson. Again, Mr. Gwynn, who is somewhat too much impressed by similarities of rhyme arrangement and too little by dissimilarities of metre, suggests that the exquisitely modulated "Daisy"—which, by the way, differs sensibly in the cadence of its fourth line, though Mr. Gwynn treats the measures as identical, from the lines to F. D. Maurice—"almost certainly came from FitzGerald's" famous version of "Omar Khayyám." We incline to think that chronology refutes this theory—"The Daisy" is of 1854; the first edition of the Rubāiyāt of 1859—and it derives no countenance from the poet himself, who regarded it as entirely his own invention, and described it as "a far off echo of the Horatian Alcaic." And to come to our last piece of fault-finding with a volume of able and interesting, if here and there somewhat fanciful, criticism, we must, though with unfeigned regret, remind Mr. Gwynn that a certain line of what he calls "magical suggestion" derives its supposed magic from persistent mistranslation. We should all like to believe that lacrimæ rerum meant anything so pretty as "the sense of tears in mortal things"; but the stern truth is that it does not, and from its context cannot, mean anything of the kind.

AN IMPARTIAL HISTORIAN.

History of Scotland. Vol. I. By P. Hume Brown, LL.D. 5½ × 3 in., 401 pp. Cambridge, 1899. University Press. 6/-

Mr. Hume Brown may not be the Gwen, but he is certainly the Hallam, among Scottish historians. His elaborate monographs on George Buchanan and John Knox demonstrated that he could, when occasion demanded, divest himself of that not unamiable prejudice to which Mr. Spencer would give the name of the "patriotic bias," and which is probably stronger in a Scotsman than in the member of any other nationality. His new work—the first of two volumes constituting a history of Scotland which he has contributed to the Cambridge Historical Series, edited by Professor Prothero—shows that he can exhibit the same impartiality when telling the story of a country and not of a person. In 400 pages he covers the first fifteen centuries of Scottish history which terminate with the disaster of Solway Moss and the death of James V. He is clearly on the side of his countrymen in their struggles with England, accepting the popular conception of Wallace as an absolutely single-minded patriot, describing Bruce as "the greatest king that ever sat upon the Scottish throne," and declaring of Edward I. that he Found two nations which had for a full century been involved in no serious quarrel, and by the time he had done his work had evoked international antagonisms which bore immediate fruit in incessant wars that lasted for two centuries and a half, and which can never be wholly effaced from the memories of the two peoples.

At the same time Mr. Hume Brown declines to reproduce the myths that have grown up round the exploits and the memories of the leading patriots; he accepts narratives such as those contained in the Exchequer Rolls and the Acts of the Scots Parliament and exploited by him for the first time, in preference to the legends of poets like Blind Harry; and even when he comes to treat of authentic achievements like the Battle of Bannockburn, he is so cautious as to admit that the "position and arrangements of the Scottish army must remain matter of dispute." This impartiality, associated as it is with austere and almost remorseless accuracy, stands Mr. Hume Brown in good stead when he follows in the steps of such of his predecessors as Skene and Hill Burton. Taking advantage of the light shed on the early history of Scotland by recent research he follows Skene in rejecting to a large extent Burton's treatment of the centuries that immediately succeeded the Roman occupation, while, following Skene's own most damaging critics, he has substantially rejected that too erudite writer's view of the Roman occupation itself. Certainly Mr. Brown's reconstruction of the earlier history of Scotland—the history, that is to say, of the period which preceded the entrance of Scotland into the society of essentially Teutonic States—was something more than a mere series of "battles of kites and crows." Scotland appears in these pages as having been, previous to the War of Independence, a fully equipped State even as compared with England; indeed, while

It has been constantly said that through their long struggle with England the Scots were fashioned into national unity, it would be nearer the truth to say that had not Scotland been a nation before it must have inevitably gone to pieces in the ordeal through which it had passed.

In one sense Mr. Hume Brown is the least patriotic of historians; in another he is the most patriotic. There is no fervour in his writing; occasionally, indeed, one sighs for a little of the fire that gave John Richard Green the hold he still retains on the English middle-class mind. While he is, as has been seen, just to the men who if they did not make Scotland certainly saved it, such as Wallace, Moray, Randolph and Bruce, and Douglas, he does not go into ecstasies over their achievements. On the other hand, he proves that the history of the country even after the War of Independence was, in spite of all that Burton and his imitators have said, one of wonderfully steady progress. Mr. Brown is the reverse of a romantic Jacobite; but in his pages the earlier Stuart Kings fare much better than they do in most Scottish historical works. Thus of the five Jameses, with the death of the last of whom this volume closes, not one can be said to have been quite incapable, although the deaths of all were tragic. James the Third was the weakest of the five, but even he had the wisdom to see in a dim sort of way that, in fighting against the Scottish nobles, he was really doing his best for his people, although he was also doing his worst for himself. Under happier circumstances James the Fourth and his son would have made model knights. As a matter of fact, James the First was the best King Scotland had after Robert Bruce, and it is now evident that James the Second would have carried on his father's work with an ability equal to that father's, had not his career been cut short by the explosion of a cannon at a Border siege. Meanwhile, in spite of blunders in statesmanship and military tactics, in spite of the protracted struggle between Kings and nobility—

There was a steady expansion of the people along every line of social progress. In the fifteenth century three of the four Scottish Universities were founded; a succession of poets testify to the existence of an educated opinion; numerous Acts of Parliament, as well as other records, prove that there was a prosperous burgher class both north and south of the Forth; and we have the testimony of foreigners to the fact that the country was largely under cultivation, and that the peasant class of Scotland lived on better terms than their fellows elsewhere.

In spite—to some extent even because—of its sobriety of style, Mr. Hume Brown's work conduces to the dignity of Scottish history. This is largely due to the industry which he has exhibited—an industry which is but imperfectly indicated in the too few foot-notes in which he gives some of the sources of his information—in following up recent historical investigations and extracting from them their true sociological value.

In Mr. Hume Brown's hands, the history of Scotland seems for the first time an intelligible whole, not a series of unconnected episodes.

THE GENTLE JAPANESE.

A Diplomatist's Wife in Japan. By Mrs. Hugh Fraser. 2 vols. 10 x 6 1/2 in., xviii. + 446 + x. + 439 pp. London, Hutchinson. 32/- 1899.

It was in April, 1889, that, with her husband, who had just been appointed British Minister at Tokyo, Mrs. Hugh Fraser landed in Japan, and in the first of this series of delightful letters written "from home to home" announced that her friendship with the country had already begun. That friendship endured and grew from day to day, until Mrs. Fraser's residence in Japan was cut abruptly short by her husband's premature death in 1894. At that period Japan had not yet made good her position amongst the great Powers of the world. Indeed, there was still a general inclination in Europe to regard her, like some of the delicate fabrics of her own art, as a graceful plaything among nations, which would never stand the rough usage and hard knocks of the modern "struggle for existence." With a quickness of sympathy and depth of intuition which were then too often lamentably absent in our relations with the Japanese, Mrs. Fraser at once gauged "the many-sided and complex character of the people, simple to frankness, yet full of unexpected reserves, of hidden strengths and dignities, of power never flaunted before the eyes of the world." The picture, or rather the series of varied and graphic pictures, she draws of them may be, perhaps, slightly coloured by her unaffected enthusiasm, but she does not claim to have done more than transcribe what she actually saw and learnt, and, as becomes a refined and high-thinking woman, she preferred to see and learn only the best, or at least to put the best construction upon whatever was less good. Perhaps the passages she devotes to the position of women in Japanese society furnish the best illustration of this sympathetic insight into the true inwardness of forms of domestic life which, on the surface, are apt to appear so alien and repugnant to our own.

The Japanese girl! She is a creature of so many attractive contradictions, with her warm heart, her quick brain, and her terribly narrow experience; with her submissions and self-effacements which have become second nature, and her brave revolts when first nature takes the upper hand again and courage is too strong for custom—perhaps it is too soon yet for me to speak of her to any purpose, and yet I want to tell you how deeply she interests me, how I believe in her, and hope for her in the new developments which the next few years will bring forth. The books I have read on Japan have always had a great deal to say about the musumé, the pretty, plebeian tea-house girl, or the geisha, the artist, the dancer, the witty, brilliant hetaira of Japan. I suppose these are about as unrepresentative of the normal Japanese woman as a music-hall singer would be of the European sister of charity. That they are very much less objectionable than the corresponding classes at home is doubtless due to the innate refinement of the Japanese woman; but what a gulf is set between them and the girls of whom I would speak—girls surrounded with punctilious care, and brought up with one inflexible standard always kept before their eyes, the whole law of Duty! Inclination may never govern their conduct after they have arrived at years of reason, early reached in Japan; and if they are the brightest children, the most faithful wives, the most devoted mothers, always serene, industrious, smiling, it surely is because Duty is justified of her children.

I think that the simple unfettered life led by the little children here gives the girls a happy foundation to start on, as it were. There is no scolding and punishing, no nursery disgrace, no shutting away of the little ones day after day in dull nurseries with selfish, half-educated women, whose mere daily society means torture to a sensitive, well-born child. Here, children are always welcome; they come and go as they like, are spoilt, if love means spoiling, by father and mother, relations and servants; but they grow imperceptibly in the right shape; they mould their thoughts and expressions on those of the sovereigns of the home; and one day, without wrench or effort, the little girl is grown into a thoughtful, helpful woman, bent on following the examples of good women gone before her. Very gently but persistently one lesson has been preached to her ever since language meant anything in her ears:—"Give up, love, help others, efface thyself"; and in the still atmosphere of the home with its ever-repeated round of necessary and unpraised duties, in that quiet sunshine of humility, high motives grow and are not pulled up by the roots to be shown to admiring friends, the young heart waxes strong and pure, and should the call to heroic sacrifice sound, a noble woman springs forward to answer it; should it never ring in her ears the world is none the poorer, for a true, sweet woman is passing through it, smiling at every duty that meets her on her unnoticed way, leaving a train of gentle, wholesome memories behind her when the journey ends. In real womanliness, which I take to mean a high combination of sense and sweetness, valour and humility, the Japanese lady ranks with any woman in the world, and passes before most of them.

Another chapter which should be read by all those who would understand the mainsprings of action in a people which combines in the most remarkable degree the opposite extremes of romantic sentimentality and 'practical materialism is that in which Mrs. Fraser describes the wave of remorseful grief and horror which swept over the whole nation after the murderous attack made on the Cesarevitch (the present Tsar) during his tour in Japan. High and low, rich and poor, felt impelled to make some individual act of atonement for the act of a fanatic who had outraged the honour of his country in the person of its illustrious guest.

People who were on board the Cesarevitch's ship told me that it seemed like to sink with gifts: the decks, the saloons, the passages, were encumbered, and still they came and came! The universality and spontaneousness of the manifestation gave it an overwhelming value, which the Prince here and his parents at home were quick to appreciate. Rich people gave out of their riches, and objects of unexampled beauty and rarity were brought out from the treasure-houses and sent with messages of love and respect to the boy who lay healing of his wound in Kobe Harbour. The poor sent the most touching gifts—the rice and shoyu, the fish and barley-flour, which would have fed the little family for a year; poor old peasants walked for days so as to bring a tiny offering of eggs. The merchants sent silks and porcelain, lacquer and bronze, crapes and ivory, according to their merchandise; telegrams poured in, expressing intense sympathy, and more intense indignation at the outrage. In the first twenty-four hours after the occurrence, so many thousands of these were sent that it was almost impossible to deliver them; twenty thousand persons called during the first two days at the hotel in Kyoto where the Prince lay before he was removed to his vessel; every corporation and community, town and village and guild sent either a deputation to carry its condolences or a letter to express them; and many who could ill afford the outlay telegraphed messages of sympathy to the Tsar and Tsarina in St. Petersburg, and always added a protest of horror at the wicked deed.

A little samurai girl, a mere child of sixteen, I think, was in service near Yokohama. She travelled to Kyoto, dressed herself in her holiday robes, composed her poor little body for death by tying her sash tightly round her knees after the custom of samurai women, and cut her throat in the doorway of the great Government offices. They found on her two letters; one a farewell to her family, the other containing a message, which she begged those who found her to convey to the Emperor, saying that she gave her life gladly, hoping that though so lowly it might wipe out the insult, and she entreated him to be comforted by her death. Her name, they say, was Yuko, which means full of valour.

These quotations are by no means exceptional specimens of Mrs. Fraser's finished workmanship. Every one of her letters is a valuable contribution to our knowledge of the Japanese, and to the latter, as well as to her English readers, she has done good service by publishing them at a time when a growing community of interests seems destined to draw more closely together the two island empires of the West and of the East. The illustrations, whether original photographs taken by the writer during her travels or reproductions of Japanese art, are as fascinating as the letterpress, and that is no slight praise.

THE ART WORLD, OLD AND NEW.

Fragments of an Autobiography. By Felix Moscheles. 9×6in., 304 pp. London, 1899. Nisbet. 10/6

To be brought up in the society of musicians and afterwards to become a portrait painter entitles a man to write at least two autobiographies. That Mr. Felix Moscheles should even contemplate a third will be no source of regret to the reader of "With Du Maurier in Bohemia," and of the pleasant book of reminiscences now before us. Before his easel celebrities as different as plain-spoken President Cleveland and the poet Browning have unbosomed themselves of copy. Mendelssohn himself—his father's closest friend—gave him his own well-merited name—Felix. He also drew for the child a picture portraying the orchestra which was to play him through life—the trumpets to sound his fame, the flutes for his love, the cymbals to herald the arrival of his beard, and the big drum in the background to frighten away assailants. No wonder that "the golden thread of great fun" running through Mendelssohn's life should have impressed his godson, for his joyousness and the way in which "his emotions ever rise to the surface" still help to bring the first ray of sunshine across the keys of most schoolroom pianos.

Mr. Moscheles' reminiscences date back to the early Victorian era, and afford many interesting illustrations of the old and the new both in music and in painting. He became acquainted with Rossini just about the time when the new school of pianoforte playing, inaugurated by Liszt, and the rising influence of Wagner upon the management of the voice were beginning to undermine the old traditions dear to the Italian maestro.

How they maltreat the piano [says Rossini]. Ils enfoncent non seulement le piano, mais encore le fauteuil et même le plancher ! . . . I don't want to hear any more of their screaming. I want a resonant voice, full-toned, not screeching. I care not whether it be for speaking or singing, everything ought to sound melodious.

Mr. Moscheles' own reflection on the change which he has witnessed in musical ideas is worth quoting. Madame Viardot is playing to Wagner from a MS. score of Tristan and Isolde :—

"N'est-ce pas, Matame," he said, carried away by the grandeur of his own creation, "n'est-ce pas, Matame, que c'est supprime ?" . . . Close at hand stood a casket in which a treasure was preserved, the original score of Don Giovanni. No wonder I was fully impressed by the situation, actually in touch as I felt myself with the master of the past and the master of the present. If what I was listening to was well named the Music of the Future, might not the score enshrined in that casket be called the Music of Eternity ?

But Mr. Moscheles recalls the personality as well as the opinions of Rossini ; many instances of his good nature and one excellent example of his wit. Meyerbeer, his rival in Paris, meets him and a friend upon the boulevards.

"And how is your health, my dear Maestro ?" asks Meyerbeer.

"Shaky, cher maître, very shaky. My digestion, you know, my poor head. Alas ! I'm afraid I am going down hill."

They pass on. "How could you tell such stories ?" asks a friend ; "you were never in better health and you talk of going down hill ?"

"Ah, well," answered Rossini, "to be sure—but why shouldn't I put it that way ? It gives him so much pleasure."

Rossini was fond of joking about his health. Mr. Moscheles may remember the story of his remark at a funeral :—"My friend, I feel that this is the last time that I shall attend a funeral as an amateur." But Rossini's wit was hardly equal to that of Dumas, of whom we are told the following story :—

Crémieux, the eminent lawyer . . . had the reputation of being the plainest man in France, a sort of missing link. A story is told of him and Alexandre Dumas. The great novelist (Dumas) was unmistakably of the mulatto type, and Crémieux . . . indiscreetly questioned him as to his descent. "Was your father a mulatto ?" he asked. "Yes," answered Dumas, "my father was a mulatto, my grandfather a negro, and my great grandfather a monkey ; my family began where yours ends."

Turning to the studio we find here a corresponding alteration in the ideals of artists going on before Mr. Moscheles' eyes, as striking as the change from Italian to German views in music. We are introduced to artists still under the sway of the classic school of David and his pupils Ingres and Flandrin, and, to what is equally reminiscent of the part, a young lady who was actually ashamed of her red hair. Mr. Moscheles' chapter on Dupont gives us a sincere picture of the Paris of the forties, and of the true Bohemian life. Rosa Bonheur Sinel, the jealous model, might well be a character out of Murger. The artist's descriptions of the parents of some of his models are full of characterization ; of Madame Tusserand, for example, who insists that no part of the thumb of either of her daughters should be concealed :—

"Allez-y franchement ; you just draw them as they are, hands and feet and all, comme qui dirait (there they are those two girls, les fillettes à la mère Tusserand)."

The author has evidently enjoyed to the full the exceptional opportunity an artist has of studying the characters in the byways of a large city.

The Parisian [he says] has an ever varying way of asking you to take his likeness. "Tirez ma binette," "Fixez moi cette frimousse," or "Relevez moi le plan de mon image," are amongst those I recollect. "Draw my mug," we might say, although translation does not go far to render that sort of colloquialism. "Fix my phiz," and "Just you give me the map of my image."

Mr. Moscheles' "fragments" do not tell us anything of his experiences as Chairman of the International Arbitration and Peace Association, which we notice are in "Who's Who" classed among his "recreations." But as they stand they make, though a trifle desultory, excellent reading, if only on account of the geniality with which the author brings them together. He is cheerful in speaking of the most gloomy situations. When, after a stormy voyage to America, during which his autobiographic eye never wavers, he is deprived of his liberty by the interviewers, his only reflection is, "What a splendid institution this interviewing is !"

A BRITISH OFFICIAL IN UGANDA.

Under the African Sun. By W. J. Ansorge, M.A., LL.D., Medical Officer to Her Majesty's Government in Uganda. 10½×6½in., 355 pp. Illustrated. London, 1899. Heinemann. 21/- n.

The author of this volume remarks upon the indescribable fascination in African travel and adventure which draws men again and again to the Dark Continent and in the end, only too often, makes of its votaries victims. The same attraction extends itself to much of the writings upon the subject. Even where the literary form of the work cannot be admitted to be wholly felicitous, the interest attaching to the contents remains unimpaired. In the present instance the compiler has made a levée en masse of his notes without much attention to marshalling his forces. There is neither index nor map. It is true some approach to broad classification is given in the titles of the chapters, but the paragraphs of which the latter are composed are thrown together indiscriminately after the manner of ingredients for the camp kettle at the end of a tiring day's march. To give a casual specimen of the style :—

Amongst the Falua neither men nor boys go uncovered. The Falua spear has a very small but sharp spearhead. The villages lie quite unprotected ; they seem to be well stocked with sheep, goats, and poultry. Spiral coils of brass wire were worn by the wealthier ladies, and ornaments of beads by the poorer class. A curious cornbin is manufactured by the villagers.

However, if the cooking be rough, the fare is plentiful. Six journeys between Uganda and the coast, with a residence of nearly a year in remote Unyoro, enabled the writer to acquire a wide knowledge of the country, while his official and professional position furnished exceptional opportunities for close observation of the native races. We therefore have no hesitation in paying tribute to the variety of his information. When to this is added the value of his list of collections, ornithological, lepidopteral, and mammalian, with expert descriptions appended by Mr. Ernst Hartert, the Hon. Walter Rothschild, and Mr. W. E. de Winton, F.Z.S., it will be seen that the book engages the specialist no less than the general reader. To Dr. Ansonge belongs the distinction of adding several sp. nov. to each of the above branches, some of which are carefully depicted in coloured plates.

Incidentally a good deal is to be gleaned from these pages concerning Uganda, its people, and products. The Waganda exhibit marked feudal instincts in their method of government. To the same force is traced much of their spontaneity in adopting Christian forms of religion. As to the capabilities of the territory, "hitherto neither gold, nor coal, nor any other mineral resources have been discovered." Arab traders tell of a land of gold, lying far beyond Lake Rudolf, warded by wastes of foodless solitude. But this is as mythical as Raleigh's El Dorado. Less speculative minds will find more incentive in cotton, sugar, and ivory. To protect the elephant from extermination the British Government has already defined a large area as sanctuary; other game and forest laws will doubtless follow. The Uganda Protectorate has even now such vague acceptance in the public mind, and comprises so many adjacent districts, that few apprehend how near we came to losing our ascendancy for a time during the recent mutiny of the Sudanese garrison. When Sir Charles Dilke lately stigmatized the representatives of the Government in the Protectorate as "odds and ends of administrators picked up anyhow" he excepted the British officers by whose energy the situation had alone "been saved from absolute disaster." We do not know if Dr. Ansonge will feel himself included in the former stricture or the latter encomium. He might claim to belong to both categories. For four-and-a-half months we find him Acting Commissioner at Kampala, single-handed, combining administrative, military, and medical duties; and during the subsequent rebellion he appears as instrumental in keeping disaffection at bay in Unyoro by his personal influence and actively exerting himself for the maintenance of our authority. In this emergency his life was repeatedly in jeopardy. There were other occasions, too, when risks, though of another sort, had to be encountered, and their recital constitutes some of the best portions of his book. It is as a shikari in pursuit of lions, elephants, rhinoceros, hippo, and smaller game that his sporting and naturalist proclivities find scope in adventurous narrative. There is a stirring account of the death of the "maneater," which, by the way, as represented in the frontispiece, seems not to have thriven largely upon its irregular diet. The illustration of the text is throughout lavish and faithful. When Africa shall in process of years have merged its barbarism in civilization, Dr. Ansonge's volume may find its place among the tomes of history, a position which, from its exceeding weight—4lb.—it will be well fitted to occupy.

THE FRENCH COURT IN THE FOURTEENTH CENTURY.

Lives and Times of the Early Valois Queens (Jeanne de Bourgogne, Blanche de Navarre, Jeanne d'Auvergne et de Boulogne). By Catherine Bearné. Illustrated. 8×6in., xx.+345 pp. London, 1899. Unwin. 10/6

All who love Froissart and the old chronicles of France will give a cordial welcome to this book. It is far more than a dry record of the lives of the three Queens, and might almost have been termed "Chronicles of the French Court in the Fourteenth century." But the author's aim is not that of a mere analyst. She portrays the characters and manners of the leading royal personages in that brilliant after-glow of chivalry, which attended the opening of the Hundred Years' War. At that period, France, though geographically not so extensive as to-day, was by common consent the most powerful monarchy in Europe. And there is much in this volume to make the reader ponder on the vast influence which dynastic changes and the character of individual rulers may have on the progress and the happiness of the people.

Mrs. Bearné has been a diligent student of the ancient French chronicles, and has made good use of the works of modern antiquaries on old Paris. She carefully explains the perplexing and complicated relationships at this period between the great houses of France, Burgundy, and Navarre; but she would have been even more successful in this respect if, at the risk of some repetition, she had compiled three genealogical tables instead of one. The best part of the work is undoubtedly the life of Queen Blanche, whose personality is clearly outlined in marked contrast to the more shadowy figures of the two Jeannes. Remarkable for her beauty and virtues, and at eighteen the affianced bride of the heir-apparent, she so fascinated the king, Philippe de Valois, that, in his son's absence, he married her himself, though more than forty years her senior. She only shared his throne for a few months; but her widowhood of nearly fifty years coincided with the disastrous, though eventually successful, struggles against the English, the Navarra, and the Jacquerie. Her position and high character enabled her often to act as mediator between Jean, "Le Bon," and her brother Charles, "Le Mauvais," King of Navarre; and one is disposed to wonder whether her efforts would have met with greater success, if her original betrothal to King Jean had been carried out. Mrs. Bearné shows some reason for questioning the propriety of these sobriquets of the two kings; but her defence of Charles of Navarre is not very convincing. The life of Jeanne d'Auvergne is necessarily much shorter than the others; for the defeat at Poitiers and the disorders that followed it have already been brightly sketched in the chapters upon the Queen Dowager. The statement in this life that Edward III., between 1347 and 1350, was a suitor for the hand of Jeanne is surely an error. At least, if he wooed her, it was for the Black Prince and not for himself, as his own queen Philippa survived till 1369.

The chief charm of the book, however, consists in the numerous little details, derived from inventories, wills, and similar sources, which bring vividly before us the social life of high circles in these long vanished days. And this merit is enhanced by the excellent sketches, mainly of châteaux and royal residences, which have been taken by Mr. Bearné from prints and ancient drawings. The reader will find lively descriptions of state pageants, of popular festivities, of the ravages of the Great Pestilence (though its arrival in Provence is dated some months too early), of the insecurity of travel, and of country life and rural sports. One protest we must make in this connexion. Mrs. Bearné tells us, on the authority of a French writer, that the English learnt football from the French during the Hundred Years' War. Patriotic feeling recoils at the mere suggestion; but it really seems to be quite unfounded. The rural game of la soule, to which she attributes the origin of football, is expressly distinguished from it by so high an authority as Bibliophile Jacob; while, according to Fitzstephen, the London apprentices were much addicted to football at least two centuries earlier, in the reign of Henry II.

"THE QUAKER CITY."

Philadelphia, the Place and the People. By Agnes Repplier. Illustrated. 7½×5½in., 392 pp. London and New York. 1898. Macmillan. 8/6 n.

To any one who has followed with interest the number of volumes that have appeared in the last few weeks on various general phases of American History, it will be a relief to turn to the picturesque sketch published by Miss Agnes Repplier of the results of all the counteracting influences described by Sir George Trevelyan, by Mr. Ford, by Mr. M'Carthy, and by Mr. Lodge, when they are concentrated within the limits of a single city. In sketching the slow rise of Philadelphia to her present assured position of respected eminence, the author of "Essays in Idleness" has chosen the very best example possible to confront the unguarded foreigner with conclusions the very opposite of those he would be likely to draw from the pages of the authors just referred to. As a matter of fact, the Englishman whom her graceful pages may possibly enamour with the thought of transatlantic cities must not imagine that many other communities between the Golden Horn and the Statue of Liberty will tempt his wandering fancy with so strong a charm. If he has been fortunate enough to follow Miss Repplier's example and to see the place itself; if he has stood in Fairmont Park, and from above Rockland watched the play of light and shade upon the River Drive; or if upon Race Street Wharf he has lingered beneath the ancient gables where Neal makes his sails and Levin sells his fish; then, perhaps, he will be more in sympathy with the old Quaker City and its beloved founder, just because of its difference from any other place he is likely to visit in a country of hurrying wealth and somewhat too obvious industrial preoccupation. Because a Philadelphian has been for long accustomed to reposeful dignity and to the associations of a great tradition in the past, he is commonly described as sleepy by his energetic comrades of the West. But he has to live up to his still visible surroundings in a manner very rare upon his continent. He dwells beneath the shadow of Independence Hall where the famous Declaration was signed; he passes every day the place where the first Continental Congress met in Carpenter's Hall. The very furniture of either building is an education in itself. Within the same town is the old Swedes' Church of 1700; and he may wander to and fro, not through the numbered chessboard of an Avenue B leading to a West Sixteenth Street, but by way of such rustic appellations as Chestnut or Walnut Street, savouring of colonial paths cut in the virgin forest, and of an age that could lay out its towns without regard to cable-cars or elevated railroad tracks. If his mind be of the classical persuasion, as often happens when the Gods of ancient Greece and Rome are furthest from his reach, in the Custom House and in the Mint, in Girard College and in the Ridgway branch of Philadelphia Library, he will find columns and peristyles and friezes to his fancy. Above everything, upon the soaring pedestal of the City Hall, stands the statue of the Quaker William Penn, whose admirable portrait in an astonishingly martial suit of armour forms the frontispiece to this record of his peaceful victories.

To the ordered gaieties of the old colonial days Miss Repplier does better justice than to the man who made them possible. The news that ended them, and gave to Philadelphia for the first time her position in an independent country, was received by the slumbering city in a very characteristic fashion. For the few burghesses who were awake before the sun rose on the 23rd of October, 1781, might have heard a tranquil watchman announcing to the night:—"Past three o'clock, and Lord Cornwallis taken." The period of revolution, of which that message marked the close, gained its distinction, upon both sides of the Atlantic, from a citizen of Philadelphia who has left an impression upon her history second only to that of William Penn himself. It was when he was seventeen that Benjamin Franklin left his home at Boston, after two years at school and an education chiefly derived from odd volumes of the Spectator and a few well-thumbed classical authorities. He walked into Philadelphia with his pockets stuffed with shirts and stockings and his head full of his plans for becoming a master printer. In ten years he was owner and editor of the Pennsylvanian Gazette, and in ten years more he had done so much for his adopted city that she was behind her English contemporaries in nothing "except a close corporation and a bullring." His talents rapidly secured him public recognition at home, and when he visited Paris on the business of the new and victorious country he had helped to make, he was welcomed as an equal by the most fastidious spirits in the capital which led the fashions and the taste of Europe.

"The Quaker City," writes Miss Repplier, "lacks discriminating enthusiasm for her own children." She proves the truth of the remark too well in her own book, for we could have spared a good deal of gossip about less important people to hear more of Penn and Franklin in the Philadelphia they loved. But her reticence is perhaps only a reflection of the proud and somewhat stoical composure of the town she chronicles. Her citizens have been roused by the fighting last summer, not so much to realize that "America has whipped Spain," as to remember proudly that Cramp's Shipbuilding Yard is in the same city as Independence Hall.

THE SPORTSMAN'S BALANCE-SHEET.

The Cost of Sport. Edited by F. G. Afalo. 8x5½ in., xiv. + 364 pp. London, 1899. Murray. 6/-

The intention of the editor of "The Cost of Sport" is evidently a serious one, and he has been at considerable pains to harness his team of writers, but it would not be difficult to make fun out of the result. There is material for another "Soapey Sponge" or "Market Harborough" in the following sentence alone:—

An initial outlay of £140 and an annual expenditure of £80 should cover all out of pocket expenses of any man of moderate weight, well carried to hounds in a provincial country, three days a fortnight.

The writer, Mr. Rumbold, has just told us that the non-hunting public are in error as considering hunting to be a costly sport, "which, considering the health and pleasure that it affords, it most assuredly is not." Absolute cost, however, on which alone Mr. Afalo professes to give information, remains the same whatever be the return obtained in enjoyment, and to say that hunting is not a costly amusement shows considerable hardihood. In his anxiety to prove that it is cheap, Mr. Rumbold supplies some estimates which scarcely bear analysis. The average price of a hunter for a man of middle weight is set down at £120; this, we presume, must be reckoned as part of the "initial outlay," leaving £20 to spend on saddlery and hunting clothes. Now saddlery is estimated at £15 17s. 6d. per horse, leaving just £4 2s. 6d. for boots, breeches, and the rest of the kit! The problem is made bewildering by our Mentor's statement that a man must spend "anything between £12 10s. and £25 per single outfit," and warns the neophyte in the same breath that "almost every article of apparel must be duplicated, and sufficient pairs of breeches bought to allow time for the dirty pairs to be cleaned."

So the estimate of initial outlay must be taken, on Mr. Rumbold's own showing, not at £140, but £160 17s. 6d. Turning to his estimate of annual cost, we find nothing allowed as a depreciation fund for replacing the £120 nag when he goes the way of all horseflesh; and Mr. Rumbold's calculation is based on this valuable animal running four months at grass, treatment against which Lord Coventry utters a sound and solemn warning on p. 139.

Now we have taken some pains to analyse Mr. Rumbold's figures and precepts, because he addresses himself specially to the "private individual," who is the most likely person to consult a book of this kind. The only possible value of a hand-book on prices lies in absolute precision, but, in turning to the paper on the cost of salmon fishing, the reader finds Mr. Charles Walker alternating between vagueness and inaccurate details.

It is quite impossible to make any definite statement as to the rent of a stretch of salmon water. All that it is possible to say is that in Devonshire and Ireland the rents are much less than in Scotland, where some pieces of salmon water have lately let at a yearly rent of over £1,500.

What does that convey unless the writer mentions the length of water let for that figure?

Again, he says that on some rivers and lakes a boat and man are necessary, the man getting 5s. 6d. a day and his luncheon. But Mr. Walker ought to be aware, and if he is aware he should tell his readers, that on such waters as the river and loch of Tay two rowers are indispensable, implying 11s. a day and two luncheons. To one definite statement he does commit himself—namely, that "during the past season (1898) the cost of salmon waters rented in Scotland was about £5 to each salmon caught." Now last year was the worst of a series of bad ones, and if it were possible, which it is not, to check Mr. Walker's calculation by actual statistics, we are perfectly sure that his estimate would be found far under the mark. On the Helmsdale, for instance, usually one of the most prolific salmon rivers in Scotland, rents run very high; the spring fishing of 1898 was a miserable failure, and the long-continued drought in summer utterly put an end to fishing. We do not underrate the difficulties Mr. Affalo has had to face in getting a number of gentlemen to jot down their ideas of the cost of different kinds of sport: that he has not succeeded better is perhaps inseparable from the complexity of the subject. There is, let us do him and his staff credit for this, a great deal of useful miscellaneous information scattered up and down the volume, but some of the calculations we have been at the trouble to verify tend to make one cautious in putting implicit faith in the rest. The article on the cost of cycles and cycling is a useful one; and in the matter of games such as cricket, golf, and lawn tennis, precise information has not been difficult to obtain.

CHINA.

China. (The Story of the Nations Series.) By Professor Douglas. 8x5½ in., xix. + 451 pp. London, 1899. Unwin. 5/-

With just a little more care and sense of proportion, Professor Douglas' contribution to "The Story of the Nations" Series might have been made much more valuable than it is. To attempt to reduce the history of an empire so ancient and so unfamiliar as that of China to the compass of a handy volume is no small undertaking. Professor Douglas has accomplished it by condensing the first three thousand years of the Chinese chronicles after they emerge from the region of fable into twenty three pages. This is after all rather a slender allowance for a period which includes the three great influences that made Chinese civilization such as it has existed down to the present day—viz., Confucius, Lao Tszé the founder of Taoism, and the introduction of Buddhism from India. Moreover, a few dates would have been decidedly acceptable. The casual reader, for instance, would probably like to be told at least in what century Confucius lived. Professor Douglas devotes most of his space to the history of the present Manchu dynasty, and specially to the fifty years which have elapsed since the first Chinese war with England brought the Empire into direct contact with "the outer barbarians." Doubtless this is the most important period as far as we are concerned with the political questions which have grown up out of it in the Far East. But it is a period of which already much has been written, and often in a no less readable form. If Professor Douglas had given us an equally readable sketch of the earlier periods of Chinese history which still lie buried for the general public in the somewhat dreary pages of erudite specialists, he would have supplied an acknowledged desideratum. He has shown, in this and in other works, that he is fully qualified for the task, and we can but regret that he did not apply himself to it more thoroughly.

In CHINA AND ITS FUTURE (Stock, 3s. 6d.) Mr. James Johnston has been startled out of his "philosophic calmness" by the "pretensions of the upstart nations of Europe to carve out for themselves that vast and venerable empire . . . which was civilized thousands of years before they emerged from barbarism." We are not surprised after this to find that he sees "in the movements of Japan and China all the difference between the agility of the monkey and the slow and heavy tread of the elephant," or that he regards the absence of ancient monuments in China as a further proof of her superiority over countries which are burdened with such relics of despotic power and priestly tyranny as the Pyramids of Egypt or the temples of India, or the cathedrals of medieval Europe. We cannot say that this sort of sentiment disposes us to set much value upon Mr. Johnston's views as to the future of China. But what he has to tell us about the habits and customs and modes of thought of the Chinese people is pleasant enough reading, and if he lays more stress upon their many good qualities than upon their failings, this is not perhaps an undesirable corrective to the general tendency nowadays to hold the patient and industrious millions of China responsible for all the vices of their rulers.

MEDIEVAL NORMANDY.

The Story of Rouen. By T. A. Cook. (The Medieval Town Series.) 7x4½ in., xvi. + 400 pp. London, 1899.

Dent. 3/6 n.

No medieval town offers a more direct and personal interest to the English traveller than the quaint old capital of Normandy. It would be difficult to conceive the story of Rouen told in a more brilliant and effective manner than in this slim volume. Mr. Dent deserves the thanks both of the stay-at-home, curious of things over seas, and of the more enterprising traveller who desires to see these things for himself. You may read Mr. Cook's "Rouen" in your library or in the more suggestive solitude of your hotel chamber at Rouen with equal pleasure and interest. The book is packed with the instructive results of research, and there is not the faintest whiff of pedantry, unless it be the Gothic spelling which mars our recognition of our old friend Chilperic. What is the gain in presenting him to us as Hilperik? Many an innocent and unerudite reader will only be enabled to identify him by mention of the immortal pair, Brune-haut and Frédégonde, with whose names his is ever associated. What remains the permanent interest and ever-surprising charm of these old towns of Europe is the diversity of their associations. So many nations, races so dissimilar, have contributed to form their home history. The flow of events in the troubled story of Rouen introduces us to Roman, Goth, Viking, before we meet the familiar Norman, the semi-civilized, cunning, quarrelsome, and money-loving Northman, transformed by atmosphere and environment into a Frenchman. Naturally, the two most arresting figures in the book are William the Conqueror and the Maid, though, if a preference must be given to any special chapters in so admirable a volume, we should incline to regard Mr. Cook's treatment of medieval Rouen in the chapters "Life" and "Death" as superior to his less vivid and striking chapters on William and Jeanne d'Arc. Of the former he gives a terse and suggestive picture, but he has not been quite so successful with the Maid. All that erudition can tell us most of us know. What we now demand in each fresh interpretation of that radiant mystery in human history is interpretative imagination, the gift of seizing words, of memorable effect. Mr. Cook, which is perhaps befitting in a traveller's vide mecum, writes more lovingly of the Rue de la Grosse Horloge than of Jeanne. True, the street is fascinating enough to justify his enthusiasm. This street affords him agreeable occasion to stand still and refresh us with medieval gossip which differs from our own by such qualities as picturesqueness, dash, what the French call "allure," a certain stamp of courage and humour civilization has made us strangers to. He proves to us that it was neither healthy nor safe nor pleasant to live in old Rouen in the days of her brilliant renown, when she was the capital of a haughty and powerful people. But the vicissitudes of the inhabitants are full of charm for us to-day, recalling the times when a villain knew how to be a villain with splendid recklessness, and when kings interfered in the lives of their subjects with the most surprising results. The illustrations are charming, and the book is full of a quantity of fresh and delightful information.

OTHER NEW BOOKS.

THE POEMS OF THOMAS CAREW, edited by Arthur Vincent (Lawrence and Bullen, 5s. n.), is distinguished by all the care and scholarship which have characterized the previous volumes of "The Muses' Library," and Mr. Vincent has made a conscientious tious attempt to omit all discredited anecdotes from his biography, as well as all spurious poems from his collection. Unfortunately, so little is known of the poet that, in this case, the true story of his life is dull and colourless. Warmth and incident no doubt it had, but the record thereof is lost beyond recovery. Mr. Vincent has performed a real service by establishing the distinct identities of Thomas Carew, author of "The Rapture," &c.; "sweet" Thomas Carey, of Sunninghill, collector of "all the King's short poems that are not printed;" and Thomas Carey, translator of Puget de la Serre. Of the first two both the portraits and the poems have at different times been confounded; and Mr. Vincent has so far respected the traditional errors of his predecessors as to include, in a kind of appendix, the two extant poems of Thomas Carey, attributed to Carew. These are followed by three of Shirley's poems and one of Suckling's, with the versions of the same which appeared in Carew's works. They are given on the ground that the variations are considerable and may have been introduced by him. As a critic Mr. Vincent is correct but cold, and we confess that we should have been glad if he could have prefaced his sound labours by a slightly more enthusiastic appreciation of the poet to whom he stands as sponsor.

IN THE MUNICIPAL PARKS, GARDENS, AND OPEN SPACES OF LONDON (Stock, £1 1s.) Lieutenant-Colonel J. J. Saxby relates their history from the earliest times to those of the London County Council. His work is of a truly monumental character, the number of its pages being 640, and the number of its pictures—some of which are taken from modern photographs and others from old prints—184. No one, or hardly any one, is likely to read it straight through from cover to cover; but it is an excellent book to pick up from time to time for the satisfaction of an occasional curiosity. Wherever the author takes us he is ready with anecdotes—sometimes familiar, sometimes unfamiliar—about the distinguished residents of the past. Take Red Lion-square, for instance. On the subject of Red Lion-square the minds of the majority of us are a blank. But Colonel Saxby gives us a wonderful picture showing what it looked like in the year 1800; he reminds us that Jonas Hanway, the popularizer of the umbrella, lived at No. 23, and goes on to chat at length about Jonas Hanway's travels in Russia and his argument with Dr. Johnson about the desirability of drinking tea. Moving a little west, he invites us into Whitfield-gardens, and hands us a copy of the letter in which the great Methodist preacher made a proposal of marriage. "You need not be afraid," he wrote, "of sending me a refusal, for if I know anything of my own heart I am free from that foolish passion which the world calls love." The perusal of that love-letter is certainly calculated to brighten a visit to a somewhat dreary open space. Clapham-common evokes recollections of Pepys, Evelyn, and Macaulay. Hackney Marsh recalls the invasion of the Danes, and a fish story about a monster fresh-water eel weighing 22lb. 7oz. which was caught in 1766. Tooting-common, of course, suggests the name of Mrs. Thrale, and, once started on Mrs. Thrale, Colonel Saxby proceeds with several pages of miscellaneous anecdote about Dr. Johnson. And so on with all the other open spaces. Not one of them is omitted, nor does the history of any one of them seem to be scamped. The book has evidently been compiled from sources that are open to all of us, but it is well compiled and interesting, provided that one does not read too much of it at a time. Moreover, the illustrations are admirable and the book is handsomely got up.

The distinguished author of "The Nation in Arms" remarks in THE CONDUCT OF WAR (Kegan Paul, 10s. 6d.) that "the study of war is often accused of dealing in platitudes." There is much to be said for the indictment. Axioms and definitions cannot be avoided when one of the objects in view is "to introduce the beginner in an easy manner to the more thorough study of the art" of war; but General von der Goltz occasionally enshrines them in a profusion of verbiage which is irritating. With the exception of some ponderous periods, in which simple ideas lose force and distinctiveness, the latest volume of the Wolsey Series is a useful contribution to military literature. A broad view of the Offensive, the Defensive, and the reciprocity existing between them, occupies the first part of the book, and is afterwards amplified. The pedantry which divorces tactics from strategy is absent, but the want of maps and diagrams will be sorely felt, especially in the second part, which bristles with examples drawn from military history. Even "the advanced student," for whom the book is intended as an "aide memoire," will find it difficult to follow the author as he flies from the Seine to the Potomac, and brings the great theatres of war of the world under rapid review. The lavish citation of isolated operations, apart from a full presentment of the circumstances, encourages looseness of thought. Thus the author points out that—

There will, as a rule, not be any pursuit, for troops advancing on convergent lines will cross at the moment of victory in such a way that order must first be established amongst them. They cannot at once undertake new operations. This circumstance partly explains why there was no pursuit after the battle of Königgratz.

The use of the word "partly" seems inadequate when the magnificent devotion of the Austrian cavalry and artillery on the day of Königgratz is remembered. The tremendous influence of sea power on strategy does not receive the attention which might be expected in a modern work. On the whole, however, "The Conduct of War" may, as the editor claims, be regarded as "a short and convenient introduction to a deeper study of the rules which should underlie the direction of the ever-varying incidents of modern fighting."

The motive and main theme of Mr. Walter J. Mathams' book COMRADES ALL (Chatto and Windus, 2s.), which he hopes will help "to play the soldier along the march and up the hill," is expressed in Whitman's lines:—

"Comrado, I will give you my hand!
I will give you my love more precious than money,
I will give you myself before preaching or law;
Will you give me yourself? Will you come travel with me?
Shall we stick by each other as long as we live?"

It is this rough spirit of good feeling that inspires the writer of these fourteen short essays and illustrative anecdotes. It is, perhaps, unnecessary to criticize the collection from a literary point of view, for Lord Roberts, who knows the British soldier well, has said of these stories, in his interesting introduction, "they may be read with benefit by any one because of the excellent feeling and principles they inculcate, and they will, I feel sure, strongly appeal to my comrades in arms." After these brave words it seems almost unkind to point out that such an essay as "The Sirdar's Luck" is a rather obvious tract, freely sprinkled with proverbial philosophy and only relieved of its dulness by the quotation of the poem "Then Ag'in," which epitomizes Mr. Mathams' essay in the last verse:—

"But we're all like Jim Bowker, thinks I, more or less—Charge fate for our bad luck ourselves for success,
And give fortune the blame for all our distress,
As Jim Bowker, he said,
If it hadn't been for luck, misfortune, and sich,
We might a-been famous, an might a-been rich,
It might be jest so,
I dunno;
Jest so it might been,
Then agin—"

Mr. Mathams does not give the name of the writer of these verses. They are, as a matter of fact, the work of an American humorous poet, Mr. S. W. Foss, who should be better known in England. At the end of "Comrades All" is a collection of military "wise saws" for daily use, which the author calls "Maxim Shots," and which Lord Roberts thinks likely to be of especial value to army men.

ANNALS OF COAL MINING AND THE COAL TRADE, by Robert L. Galloway (Colliery Guardian Company). History is not, as a rule, a strong point with technical men; ninety-nine out of every hundred care nothing at all about it and the hundredth has, as often as not, either no time for historical research or no power of literary expression. Thus the histories of trades are, for the most part, the result of the "reading up" of amateurs, and are consequently lacking in true proportion and insight. When, therefore, a practical "mining engineer and certificated colliery manager" betakes himself to historical research and embodies the outcome of his labours in a more or less readable volume the fact is worth noting. Although these annals are little more than a collection of facts, the facts are well selected and arranged, and are lightened up by gleams of humour and sentiment.

Mr. A. R. Dewar in FROM MATTER TO MAN (Chapman and Hall, 3s. 6d.) sets down metaphysics as an old wife's tale that has for years hindered the progress of scientific searchings for truth, and boldly launches his "New Materialism" into a world where he sees nothing but "hurly-burly" and chaotic disorder. Rejecting the "nebular hypothesis," and compelled to acknowledge our inability to conceive a beginning or an end, he concludes that the only true basis for a rational theory is that the universe is uncaused that it never had a beginning and never can have an end. But it is as difficult to conceive something uncaused, as it is to believe that something issued from nothing. Nevertheless, Mr. Dewar ridicules the latter and gravely predicates the former. The absence of any definition of "matter" in such a volume is remarkable. When, however, we leave behind these difficulties and reach the chapters dealing with magnetism and vegetable and animal evolution we are repaid for our journey thither. Mr. Dewar is most interesting when he illustrates with homely similes the wonders of nature, despite his comparison of such of her works as are not dreamt of in his philosophy to the "clumsiness of a blundering mechanical apprentice."

IN DANGER'S HOUR (Cassell, 1s. 8d.) is a collection of true stories of stirring deeds, sought out and set in order by Mr. H. O. Arnold-Forster. They range over a large variety of subjects, and are written out by all manner of authors. We have John Evelyn's account of the Fire of London, beside Mr. E. F. Knight's account of his landing in Cuba, the story of the Revenge told by Sir Walter Raleigh, the story of the Battle of Albuera told by Napier, and the story of John Brown, whose body lies a-mouldering in the ground, told by Ascott R. Hope. No boy to whom this book is given for a present is likely to say that he would rather have had something else instead.

"I will now tell you something about Merton College," wrote Little Mr. Bouncer, in his famous letter home. Mr. Bouncer had got hold of a good subject—a better subject, perhaps, than he imagined. Merton has a remarkable history for a seat of learning, and Mr. Bernard W. Henderson, in his MERTON COLLEGE (Robinson, 5s. n.), does ample justice to it. Its dominant notes seem to have been an exuberance of animal spirits on the part of the undergraduates, and the vexation of the College as a whole by the encroachments of the sex supposed by the pious founder to have no particular use for its advantages. Town and gown rows abound in Mr. Henderson's vivacious pages. He begins with a fine fight in the fourteenth century, records a "temporary lull" in the seventeenth century, and shows us what broad views the dons of the Restoration took of these violent diversions. The Vice-Chancellor, it seems, had complained.

The College, however, when it received his complaint merely inserted an obiter dictum in its Register that "Never had College produced so many eminent examples of piety as had Merton—quod bono vertat Mertonensibus"—and went on its way rejoicing.

When we turn to the other branch of the subject, the distressing encroachment of woman, we find contemporary chronicles full of complaints about the Wardens' wives. Reynolds' wife, for example, is described by Anthony Wood as "covetous and insatiable," and is accused of having hindered her husband's proposed benefactions to the College. Clayton's wife is denounced by the same authority for her extravagance. The furniture was not good enough for her, and the College had to buy her new, including "a very large looking-glass." Further disquietude was caused by the visit of the ladies of the Court of Charles II., the great grievance being that founder's prayers had to be recited in English "because there were more women than scholars in the chapel." Finally, there was the trouble connected with the opening of Merton Garden to the public in the eighteenth century. "An intruding tide of ladies," says Mr. Henderson, "drove studies in Oxford to the winds, and morals after them." But the academic misogynist of the period was not slow to pen his protest against the innovation:—

"I am not the only one [he wrote] that has taken notice of the almost universal corruption of our youth, which is to be imputed to nothing so much as to that multitude of Female Residentiaries who have of late infested our learned retirement and drawn off Numbers of unwary young persons from their studies."

This state of things, as was not unnatural, was found to tend towards "imprudent marriages," and when the fellows awoke to a lively sense of that danger they shut up the gardens and turned the ladies out. "The riddance," says Mr. Henderson, with more candour than gallantry, "was to the permanent benefit of Merton College."

GLEAMS FROM GOETHE (George Allen, 2s. n.) is a collection of 690 sayings of the Sage of Weimar, selected and arranged by Mr. Henry Attwell, who also contributes a critical and biographical introduction. In the same format, and at the same price, Mr. Allen also publishes WORDS FOR THE WIND: A Book of Prose Points by William Henry Phelps. Though the prose points are of no startling audacity or profundity, they may stimulate thought.

ALFRED LORD TENNYSON: A MEMOIR, published originally in two volumes in 1897, and in an Edition de Luxe of four volumes in 1898, now appears complete in one volume. Messrs Macmillan have done well to give us this more handy edition, which is similar in format to the Poems.

Mr. Sebastian Evans' translation from M. Paul Sabatier's edition of the Speculum Perfectionis, under the title of S. FRANCIS OF ASSISI, THE MIRROR OF PERFECTION (Nutt, 2s.), which we reviewed last month, has already run into a second edition. We have nothing to add to our notice of the first edition, except that the good taste then shown by the publisher in the printing and paper of the book has guided him in the choice of a new cover of a neat and appropriate character.

SPINOZA: His Life and Philosophy, by Sir Frederick Pollock (Duckworth, 8s. n.). The first edition of this book appeared nearly twenty years ago. The second, which has just been published, contains a special introduction on the bibliography of the subject, taking cognizance of important contributions to Spinoza literature which have appeared in the meantime. As regards the alterations introduced into the body of the work, Sir Frederick Pollock explains:—

I could not undertake to revise my estimate of Spinoza's philosophy as a whole, or to examine and weigh all the meritorious contributions of recent writers to the subject, without far more leisure than is at my disposal, or likely to be. Moreover, I should have no assurance that all or any of my readers would agree with me in preferring my later opinions to my earlier ones, in case of difference. I have, therefore, confined myself to adding a few explanatory and supplementary passages, and altering such parts of the text as appeared to me, on returning to them, clearly erroneous or misleading.

Simultaneously with Sir Frederick Pollock's new edition, Messrs. Duckworth issue a third and revised edition of Mr. Hale White's translation of Spinoza's ETHIC (7s. 6d.), revised by Miss A. H. Stirling.

THE MYSTIC ROSE FROM THE GARDEN OF THE KING, by Mr. F. L. Cartwright, which we noticed a little more than a year ago (when it was only privately printed) as a book strikingly impregnated with Persian thought though the work of an Englishman, has now been published by Messrs. H. S. Nichols for 21s.

PSYCHE RAPTA.

When Psyche from the granite brow forlorn
 Leapt down she knew not whither, in despair,
 Under her falling feet she was aware
 Of Zephyr : down thro' gulfs of sunlight borne (An almond-blossom from the orchard torn),
 Dropping she heard the eddies of the air
 Sigh on her cheek and whisper in her hair.
 Great pinions, coloured as the snows at morn,
 (Poised on his diving head she dives) to left and right
 Arose and fell, arose and floated in the light.

Faint-coloured far below the plain appears
 A dawning Paradise undreamed of man ;
 Softlier past the living plummet ran
 The push of ever-yielding atmospheres.
 The haven which the strange sky-vessel nears,
 Takes clearer brilliance and a lesser span ;
 Now smells of Earth, now butterflies began
 To meet her, when her sudden Zephyr veers :
 She slips her perch, and settles like a flake on deep Piled meadow-beds of grass, thick furred with flowers, asleep.

My soul had climbed the weary slopes of Thought
 To that high edge where Thought no further leads,
 And blind with such despair as thinking breeds,
 Stared into unattempted seas of Naught ;
 When Music on her angel-pinions caught
 The tearless brain, cold heart, and foot that bleeds :
 Easy as rivers lapsing thro' their reeds
 I plumb the golden gulf of Truth untaught ;
 And all the balmy zones of Contemplation past,
 Decline on fields of Peace, a dreaming child at last.

JOHN SWINNERTON PHILLIMORE.

Among my Books.

A fascinating little volume to take in hand and linger over is one that appeared in 1591, with the title "A Short Treatise of Hunting, Compyled for the delight of Noble men and Gentlemen." It was written by Sir Thomas Cockaine, one of the noted Cockaines of Ashbourne. The vigorous and persistent knight declares he had "never missed following the Bucke in Summer and the Hare in Winter for half-a-century, two yeares onely excepted"; and this leaves no doubt that what he says of buckhounds, foxhounds, and the kennel generally came from a fine experience. His book, he manfully makes known to his readers, is not produced by "a Skoller, and you must not looke to have it decked either with Eloquence or Arte," it comes from a "Professed Hunter," and as it records the Hunt-doings of Tudor Derbyshire, with the confines of Shakespeare's Warwickshire thus reached in the very years when Shakespeare was in it, let it be that "Eloquence and Arte" are not present. Their place is filled by something rarer.

See, for instance, the advice about Breeding-hounds. Says Cockaine, "Foresee they bee durable, well mouthed, cold nosed, round footed, open bulked, and well let down there, with . . . small tayles." When you are thinking of their keep, or board, "bee sure that meate bee made in the morning to feede them withall at evening when they come home"; and the exact and accurate old "Hunter" adds, "I know of my own experience that the purest and finest feeding is with ground Otes put in a tub and scalded with water, which tub being made close with a cover, will keep the meate hot till night." In the case of buckhounds, there might be a small deviation from this. Their "meate" need not be "Otes," it might be bread and milk; but, comes the warning, "you must beware of giving them newe bread, for then will they not hunt of two days after." Indigestion would seize the creatures, even as new bread of modern shop-sale will bring indigestion now!

Concerning "reliefe" for hounds at a hunt, or "reward," or "quarry," as the Tudor word is (its meaning, "given to Hounds after they have taken the Same," standing in Bailey's Dictionary, 1730), Cockaine is equally explicit. After a kill of a hare, "a good huntsman," he says, "ought to blowe the death, and carry with him a peece of bread in his sleeve, to wet in the bloud of the Hare for the reliefe of his whelps." After the kill of a "stagge," or of a roe, let the skin be taken "cleane off"; let it be spread upon the ground (a kind of impervious cloth, or tray); let the paunch and blood be put upon it; let bread be sent for, "if any towne be neare hand"; then break the bread "in the bloud, and let all hounds come and eat." Should this game be the stag, "let the huntsman have the head, which should be given to the hounds at home a week after" (to keep their memories well polished, of course); and should it be the roe, let the "bodie" be put in a "sheet" and sent home, and it will "make delicate meate, if your cooke season it, lard it, and bake it well." Caution must be observed over that "stagge" and his head, however. "Your Huntsmen," says Sir Thomas, "must be careful to be in when the stagge is readye to dye, and must houghsnew him with their swords" (hamstring him, in that military manner), "otherwise he will greatly endaunger your hounds, his head is so hard."

Then there are other topics. Here is one: "Your huntsman must have a Combe to combe the hounds he leadeth from fleas, and a hairecloth to rub the hounds withall after, to make them fine and smooth." Here is another: "Enter your whelps" (a falconry term, also, for letting hawks first begin to kill) "two or three weekes before Bartholme's Day, and continue untill the feast of All Saints." Here are a couple more: (1) If a hound should "hunt from his fellowes, or run at raskall" (run at something "trash or trumpery," not worth the kill), "take him up in a line, and, beating him, say, 'Awe! Ware that!'" (2) If, "when you cast off your houndes in a close that is thick of bushes," they "so double their mouthes and teare them together that you would think there were more hounds in companie than your own," do not "mervaille what it is your hounds find of." You may be sure "a Marterne hath been a birding there al night"; and, as your hounds think "marterne" the "sweetest vermine," they are sure to raise their voices "so soon as they light upon the scent of it." Should your hounds not lose their noses, but show legitimate joy in similarly lively manner, be sure they have found a roe, "for the sent of the Roe is farre sweeter to hounds than any other chase"; and a piece of Natural History appertaining to the roe, as taught under the Tudors, stands thus: "He sweateth not outwardly, as other Deare do, but in his foreleg is a little hole, through which all his moysture issueth."

A personal anecdote is narrated to illustrate a case where hounds lose their noses over a hare. Says Sir Thomas, "I was once in the field my selfe where . . . the hounds were at fault by reason of a flocke of sheepe which were driven along the high way where the Hare was gone before." There were "ten or twelve couple of good hounds in the companie," yet "not any of their noses were serving them"; but "I saw a Gentleman come in by chaunce with a Beagle"; this beagle took the scent "downe the way and cride it," bringing "it from off the foyled ground," and then did "the hounds all fall to hunting and recover the Hare, which was squat, and killed it." It is nice to read, and nice to think of that Gentleman and Sir Thomas Cockaine finding each other well met, and telling one another so, in proper Tudor manner, and with proper As-You-Like-It surroundings.

The hunt of the otter is not forgotten by our good "Professed Hunter." He recommends, "if it bee a great water" that two men be engaged in it, each man armed with his otter-spear; and he advises the huntsman to get to the water, and "seek in the mud or gravell for the sealing of the otter's foote, so shall he perceive perfectly whether hee goe up the water or downe." Further, Sir Thomas gives his opinion that "the best sporte" will be made of an otter "in a moon-shine night, for then he will runne much over the land, and not keepe the water as he will in the day." But, any way, the otter is "chiefly to bee hunted with slow hounds, great mouthed, which to a young man is a verie earnest sporte, and may last, if you list, two or three houres."

A rule is laid down over a false scent at any hunt, over any game. It is that "every huntsman that hath a horne ought to begin his rechate"—that being the "lesson" to be wound to bring back the hounds. A rule is to be observed by a huntsman, also, when he has the luck to "spie" a deer in any "thick copie or great brake." He is to cry, "He thats he that!" But he is to cry it once and no more, "which is knowledge to the other huntsmen that he seeth him." Altogether, Sir Thomas is certain that if you will treat your hounds by his method they "will serve you to hunt four severall chases; that is, the fine and cunning Hare, the sweet scented Roe, the hot scented Stag, and the dubling Bucke when he groweth wearie." Over the Huntsmen's Horn, whether blowing a rechate or another, Sir Thomas is fascinating. He adheres, he declares, to the "Measures in Blowing" laid down by "Sir Tristram, one of King Arthure's Knights." Sir Tristram, he says, was "the first writer and (as it were) founder of the exact knowledge" of the Hunting Art; and the "first principles" he wrote are yet extant. Now, it is in that statement that fascination lies. Can it be true? Is it a fact that copies of Sir Tristram's book (apocryphal, or otherwise) are really in existence? Surely, if, in 1591, Sir Thomas Cockaine could show intimacy with its pages, it can hardly have disappeared from everywhere to-day. Some library somewhere may be in happy, if unknown, possession of a copy—it will be in a hunting district, on the shelves of some Tudor hunting-lodge, where the Tudor master was a kennel enthusiast—and how enjoyable it would be, if such a copy could be discovered, and if literary hands might be allowed to be laid upon it! As a fact, however, Sir Tristram's "Measures in Blowing" absolutely are yet extant, for Cockaine quotes them. They are printed at the end of his own Treatise, for the reason that he considers them "the best and fittest to be used." They read in this fashion, to give a couple, out of scores:—

To Blowe to the coupling of the Hounds at the Kennell doore, blow with one, one long, and three short.

First when you goe into the field, blowe with one winde, one short, one long, and a longer.

Further, they embrace How to blow "the earthing of the Foxe when he is coverable"; and when he is not coverable, How to blow "the death of the Foxe at thy Lord's Gate." How to blow "the death of the Bucke, either with Bowe or Hounds or Greyhounds," together with "the knowledge upon the same." Also, How to blow for the "Terriars" where "the Foxe is earthed"; How to blow "the call of the Keepers of any Parke or Forrest"; and "when the Hounds hunt after a Game unknowne"; and when "the Game breaketh covert"; and "at the prize of an Hart royale"; and many, many more. And, says Cockaine, note this, "for it is the chiefest and principallest poynt to be noted:—Every long containeth in blowing seaven quavers, one minome and one quatter. One minome containeth foure quavers. One short containeth three quavers."

To listen to these, and to learn them, getting to know which told of the "Hart royale," which of the "Bucke," which of "the game unknowne,"—to ride with him when he followed, and to be as joyous and as fearless over it as himself, Sir Thomas Cockaine had agreeable neighbours and fellow-hunters. He was often invited, he says, by "that most honorable . . . Ambrose, the late Earl of Warwicke . . . to go on a hunting journey with him." He was often sent for "to await upon . . . Francis, Earle of Huntingdon, and the Marquess of Northampton, now deceased . . . if either of them had heard of a Stagge lying in an out wood farre from the Forrest Chase or Park," and thought it good, "presently to repaire" there. And his private history is well worth putting down, in a brief manner. He was the son of Francis and Dorothy Cockaine (she née Dorothy Marrow), and he was born, in 1519, at Ashbourne. In 1530, when he was only eleven years old, he was received into the family of the Earl of Shrewsbury, with "extraordinary favours," the intention being that he should learn Hunting under that nobleman, and serve him when learning-time was over. But, in 1538, he was suddenly recalled to Ashbourne by the death of his father. He was the heir, and beginning at that moment, a mere stripling of nineteen, he thenceforth had his own estates to manage, his own stables and kennels, and hounds and beagles, to see to. In 1544, "just before his maiesties going to Bulleine," he received "letters to serve in the warres in Scotland" under the Earl of Hertford (afterwards Duke of Somerset and Protector); he went, he did his service, and, for his gallant conduct before Edinburgh, was knighted. In 1548 he married, his wife being Dorothy Ferrers, of Tamworth Castle, his widowed mother having recently become Lady Ferrers by marriage with Dorothy's widowed father. In the same year a force was wanted "to rescue the siege at Haddington, which town was then kept by that valiant gentleman, Sir James Wilford, Knight;" Cockaine's own patron, Francis Earl of Shrewsbury, was told off as "his Grace's Lieutenant" over it; and Cockaine, led by friendship and duty both, joined the Earl's expedition and served under him.

These two Scotch services no doubt mark the "two years onely excepted" when Sir Thomas did not "follow the Bucke in Summer and the Hare in Winter;" and they mark the only lengthy absences from Ashbourne recorded by him. He did county-service, of course, with full and usual county propriety. One has peculiar interest. It was in 1568, when Mary Stuart was to be moved to Tutbury, Staffordshire, to be placed under the surveillance of the Earl of Shrewsbury—Sir Thomas' own Shrewsburys linked with him once more. An escort was wanted to ensure the royal captive's safe custody on her journey, and Sir Ralph Sadler, who had the management of it, called upon Cockaine to meet him "with a small traine" and accompany the cavalcade through Derby city. Thus, again and again, this Tudor huntsman was brought into contact with the leading personages of his day; and he did good home duty by founding a school at Ashbourne and becoming the governor of it. His death took place shortly after the appearance of his quaint little treatise.

JENNETT HUMPHREYS.

SHAKESPEARE'S "TEMPEST."

I.

How far was Shakespeare influenced in writing the Tempest by the recently reported wreck of Sir George Somers at the Bermudas? Most critics now agree that Shakespeare did utilize the materials which he found in Sir George Somers' book. Some little time ago, however, a writer in a weekly journal upheld the view that Prospero's island had no existence in Shakespeare's world, but was "woven out of such stuff as dreams are made on," and his remarks impelled Mr. Kipling to uphold Bermuda's claim to be that island, and to give his impressions on the question received on the spot. His surmise that Shakespeare obtained an account of Sir George Somers' shipwreck from a sailor just returned from that disastrous voyage is particularly happy, and impresses one with its probability. Dr. Georges Brandes says:—

Shakespeare borrowed several details from this book, the name of Bermoothes mentioned by Ariel in the first act, for instance; and his only reason for not following the narrative in detail was his desire to lay the scene in an island of the Mediterranean.

It has given me the keenest pleasure to trace the connexion between my native place and the Tempest and a close examination of the matter has convinced me that Shakespeare did, without a doubt, take his inspiration from the wreck of Sir George Somers at Bermuda, and that the parallelism between the two accounts is much nearer than is generally thought. As some of the evidence I have collected may, I think, be new to your readers and is, I think, not without interest, I venture to give you the results of my labours. Before producing the evidence in support of this assertion it will be necessary first to relate what is known of the history of the play. The date of its composition has never been certainly fixed. Malone stated that it was first performed at Whitehall on Hallowmass (Nov. 1st.), 1611, but the page containing this entry in the Account Book of the Master of Revels preserved at the Public Record Office, has been proved a forgery. Mr. S. Lee says that Malone doubtless based his positive assertion on evidence which has since been mislaid and that the forger probably worked on Malone's published statement. To me it seems more natural to suppose that Malone was deceived by the forgery. The first indisputable notice of the play is its performance at the marriage festivities of the Princess Elizabeth to the Elector Frederic on February 14, 1613. I am convinced, for reasons given later, that this later date is probably more nearly correct.

Sir George Somers sailed for Virginia in 1609, with a fleet of nine ships. His vessel, the Sea Venture, was carried out of her course and wrecked on the Bermudas. The shipwrecked crew spent nine months there, and then sailed for Virginia in two pinnaces which they built. They arrived at Jamestown on May 21, 1610, but finding the colony in great straits they left for England on June 8. Whilst on their way down the bay, they met Lord de la Warre with supplies for the colony and returned to Jamestown. The first news of the safety of Sir George Somers' crew was brought to England in September, 1610. Very shortly afterwards three accounts of the shipwreck were published. They were, "A true Declaration of the Estate of the Colony in Virginia, &c.," published by advice and direction of the Council of Virginia; "A Discovery of the Bermudas, &c.," by Silvanus Jourdan; and "News from Virginia," a poetical tract by R. Rich. In 1612 a much fuller account was published entitled "A true repertory of the wreck and redemption of Sir Thomas Gates, &c.," by William Strachey. This latter is reprinted in "Purchas his Pilgrims," 1625, and against it is put the date, July 15, 1610. Sir J. H. LeFroy in his "Memorials of the Bermudas," has taken this as the date of its original publication, but it is evidently an error because the news could not have reached England at that date.

There is every probability that Shakespeare was familiar with the whole story, as his patrons, the Earls of Southampton and Pembroke, were members of the Virginia Company, and afterwards of the Bermuda Company; two parishes in Bermuda are called after them to this day. Apart from the probable accidental meeting with Mr. Kipling's mariner in a tavern, Shakespeare would have had many opportunities of hearing of the shipwreck at first hand. It will be remembered that Shakespeare was interested in both the Blackfriars and Globe Theatres, one on either side of the river, and was necessarily continually passing over the ferry from Paris Garden Stairs on the Surrey side to Blackfriars. We learn that this part of the river was the headquarters for foreign going vessels. It was quite the busiest part of the river, and thousands of watermen plied their calling about there. Many of them were old sailors who had served with Drake, Hawkins, &c., and we can be quite certain that these watermen followed very closely the fortunes of the various expeditions fitted out for the scenes of their old adventures. The setting forth of Sir George Somers' fleet of nine ships would have been particularly noticed, and the return of the eight from Virginia, with the report of the loss of the Admiral's ship, the Sea Venture, would have caused a buzz of comment amongst them. When in September, 1610, some of these very mariners, who had been long given up for lost, returned from Virginia with the marvellous account of their adventures, the fame of it would have spread like wildfire amongst the watermen, and the whole story would have been poured into Shakespeare's ears on the very next occasion on which he crossed the river. The great interest taken by the watermen in the theatres is shown by a pamphlet written in 1613, by John Taylor, the water poet, called "The true cause of the Watermen's suit concerning players, and the reasons that their playing on London side is their extreme hindrances."

It is, however, to the internal evidence, that Shakespeare studied the above-mentioned publications very closely, that I wish to refer particularly, and as I am not aware that it has been given in extenso heretofore, I hope I may be permitted to do so here. I am indebted to Sir J. H. LeFroy's "Memorials of the Bermudas" for the text of the tracts and also for several of the following coincidences.

It will be first noted that of the real and ideal Fleets in each case it is the largest vessel with the leaders on board that is wrecked. The rest go "sadly home" to Virginia and Naples respectively thinking,

They saw the King's ship wrecked,
And his great person perish.

There are two chief personages on board each of the doomed vessels, Sir George Somers and Sir Thomas Gates in the one, Alonso, King of Naples, and Antonio, Duke of Milan, in the other. In both instances they had given themselves over for lost. Jourdan says, "Our men, utterly spent, were even resolved to shut up hatches and to have committed themselves to the mercies of the sea, or rather to the mercie of their mightie God and Redeemer," and the Tempest, Act I. Sc. 1. "All lost! to prayers! to prayers! all lost!" Continuing, Jourdan says, "Some having good and comfortable waters fetcht them and dranke one to another," and Antonio, Act I., Sc. 1. :—

We are merely cheated of our lives by drunkards.

Also, Ariel, Act I., Sc. II. :—

Not a soul
But felt a fever of the mind, and played
Some tricks of desperation.

The appearance of corposant fires is thus described by Strachey :—"The apparition of a little round light like a faint starre, trembling and streaming along with a sparkling blaze, half the height upon the maine mast, and shooting sometimes from shroud to shroud—half the night it kept with us, running sometimes along the maine yard to the very end, and then returning."

Could this be better paraphrased than by Ariel, Act I., Sc. II. ? :—

I boarded the king's ship ; now on the beak,
Now in the waist, the deck, in every cabin,
I flamed amazement ; sometimes I'd divide,
And burn in many places ; on the topmast,
The yards and bowsprit, would I flame distinctly,
Then meet and join.

The ocean round Bermuda had been long noted for terrific thunderstorms. Sir Walter Raleigh says (Discouerie of Guiana, 1596) "the Bermudas, a hellish sea for thunder, lightning, and storms" ; and Strachey, "These Islands are often afflicted and rent with tempests, great strokes of thunder, lightning and rain, which hath so sundered and torn the rocks and whurried whole quarters of the Island into the maine sea."

In the Tempest thunderstorms play quite an important part.

Act I., Sc. II. :—

Ari. The fire and cracks
Of sulphurous roaring the most mighty Neptune
Seem to besiege, and make his bold waves tremble.

Act II., Sc. II. :—

Trin. If it should thunder as it did before, I know not where to hide my head.

Act III., Sc. III. :—

Alon. and the thunder,
That deep and dreadful organ-pipe, pronounced
The name of Prosper.

Further describing the storm Strachey says, "The sea swelled above the clouds, and gave battel into heaven." And Act I., Sc. II. :—

Mir. The sky, it seems, would pour down stinking pitch,
But that the sea, mounting to the welkin's cheek,
Dashes the fire out.

Just when all seems lost there is a sudden marvellous rescue in both cases. "Sir George Somers, when no man dreamed of such happiness, discovered and cried, Land! The ship fell in between two rocks, where she was fast lodged and locked, and with the present help of our boat, did safely set and convey our men ashore." Act I., Sc. II. :—

Pros. The direful spectacle of the wreck,
I have with much provision in mine art
So safely ordered, that there is no soul,
No, not so much perdition as an hair
Betid to any creature in the vessel.

And Gonzalo, Act II., Sc. I. :—

but for the miracle,
I mean our preservation ; few in millions
Can speak like us.

Strachey remarks of the harbours in Bermuda, "Yea, the Argosies of Venice may ride there with water enough and safe land lockt." And Ariel tells, Act I. :—

Safely in harbour
Is the king's ship ; in the deep nook, where once
Thou calledst me up at midnight to fetch dew
From the still vexed Bermoothes, there she's hid.

The description of the physical characteristics of the island by Strachey, "The Bermudaes be broken islands, 500 of them at least if you may call them all islands that lie how little soever into the sea by themselves," would give the hint for the following in Act II., Sc. I. :—Seb. "I think he will carry this island home in his pocket, and give it to his son for an apple." Ant. "And sowing the kernels of it in the sea, bring forth more islands."

Jourdan says, "For the islands of the Bermudas were never inhabited by any Christian people, but were esteemed and reputed a most prodigious and enchanted place."

Prospero. Act I., Sc. II. :—

Then was this island—
Save for the son which she did litter here,
A freckled whelp, hag-born—not honoured with A human shape.

Continuing, Jourdan says, "Yet did we find the ayre so temperat and the country so abundantly fruitful of all fit necessities for the sustentation and preservation of man's life," and in Act II., Sc. I. we find :—

Adr. Though this island seem to be desert . . .
Uninhabitable, and almost inaccessible—
It must needs be of subtle, tender, and delicate temperance.
The air breathes upon us here most sweetly.
Gon. Here is everything advantageous to life.

Notes.

Next week's Literature will contain a poem by Mr. Austin Dobson—"For a Copy of 'The Compleat Angler.'"

* * * *

We publish elsewhere a letter from the Principal Librarian of New South Wales, from whom we have received a copy of the "Guide to the System of Cataloguing," issued by the Trustees of the Public Library of that colony. It must be a great boon to students, for the most lucid scheme of cataloguing does not seem absolutely lucid to the novice until it is explained. In the main the principle adopted at Sydney seems to be identical with that adopted (and we believe invented) by Mr. G. K. Fortescue for his great subject-index. What the compilers of the old subject-indexes tried to do was to classify human knowledge. The modern principle is that this classification is outside the province of the bibliographer. His business is not to decide, for example, whether bacteriology is a branch of biology, of botany, or of medicine. His arrangement is purely alphabetical; and when the book on bacteriology comes to him, he enters it under the head of bacteriology, and troubles himself no more about it. Experience has proved that subject-indexes put together on these simple lines are far more useful, even to the most advanced students, than the more ambitious bibliographies which preceded them. Turning to a lighter branch of the subject, one notices with satisfaction that the Regulations for Visitors rigidly prohibit the pernicious habits of "smoking in the doorway" and "spitting on the floor," which seems to prove that literature is taken in a properly serious spirit in our Australian colonies.

The general features of the important collection of Hebrew fragments recently acquired by the British Museum are the same as those of the now well-known collections of the University Libraries of Oxford and Cambridge. The original Hebrew text of Ecclesiasticus is represented by two leaves among the fresh fragments, containing large portions of chs. xxxi., xxxvii., and xxxviii. An edition of the newly recovered verses, about forty in number, is now nearly ready for the press, the editor being the Rev. G. Margoliouth, of the British Museum. The collection also contains two autograph responses of Moses Maimonides (ob. 1204) whose works are still held in highest honour among the Jews of both the east and the west. Letters of divorcements, neatly written on parchment, and dated in various years of the eleventh and twelfth centuries, give an interest of a different character to the new acquisitions. There are also many marriage contracts coming from Cairo, Rashid, Damascus, and other places. The great mass of the collection (largely written in Arabic) deals, as may be expected, with Rabbinical law and various controversies, but there are also many fragments of Biblical commentaries in Arabic.

A wide circle of readers will have heard with regret of the death, at the early age of forty-eight, of Mr. J. F. Nisbet. Mr. Nisbet began life as a reporter; he was, at one time, we believe, the fastest shorthand writer in the gallery of the House of Commons. Too good to remain long at such mechanical work, he became the editor of Life (and subsequently of the Morning), and the dramatic critic of The Times, and ultimately found his métier as a writer of causeries on the more serious of the topics of the hour, his principal contributions appearing in the Idler, St. Paul's, and the Referee. He was a slogging writer of robust common sense, who delighted to "penetrate through sophisms and give to conventional illusions their true value," and this tendency had earned him the name of cynic. His philosophy was certainly gloomy, but his writings always stimulated thought. His books on Genius and Insanity, and on Marriage and Heredity excited a good deal of attention; and at the time of his death he had just passed the proofs of another work, to be published almost immediately under the title of "The Human Machine." It is to be feared that overwork was one of the principal causes of Mr. Nisbet's comparatively early death.

The aged widow of Michelet has just died in Paris. The part played by her in the work of her husband for many years would make her death last Sunday night at the age of 73, worthy of note even if she had written nothing herself. The circumstances of her death, as reported by a friend in the Temps, are characteristic. She had preserved the apartment at 75, Rue d'Assas, where she had lived with Michelet, keeping the furniture, books, and papers exactly as they were when he died. There she lived among the souvenirs of the great dead, and there she conceived the centenary celebration of Michelet which, once realized, seemed to relieve her mind of a load and to give her the consoling sense that her work, too, was done. A quarter of a century had gone by and the lodgings had become sadly in need of the visit of the carpenter, and were rapidly becoming unsuitable for habitation. Only after the apotheosis of Michelet at the Pantheon did the faithful wife seem to feel released from her vow. She let the workmen in for repairs. Quand la maison est bâtie la mort vient says the French proverb. It was true for Mme. Michelet. In spite of her friends' advice she lingered to keep faithful watch over the relics, sleeping there amidst the damp air of the fresh plaster. Two weeks ago, when the "cold snap" came, she caught a chill and the affection degenerated into inflammation of the lungs. Born in October, 1826, at Montauban, she made Michelet's acquaintance when he was Professor at the Collège de France. The romantic circumstances of their marriage she herself related last year in the Temps in a letter which we noticed at the time. She had only recently rewritten her will, and has probably bequeathed to the City of Paris for the Musée Carnavalet numerous relics of her husband, besides the portrait of him by Couture which she gave in her lifetime.

Mr. William Brown, Edinburgh, the purchaser of the valuable collection of letters of Sir Walter Scott which was sold recently at Sotheby's, is thinking of making a book out of them. Sir Walter's correspondence with his brother Thomas is specially interesting. The latter was credited by many persons with the authorship of the Waverley novels, and Sir Walter himself, in the general preface to the novels, dated January 1, 1820, alluded to the rumour that his brother was "the Author of 'Waverley'" as the only one which had "some alliance to probability, and indeed might have proved to some extent true," although, as a matter of fact, it was "as unfounded as the others." Sir Walter, it appears, warmly pressed his brother, who was then resident in Canada, to make an experiment as a writer of fiction, and undertook the trouble of correcting and superintending his work as it passed through the press. Thomas Scott was at first well disposed towards the suggestion, and had fixed on a subject and a hero, but the state of his health prevented him from beginning the projected work—not a line of which, it seems, was ever written.

The death of Mr. Birket Foster removes the last link which joined the old school of illustrators with the new. The modern revival of the illustrated book in England began in the early thirties. Turner, Prout, Harding, Roberts, and many others were then illustrating the deluge of "Annual Tours" and "Garlands," with which the literary world was flooded. A reaction set in, and fine book illustrating languished until a renewed interest in it was created by Mr. Foster. Curiously enough, he gained much of his early fame in following Turner and supplying a new set of illustrations for the works of Rogers. One of the last extensive series of illustrations that Mr. Foster was employed upon before devoting himself to water-colour painting was for the edition of Poe's Works, published by Redfield in New York in 1858. These illustrations form a charming series and are quite equal to anything that Mr. Foster ever did. But, besides this, the book referred to forms a noteworthy connexion between the past and the present, for it contains some early work of Sir John Tenniel, who supplied a set of vigorous and suggestive plates for illustrating "The Raven."

In connexion with the death of Mr. Birket Foster, F. E. W. sends us the following lines:—

Limner of beauteous scenes of hill and dale,
Of moor and field and flower and rippling stream;
Of red-roofed hamlet, farm, and wooded vale,
And sunset glow and distant ocean's gleam;

Gone to thy rest art thou—O eye that saw,
O soul that lived true beauty and true art!
O skilful hand, most sweetly skilled to draw
Soft rural scenes that charm the generous heart!

Thou thousands mourn on whom thou didst bestow
The best of all thy heart and hand could give;
Their solace, now that thou art gone, to know
Albeit such worker dies his work doth live.

Mr. G. S. Layard, who is authorized by the family of the late Mrs. Lynn Linton to write her biography, will deem it a great favour if owners of letters, newspaper cuttings, portraits, and any other documents or illustrations germane to the subject, will send them to him at Lorraine Cottage, Malvern. Every care will be taken of them, and they will be returned as soon as they are done with. It need hardly be added that he will also welcome any personal reminiscences that may suggest themselves to our readers.

We regret to learn that "Vailima" has just fallen into alien hands. The purchaser of Robert Louis Stevenson's Samoan home is a Herr Kunst, who has lately been residing in the island. English admiration for the creator of "The Master of Ballantrae" seems to have stopped short at subscribing the £3,000 which formed the selling price of his Pacific resting-place.

The American Critic says that the publishers of the American "Who's Who?" which is being prepared in imitation of the English volume, have been trying to get into communication with De Tocqueville! A reprint of "Democracy in America" has recently been issued, and it seemed to them that the author ought certainly to be included in their work. Mr. Douglas Sladen's compilation is to be imitated even in its defects, we fear. The American one is to be "particularly comprehensive in its inclusion of authors, of the younger as well as of the older generation," which seems to suggest that it will be filled up with the small fry of letters, who will be allowed to give particulars which no one wants, and to cut small jokes about their several recreations.

The Balzac centenary is to be celebrated at Tours on the 6th, 7th, and 8th of next month, and great preparations are being made for it. The French Minister of Education, M. Leygues, is the honorary president of the committee of organization, and he is assisted by the departmental senators and deputies, the Tours local authorities, and by M. Brunetière, M. Claretie, and M. Spœlbech de Lovenjoul, who has long been the authority on Balzac bibliography.

The election of M. Marcel Prévost last week as president of the Société des gens de lettres is memorable. M. Coppée, M. Lemaitre, "Gyp," and a few others bestirred themselves to secure the election of a committee which would make the choice of M. Prévost impossible, for as friend of the avocat Me. Leblois and of M. Zola he was an object of suspicion to the members of the League of the Patrie Française. These manoeuvres failed, but the text of the expression of the new president's speech was not given in the anti-revisionist papers the publicity which it deserved. M. Marcel Prévost said:—

Our political opinions here must remain silent. They must remain silent, but they remain free. If liberty of thought were ever proscribed we should offer it an asylum here. Moreover, when one of our confrères has worked, has written books by which the Society has benefited in its pensions and the aid it offers to the indigent; when this confrère has sat at this table, has given us his time and his labour, if one day he chances to be the victim of changes of opinion, we owe him—we owe it to ourselves—we owe it to the true literary and French tradition not to stir up the mob against him, not to cast stones at him with those hands which he has pressed.

This dignified and fraternal greeting to M. Emile Zola is one of the most pleasing things we have had to record for many weeks in the world of French letters.

M. Maurice Barrès has begun the publication in the Quinzaine for April 1 of portions of the second part of the "Roman de l'Énergie Nationale" which forms the sequel to his "Déracinés," and is to be entitled "L'Appel au Soldat." An editorial note confirms what we said on March 11:—"Considerations of various sorts prevent M. Barrès from publishing at present the whole of his novel. He has kindly extracted from it, however, for our readers this fragment which stands by itself." The Quinzaine, by the way, edited by M. George Fonsegrive, is too little known abroad. It represents the best thought in French liberal Catholicism to-day, and at a time when the Revue des Deux Mondes is becoming more and more reactionary it is gaining from the organ of M. Brunetière a considerable portion of his former clientèle.

The founder and editor of the Revue d'Alsace, M. J. Liblin, has just died at Neuilly, at the age of 87. M. Liblin played a considerable rôle in the intellectual movement which renewed the history and literature of Alsace. When in 1850 he founded the Revue d'Alsace he succeeded in gathering about him a number of authors who did great credit to their province. He published in this review the "Unpublished Works of Grandidier" which, when reprinted, formed six big volumes, very valuable for the history of Alsace. He was on one occasion imprisoned for refusing to submit the Revue d'Alsace to the Imperial censorship. He then transported the headquarters of the review to Belfort and afterwards to Paris.

The town of Bruges is about to pay its tribute to the memory of Georges Rodenbach, the author of "Bruges la Morte." This is to take the form of an obelisk with a medallion portrait of the poet executed by the sculptor, Rodin, to be erected near the Béguinage.

An original one-act play has been seen lately on the stage of the Cracow Theatre. A Polish lady, Marie Zapolska, who is known as a successful playwright, has tried the experiment of writing a drama without a single male character in it. Out of sixteen dramatis persone fourteen are unmarried women who attend a reception at the heroine's on the eve of her wedding. Another einakter, written in celebration of the anniversary of Chopin's ninetieth birthday, brings not only that master himself on to the stage, but George Sand, Heine, Liszt, and other contemporary celebrities. The result has not proved altogether successful.

The Ashburnham manuscripts, which Messrs. Sotheby are to sell on Monday, May 1st, form an important collection. Many of the MSS. are exceedingly rare, and one or two are unique. Among the illustrated manuscripts is a copy of the "Historia von Leiden und Sterben," with seventeen highly finished paintings by Rubens. There is also a finely illuminated copy of Higden's "Polychronicon," dated 1420. Among the Books of Hours and Missals there is a thirteenth century "Pealterium," in double Latin and Anglo-Norman columns, which was originally bequeathed to the Abbey of Whalley in Lancashire by a member of the Legh family, and "Missale Secundum usum Anglicanum," fourteenth century, a beautiful manuscript which at one time belonged to Richard Fitz-james, Bishop of London and Almoner to Henry VIII. Of notable French work there is a choice copy of Froissart's "Chronicles," fifteenth century, in three vols., written in double columns with rubrics and illuminations, "Le Roman de Gauvain," thirteenth century, which formerly belonged to Louis Philippe. There are four fine examples of Eastern calligraphy, the principal being a copy of "Sahib Muslim," a collection of traditions referring to Mahomed, a very rare and beautiful vellum MS. of the eleventh century.

The English section contains three copies of the Chronicle of Brute, all of the fifteenth century, and four Wardrobe-books of the time of Edward I. There are also six copies of the works of Chaucer, none of them, unfortunately, perfect, but three date from the fourteenth century, and were, therefore, written within the poet's lifetime. Another volume, contains a copy of "The Vision of Piers Plowman," circa fourteenth century. This is the famous MS. containing the note, generally attributable to John Ball, which ascribes to Langland the writing of "The Vision." There are also copies of Hoccleve's "Poems," written in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, and his "The Regiment of Princes," fifteenth century, and a copy of Sidney's "Arcadia," sixteenth century. The most interesting among the many fine Bibles and Testaments is an excellent copy of the later version of Wycliffe's Bible, early fifteenth century. This volume contains 404 folios, which have been carefully collated with the Royal MS. of the same Bible. For a long time this valuable manuscript was in the possession of the Davenports, an old Cheshire family living at Bramhall, near Stockport. It was ultimately sold by one of the members of that family, and it is of interest in regard to this collection, for it was the last MS. purchased by the late Earl of Ashburnham.

On April 27 Messrs. Sotheby will sell an important collection of the minor works of R. L. Stevenson, many of which are but rarely seen. These were given by the author to his mother and are being sold by order of her executor. The most noticeable entries in the catalogue comprise a copy of the original unpublished leaflet edition of "Kidnapped," "Father Damien," the original Sydney Edition, 1890, the scarce "Notice of a New Form of Intermittent Light for Lighthouses," 1871 (four copies), several copies of "The Pentland Rising," 1866, "Black Canyon," an extremely scarce brochure of four leaves, printed by the author at Davos-Platz, and the single leaf of the "advertisement" of the same pamphlet, which, if anything, is scarcer still. It has been said of one of these Davos pamphlets, a little four-page pamphlet lettered "The Marguerite, Lawks! What a beautiful flower!! T. S." is unique, and in the collection of a well-known London amateur, but no fewer than eight other copies figure in the catalogue. The "T. S." stands for Thomas Stevenson, the author's father, and Robert Louis used to say that it was the only "poetry" he was ever guilty of. It is curious that collectors should be prepared to pay such high prices for trifles which have only a sentimental interest. Among the other entries in this catalogue we notice "The Graver and the Pen," "A Martial Elegy for some Lead Soldiers," and "Moral Emblems."

Mr. Paul M. Chapman calls our attention to a remark made by a correspondent in our last issue as to a poem of Meredith called "The Meeting." Our correspondent said that it must be very little known "even to the Meredith enthusiasts." He has met it "by chance" in Once a Week.

It is [says Mr. Chapman] known by heart to all "Meredith enthusiasts," and appears in due place amongst his poems "Modern Love and Poems of the English Roadside, &c." (Chapman and Hall), 1862. I think we are all agreed that we should welcome an edition of Meredith's poems, reproducing the (very well known) illustrations by Rossetti, Sandys, C. Keene, Millais, and others.

The Canadian Society of Authors has now formulated its demands for the amendment of the laws governing copyright in the Dominion. Reduced to its lowest terms, the request practically amounts to this: that, when authors have made arrangements with Canadian publishers for the production of Canadian editions of their works, the importation into Canada of editions printed elsewhere shall be prohibited. This, of course, is a very different proposal from that understood at one time to convey the irreducible minimum of the Canadian publishers' demands; and, provided that no attempt is made to coerce the British author into contracting with a Canadian publisher, when it suits his interest better to supply the Canadian market with sheets printed at home or in the United States, no objection need be taken to it on his behalf. The question, in short, becomes a purely domestic one, concerning only the Canadians themselves.

The Canadians whose interests are affected are the four classes of authors, publishers, booksellers, and book-buyers. The publishers' views are expressed in the proposal summarized; for, as we have more than once pointed out, the Canadian Authors' Society is, on its business side, merely a publishers' (or printers') association. As regards the interests of the three other classes, in Canada, which the suggested legislation would affect, we have received an interesting letter from "A Canadian Bookseller." Our correspondent writes:—

As a Canadian bookseller I am naturally interested in anything affecting or likely to affect the business of book-selling. I am therefore urged, both by reasons practical and sentimental, to call the attention of British authors and publishers to the extraordinary interest which our newly-formed "Society of Canadian Authors" is taking in the question of Canadian copyright. It is very curious that the sympathy and energy of this society should be devoted almost exclusively to the interests, not of Canadian authors, but to those of Canadian publishers.

Under present conditions the Canadian author has perfect protection not only in his own country but throughout the Empire, and it is not clear in what way he is to be benefited by a copyright law that would prevent the importation of English editions. Do not the most successful Canadian writers first seek the English market? Is not their success in that country an almost certain indication that they will succeed here? And, conversely, if they do not succeed there they are little likely to fare much better in their own land. One may safely assume that Canadian publishers will run eagerly after the successful author, no matter from what land he comes. As a consequence the Canadian author who is unknown to fame is even less likely to succeed in his own country than he was before. It is also to be feared that, should an Act such as the "Society of Canadian Authors" is so strenuously working for become law, the Canadian public would have to pay considerably more for "light literature" than it now does. Supposing the Colonial editions which are now so general in all Canadian book shops were prohibited, is it likely that Canadian publishers would continue to issue paper editions of popular authors? I believe not, and for two reasons; in the first place, the relatively small editions which Canadian publishers issue make it difficult to produce a book that will yield even a moderate profit to the publisher. It is to the cloth bound copy that he looks to make his profit, and if it was not for the competition of the Colonial editions few paper copies of popular authors would appear. Regarding the finer and more elaborate works, such as "In the Forbidden Land," "Farthest North," &c., we are faced with a difficulty still more serious. Should an inexpensive edition of such works as these be issued in Canada, we should be compelled to accept it, no matter how inferior this edition might be.

As far as I am aware, British authors are not specially complaining of their neglect in this country; but, if they are content, our Authors' Society is not, and insists with great fervour that they (the British authors) would reap a rich harvest here if only Canadian publishers were given complete control of their works. Possibly there is a good deal in the argument, if only the negotiations could be carried on directly between the English author and the Canadian publisher, but this I fear is not at all what our publishers want. They have too small a field for experiments, and what they are looking for is your successful book, and to find this one must wait. But when success comes, quick action must come on the part of our publisher, and as a consequence the arrangement must be with the American publisher and not with the English owner of copyright, who is too far away. Thus it is to be seen that English authors will be advised to leave the arrangements for Canadian editions in the hands of their American publishers, and as a result the territory which justly belongs to the English publisher will be divided between the American and Canadian publishers—and, mark you, not in part as at present, but entirely, as the English editions are to be excluded. I believe Canadian booksellers have much to lose by the proposed change. At present they can sell any English book published, and at a fair margin of profit, and more than that, the very thing which makes our shops so interesting to American tourists and so profitable to us, is that we can show them ever so many things they never see in their own country. In conclusion, I would say that the only people certain to profit by the proposed change are the Canadian and American publishers, while almost certain loss will be incurred by English publishers and authors, and Canadians, both booksellers and the general public.

If there were any likelihood that the Colonial office would be frightened from the straight path of justice by the feeling that Canadian opinion was unanimous against it, the perusal of this letter should be sufficient for the most timorous of officials.

American Letter.

A CASE IN POINT.

The question of expansion in American fiction lately agitated by a lady novelist of Chicago with more vehemence than power, and more courage than coherence, seems to me again palpitant in the case of a new book by a young writer, which I feel obliged at once to recognize as altogether a remarkable book. Whether we shall abandon the old-fashioned American idea of a novel as something which may be read by all ages and sexes, or the European notion of it as something fit only for age and experience, and for men rather than women; whether we shall keep to the bounds of the provincial proprieties, or shall include within the Imperial territory of our fiction the passions and the motives of the savage world which underlies as well as environs civilization, are points which this book sums up and puts concretely; and it is for the reader, not for the author, to make answer. There is no denying the force with which he makes the demand, and there is no denying the hypocrisies which the old-fashioned ideal of the novel involved. But society, as we have it, is a tissue of hypocrisies, beginning with the clothes in which we hide our nakedness, and we have to ask ourselves how far we shall part with them at his demand. The hypocrisies are the proprieties, the decencies, the morals; they are by no means altogether bad; they are, perhaps, the beginning of civilization; but whether they should be the end of it is another affair. That is what we are to consider in entering upon a career of Imperial expansion in a region where the Monroe Doctrine was never valid. From the very first Europe invaded and controlled in our literary world. The time may have come at last when we are to invade and control Europe in literature. I do not say that it has come, but if it has we may have to employ European means and methods.

It ought not to be strange that the impulse in this direction should have come from California, where, as I am always affirming rather than proving, a continental American fiction began. I felt, or fancied I felt, the impulse in Mr. Frank Norris' "Moran of the Lady Letty," and now in his "McTeague." I am so sure of it that I am tempted to claim the prophetic instinct of it. In the earlier book there were, at least, indications that forecast to any weather-wise eye a change from the romantic to the realistic temperature, and in the later we have it suddenly and with the overwhelming effect of a blizzard. It is saying both too much and too little to say that Mr. Norris has built his book on Zolaesque lines, yet Zola is the master of whom he reminds you in a certain epical conception of life. He reminds you of Zola also in the lingering love of the romantic, which indulges itself at the end in an anti-climax worthy of Dickens. He ignores as simply and sublimely as Zola any sort of nature or character beyond or above those of Polk-street in San Francisco, but within the ascertained limits he convinces you two-thirds of the time of his absolute truth to them. He does not, of course, go to Zola's lengths, breadths, and depths; but he goes far enough to difference his work from the old-fashioned American novel.

Polite readers of the sort who do not like to meet in fiction people of the sort they never meet in society will not have a good time in "McTeague," for there is really not a society person in the book. They might, indeed, console themselves a little with an elderly pair of lovers on whom Mr. Norris wreaks all the sentimentality he denies himself in the rest of the story; and as that sort of readers do not mind murders as much as vulgarity they may like to find three of them not much varying in atrocity. Another sort of readers will not mind the hero's being a massive blond animal, not necessarily bad, though brutal, who has just wit enough to pick up a practical knowledge of dentistry and to follow it as a trade; or the heroine's being a little, pretty, delicate daughter of German-Swiss emigrants, perfectly common in her experiences and ideals, but devotedly industrious, patient, and loyal. In the chemistry of their marriage McTeague becomes a prepotent ruffian, with always a base of bestial innocence, and Trina becomes a pitiless miser without altogether losing her housewifely virtues or ceasing to feel a woman's rapture in giving up everything but her money to the man who maltreats her more and more and finally murders her.

This is rendering in coarse outline the shape of a story realized with a fulness which the outline imparts no sense of. It abounds in touches of character at once fine and free, in little miracles of observation, in vivid insight, in simple, and subtle expression. Its strong movement carries with it a multiplicity of detail which never clogs it; the subordinate persons are never shabbed or faked; in the equality of their treatment their dramatic inferiority is lost; their number is great enough to give the feeling of a world revolving round the central figures without distracting the interest from these. Among the minor persons, Maria Macapa, the Mexican chorewoman, whose fable of a treasure of gold turns the head of the Polish Jew Zerkow, is done with rare imaginative force. But all these lesser people are well done, and there are passages throughout the book that live strongly in the memory, as only masterly work can live. The one folly is the insistence on the love-making of those silly elders which is apparently introduced as an offset to the misery of the other love-making; the anti-climax is McTeague's abandonment in the alkali desert, handcuffed to the dead body of his enemy.

Mr. Norris has, in fact, learned his lesson well, but he has not learned it all. His true picture of life is not true, because it leaves beauty out. Life is squalid and cruel and vile and hateful, but it is noble and tender and pure and lovely too. By-and-by he will put these traits in, and then his powerful scene will bear reflection of reality; by-and-by he will achieve something of the impartial fidelity of the photograph. In the meantime he has done a picture of life which has form, which has texture, which has colour, which has what great original power and ardent study of Zola can give, but which lacks the spiritual light and air, the consecration which the larger art of Tolstoy gives. It is a little inhuman, and it is distinctly not for the walls of living-rooms, where the ladies of the family sit and the children go in and out. This may not be a penalty, but it is the inevitable consequence of expansion in fiction.

BOOK BINDINGS AT SOUTH KENSINGTON MUSEUM.

The Museum possesses but few bindings—about 325 only—but it has a goodly collection of rubbings from bindings, diligently gathered from the principal libraries at home and abroad. As the books in these libraries are not accessible to the many, a great boon has been conferred upon students and lovers of books by means of such a collection. To make this readily available, a good catalogue was necessary, and in 1894 Part II. was issued officially at the moderate price of 1s. 6d. This part contained an explanatory enumeration of both books and rubbings, under the heads of the several countries whose work the Museum possessed, and it is the only book of reference dealing with early stamped bindings. This part appeared without preface, but it was understood at the time that a proper introduction would be forthcoming in due course. Art, however, is long, and "in due time," in the case of the National Art Library, meant about five years. Those who admired and studied old bindings heartily welcomed the contribution to their knowledge and assistance to their researches embodied in Part II. of the Museum Catalogue, and it filled a gap and became a standard work of reference. To make this complete, a preliminary dissertation was needed, and the introduction which was to fill Part I. of the Catalogue has at length come to light.

The protracted delay, in such an institution as the South Kensington Museum, could be accounted for only by reason of the extra care and elaboration required for the production of a complete and exhaustive disquisition on the art of bookbinding, as exemplified in the various countries enumerated in Part II. of the Catalogue. It is therefore somewhat disappointing to find an obviously unfinished work published as if it were complete. And what we get makes us naturally desire more. We have been accustomed to vain repetitions for a great many years on the subject of early book-bindings. A multiplying of writers did not mean a multiplication of facts, but the same story told over and over again. There was little encouragement for students. By students we mean not only the numerous band who attend the art library, but also the larger world outside addicted to old books and every part of them. The information conveyed in the new publication is undoubtedly a boon, but at the risk of making an unpleasant comparison, we must say that had the introduction emanated from the British Museum it would have been complete in all its parts and details—and not an unfinished production.

We have first a terse but comprehensive general introduction to the art, combining facts which ought to be known, with dogmatic teaching which the writer is evidently well qualified to give. Then there are short treatises on the earlier bindings in England, the Netherlands, and France—which are dealt with in a satisfactory manner and contain information quite new to students—for instance, a curious statement as to the suppression by foreign binders of the apocrypha in Bibles given to them to bind. But Germany and Italy appear to have scant measure meted out to them. The latter in particular is summarized so much as not to touch upon some important details. Nothing is said, for instance, as to the influence of Eastern art on that of Italy and particularly on Venetian designs, although there is in the South Kensington Museum a collection of stamps and tools which have been used in Persia for bookbinding. It would seem as if it had been intended to amplify the articles on Italy and Germany before publication. Scandinavia, Poland, Hungary, Croatia, Serbia, and Armenia are just noticed; but Turkey, Spain, and Portugal are not named, though examples are given in Part II. Scotland and Ireland may be regarded as included in the introductory remarks on England.

We now come to a very weak point in the Catalogue as now presumed to be perfect—the illustrations. Many are merely repetitions of those already given in Part II., and the rest are most unequally appropriated—in fact they are mostly illustrative of details of French bindings. From certain internal evidences it would appear as if the Museum had become possessed of a “job lot” of clichés, and that these had to be written up to. Why else should such a number of illustrations of French bindings be crowded in, whilst other countries are left unadorned? Nor is the character of these good enough to warrant such a “coup de main.” Moreover, proper care and intelligence have not been shown; observe, for example, cut No. 2 on p. 113 and cut 5 on p. 124.

Part II. of the Catalogue started well with a fair number of reproductions of the marks used on various bindings, thus enabling the student to identify them by the binder's initials or trade-mark. It would, however, have been better if the reproductions had been by a photographic process. We looked for these being supplemented in the introduction by woodcuts reproducing a fair number of the distinctive bindings of each country, typical examples, in fact. But they are not here. Above all, the index is poor; there should, of course, have been a really good one—the value of which to students of all sorts is too well known to require enforcement here. To criticize it in detail would be tiresome. It has been done inartistically and over-classified.

It remains to say that, whilst we are more than satisfied with the text of the portions of introduction which are given to us, we cannot regard it as creditable to the Museum to publish such a partial and incomplete series of monographs.

FROM THE MAGAZINES.

In the Contemporary Mr. Clement Shorter's article on illustrated journalism is worthy of so accomplished an expert on the subject. He traces it from the appearance in London of the “Swedish Intelligencer” in 1632 to that epoch in pictorial journalism the foundation of the Illustrated London News two hundred and ten years later with an interesting review of contemporary illustrated papers and a glance at the future. Here is a word of consolation for those who regret the death of wood engraving:—

Sir John Gilbert and his contemporaries drew their illustrations on the wood and sent the blocks direct to the engraver. Thus it happens that, as Sir John Gilbert on one occasion told me with regret, not a single one of his beautiful drawings for the Illustrated London News is in existence. The innovation of photographing the drawing on the wood left the drawing intact for artist or newspaper proprietor—a valuable asset in the case of a great artist.

This, too, is hopeful for the future:—

So large a part of life, and particularly of public life, cannot be depicted by the camera. It has, it is true, been seen in the battlefield, and now and again in the church; but I am inclined to believe that there will always be a place for the artist in illustrated journalism, for the war-artist who makes rough sketches at the seat of war, and for the elaborate black-and-white draughtsman who works at home. Not only on the battlefield is the artist indispensable, but the Royal wedding, the Royal christening, the public funeral in the Abbey, and a thousand other functions dear to the heart of the public, belong to him alone.

The immense Sunday issues of the New York World or the New York Journal would not, Mr. Shorter thinks, ever be popular here:—

There will, however, no doubt be produced in this country journals approximating to the other Sunday papers of New York—to the New York Times and the New York Tribune, for example. With each of these is given week by week a supplement about the size of the Illustrated London News, less excellently printed and on inferior paper, it is true, and well-nigh entirely composed of photographs. It is perfectly certain that ten years from now this kind of journalism—the journalism of the supplement, one might call it—will be a universally recognized factor in journalistic London.

We miss, by the way, in Mr. Shorter's review, any mention of the defunct Pictorial World, founded, we think, by Mr. Vizetelly, which contained good work.

Blackwood's and Macmillan's both have a good programme of contents on a variety of subjects, but their more purely literary contents are confined to reviews of books. In the latter Mr. S. Gwynn writes agreeably on Mr. Doyle's “Susan Ferrier” —

Immortality [he says] is freely claimed for authors who have very much less to show for it than a lady who has amused four generations of readers. If she had been content to do that her fame might rest secure; but, unhappily, she was possessed with the desire to convey moral instruction, and that has overlaid her humour and her genuine faculty of creation with a dead weight of platitudes under which they must inevitably sink.

Another attack on Sir George Trevelyan's “American Revolution” is contributed by Mr. J. W. Fortescue, who describes it bluntly as “a party pamphlet which can please few and profit none.” Blackwood's has what seems to us a somewhat excessively severe criticism of Dr. Knapp's praiseworthy “George Borrow,” and a minute appreciative investigation, the authorship of which most readers will recognize, of Mr. Hume Brown's “History of Scotland.” We hope the very capable editors of these magazines will pardon us for expressing a regret that literature should only be recognized in the form of reviews of recent books which, in most cases, the daily and weekly journals have dealt with copiously already. Of course a monthly magazine gives scope for a closer and more leisurely examination of books of importance, and this may be very useful; it is so, we admit, in the case of both magazines this month. But we feel a little disappointment when we find none of those stimulating studies in general literary history or criticism so often found in these and similar magazines of a high class. Of the articles of a general character the Thames as a game fish river in Blackwood's should be read by all London fishermen, and that on the “Nevada Silver Boom” is highly interesting. So is “A Night in a Hospital” and “With a Camel Post to Damascus” in Macmillan's.

We are glad to see in the National Review Sir Frederick Pollock's scholarly sketch of King Alfred's career which he recently gave as a discourse at the Royal Institution, now put before a wider public. This is his view of the extent of Alfred's learning:—

The many duties and distractions of the King's office left him but little time to pursue letters for himself, though he did much to make them accessible to others; much less, certainly, than he wished for. He preferred, it seems, to have some one to read to him if possible; but this may be intended only of Latin. There is nothing, so far as I know, to show that he could write with ease, or wrote much. He may have been but little better as a penman than Charles the Great. He learnt Latin, probably from Asser, in the later and more settled part of his reign; but he cannot have known it like a trained clerk. Our present Sovereign Lady, acting quite in the spirit of her great ancestor, is said to have attained a competent mastery of Hindustani. But Latin, apart from the difference of alphabet, is a much harder language than Hindustani, and the Queen, though her life is busy enough, is not called upon to administer all her departments and command her frontier expeditions in person. . . . In the translations of Latin books which bear Alfred's name, the English was, no doubt, largely dictated by him; but, as I read his preface to the earliest of them, he did not trust himself alone with Latin. He got the sense—a "construe," in fact—from his learned men, and then put it into such English as he chose himself. . . . It would be absurd to think of him as a scholar like Henry II., who could not only read but criticize Latin charters. On the other hand, the copious English additions, often characteristic, were beyond question made by Alfred's personal direction, and they may well be in his very words.

The centenary of Poushkin's birth, which takes place on May 26th next, lends appropriateness to a sketch in Temple Bar of the career of that wild and erratic Russian genius, whose strangely conflicting qualities are traced to the blue blood which came to him from his father, and the negro origin of his mother. Another paper treats of Hartley Coleridge—a somewhat unduly neglected poet. Without the perseverance needed to ensure fame and success, he had a charming personality:—

He lived and died among the country folk of Cumberland, and they rated him far more highly than they did Wordsworth, who, in spite of all his efforts to reproduce their life in his poetry, never became their intimate friend as Hartley did; in fact, practically remained a stranger to them all his life. It was Hartley Coleridge, not Wordsworth, who was to be found in the cottages, at the sheep-shearings, in the village school. They turned from the "desolate-minded man," as one of them described him, to "li'le Hartley, who always had a bit of a smile or a twinkle in his face," while "Wordsworth was not lovable in the face by no means." They missed, as we all do, the sense of humour in their great poet. "His poetry had no laugh in it, quite different work from li'le Hartley"; "Hartley ud goa running along beside o' the brooks and mak' his, and goa in the first open door, and write what he had got upo' paper." If Wordsworth had the greater share of their respect, "a man folks thowt a deal of in the dale, he was such a well-meaning, decent, quiet man," "li'le Hartley" had their hearts.

Students of early Renaissance literature will read with interest Mr. Norley Chester's article in the Gentleman's Magazine on "Early Tuscan Poets," more especially Latini, Guinicelli, Cavalcanti, and Cino—"respectively the Tutor, the Father (in a literary sense), the Friend of Youth, and the Friend of Manhood" to Dante. Another interesting paper gives an account of the publisher round whom gathered the early French romanticists—Eugène Renduel, who produced the masterpieces of Lamennais, Paul Lacroix, Alphonse Karr and Eugène Sue, and fought their literary battles for Victor Hugo, Sainte Beuve, Gautier, the two De Mussets, and Gérard de Nerval.

Canon Hayman has, in the Sunday Magazine, an ingenious little study of Burns' "To a Mountain Daisy," which, by a strict application of the principles of the "higher criticism," he conclusively proves to be the work of two writers, B1 and B2, with traces of that of the compiler, C. He concludes, after producing his evidence:—

"Where," as in the case before us, "the differences are," in proportion to the very slight bulk of the whole, "at once numerous, recurrent, and systematic, they may be regarded as conclusive evidence that the compositions in which they occur are not the work of one and the same author."

Here, and elsewhere in the article, the phrases put in inverted commas "are from the valuable article of Professor S. R. Driver on 'Genesis' in his enumeration of the characteristics which distinguish P of the critics from their J or J E." It is an instructive essay in the method of theological controversy begun by Archbishop Whateley.

FICTION.

A Double Thread. By Ellen Thorneycroft Fowler. 8x5½in., 376 pp. London, 1899. Hutchinson. 6/-

We doubt whether the expectations which readers of this novel will have formed from Miss Ellen Thorneycroft Fowler's well-deserved reputation, and from the reception which the book has received from reviewers dazzled by its brilliant conversations, will always succeed in justifying themselves. It is hardly necessary so far to consider the susceptibilities of those who have not yet read the novel as to conceal the fact that the two sisters, one rich and the other poor, on whose love for the same man the story is founded, are one and the same person. It is an ingenious idea, which, however, will not be quite new to any one who read a story in one of the magazines a month or two ago by the same writer. It is worked out to its final dénouement with very great skill, and Miss Fowler makes full use of her quick play of fancy and wit in the telling of it. Her merit is that though her writing is "smart" in its unwearying cleverness, and frequently deserves to be called brilliant, it is very seldom strained or affected; her wit very seldom, if ever, over-reaches itself, and her people talk spontaneously enough, and, in fact, just as clever people do talk. Our complaint is that at least a quarter of the talk in the book has nothing whatever to do with the story and does nothing to help out the characters, so that as the plot grows more interesting we want less of it and on the contrary get rather more; that when the revelation of the identity of Ethel and Elfrida has once been made, instead of having the curtain rung down we still have a third of the book to get through, during the perusal of which much of the freshness and zest of the story vanishes; and, lastly, that many of the characters show little careful insight or observation. Miss Harland, the heroine, has no individuality, and, indeed, the way in which Miss Fowler tells the story prevents her from having any, inasmuch as through two-thirds of the book she is "two ladies rolled into one," and each of these ladies is entirely different from the other in manners and temper. Excellent as are the pages of provincial gossip, the Welfords, as provincial types, seem to us crudely drawn; Percy Welford, the prig, we do not believe in, and the transformation of his sister Julia at the end of the book makes much too large a demand on our credulity. Mr. Cartwright, the ideal parson, with a romantic history, comes alarmingly near being a bore—though his love story in the past is delightfully told—and we are at a loss to understand why, if he meant to go out as a missionary to lepers, he should choose the moment at which he was offered a Bishopric for doing so. And we entirely refuse to believe that so clever a girl as Miss Harland should have convinced herself that he was going to propose to her, and should have expressed "consternation"—in her face—when she found that he never had any idea of doing so. On the other hand, the hero, Jack Le Mesurier, his uncle Sir Roger, and a loquacious gardener, are well pictured. Miss Fowler has such very high gifts as a writer of fiction that we wish she would always make her characters as consistent and well thought out as these are. Something she still lacks, in the structure of her story and of its dramatis personæ, to enable her to rank with the higher artists of fiction. But we freely confess that the excellence of her writing makes most of her book delightful reading. She is genial and sympathetic without being futile, and witty without being cynical.

One of the Grenvilles. By Sidney Royse Lysaght. 8x5½in., 490 pp. London, 1899. Macmillan. 6/-

Here is a novel that calls for some little notice, as being the work of a (comparatively) unknown hand, and as displaying qualities all too rare in the bulk of modern fiction. A book conceived in a larger mould than usual—there is a good deal of reading in four hundred and ninety pages—it is never tiresome. Mr. Lysaght is fortunate in his characters, who are many in number and excellently well chosen to illustrate his view of life. They are well drawn, too, with humorous perception and a keen insight into human conduct. The household of Sir Parkes Macey (not forgetting the colonial Bishop) is delineated with a succession of delightfully satirical touches; the character of Captain Grenville, on the other hand, is handled with an affectionate sympathy that repels any accusation of cynicism. Mr. Lysaght has no laboured cleverness, no affectation of literary mannerisms; but there is a well-ordered strength and simplicity about his style, with now and then a pleasant shock of novelty or some illuminating phrase that strikes with unexpected power. He has the art, too, of leaving pictures that imprint themselves upon the mind. There are certain scenes in this book, as that of the old sailor's death on board the Pegasus, which are touched with just that preservative sentiment: it leaves a distinct impression such as few modern descriptions give. Indeed, there is nothing cheap or tawdry about Mr. Lysaght's effects. At present his fault appears to lie rather in the direction of incoherence. Possibly there is too much material here for a single story; the love affairs are many and complicated, and although the author comes triumphantly through his difficulties at the finish, and the sentimental reader is gratified by a pleasing rearrangement of hearts, it is only accomplished with difficulty and by rather violent means. For all that, "One of the Grenvilles" is a good novel—one of the best we have seen for a considerable time. It comes near to being a great novel. Perhaps Mr. Lysaght's next venture will produce that rarest of birds. He has little to learn in the essentials of his art.

A DAUGHTER OF THE VINE, by Gertrude Atherton (Service and Paton, 6s.), belongs to what Mrs. Atherton calls her "Californian Series," of which "American Wives and English Husbands" was the immediate predecessor. It tells, with no little brilliancy and grip, of the degradation and horror of dipsomania. This is the "note" of the book. Mrs. Atherton opens her story with some delightful sketches of Californian life in the early sixties—in the land, where there are at least sixteen different climates to choose from, where every one is gay, every girl is a queen, and, for a time, every goose a swan. Mr. Randolph is an Englishman with all the uncalculating hospitality of a Californian of his period; Nina Randolph is the belle par excellence of San Francisco where every girl is a beauty. But, as Captain Hastings tells his English friend, Dudley Thorpe, there is something behind the scenes in the Randolph household, and we are soon on the track of it. An admirably-written scene between Nina and Thorpe shows us how at first she symbolizes to him the hope and joy and individualism of the New World; but she tells him of the wickedness of the people of California and demonstrates at once her queer weakness and her extraordinary charm. In this part of the book the author holds the reader for every page; the characters are clear and human, the heroine is subtle and impressive. As the particular appetite which has been implanted in Nina by her mother grows into an all-absorbing passion, the story darkens and the lilt of the joie de vivre, which added an engaging charm to the earlier chapters, fades, and an air of desolation and remorse haunts every incident. "A Daughter of the Vine," notwithstanding some unconvincing incidents, some lacunæ in the development of the characters, is a really engrossing novel. Good and interesting as this book is, we have no doubt that Mrs. Atherton will yet give us a more concentrated novel of manners, for even when this work is at its weakest it is full of abundant promise.

Those who have unlimited time at their disposal and can afford to read carefully and patiently will probably find LIFE AT TWENTY (Heinemann, 6s.) a much better book than the title would lead them to suppose. Those who buy novels with a view to amusing themselves easily for a few spare hours will very soon lay it down with a sigh, for, to tell the honest truth, there is more exercise than relaxation in the perusing of these pages. Mr. Charles Russell Morse is distinctly clever. It is impossible to read his book without perceiving that we are in the company of a man well-informed above the average, gifted with acute perception, and with a certain turn for epigram. Only, after a time, the constant display of erudition—several of the characters are members of a scientific society—and the persistent touches of psychological observation with which he ornaments his character-drawing tend to become wearisome. It is evident that Mr. Morse has read his Meredith to some purpose. He has not only caught his tricks of style (many of his paragraphs reproduce all Mr. Meredith's mannerisms with a distressing fidelity), but he has acquired something of his model's insight into character. His people are painted laboriously, but they are not altogether puppets. Now and again, amidst a wilderness of mere verbal cleverness, Mr. Morse will produce an illuminating sentence, a phrase that reveals something new and true. The chief complaint against his book is one not often preferred in these days of easy writing—it is overloaded with material. There is too much psychology, too much general information, too many characters. None but a determined reader will survive to the end; even the elect will find, in all likelihood, that the effort has not left them with any very clear idea of the contents. It is an exasperating book, but it shows promise.

LONE PINE, by R. B. Townshend (Methuen, 6s.). Mr. Townshend's name is new to us, but in "Lone Pine" he has achieved a distinct success within the limits which he has proposed for himself. In a simple if occasionally too slangy style he beguiles the reader with a rattling story of New Mexican life. These are new pastures for the novelist. Mr. Townshend writes of a life and of peoples with whom he is obviously well acquainted (and yet muchas gracias is hardly the Spanish for "many thanks"). The first chapter introduces us to the Indian pueblo of Santiago, and is skilfully devised to interest us in the love affairs of two young members of that naïve, self-restrained, and yet passionate people, who combine so many domestic virtues with so terrible a cruelty and cunning. The habits of these Indians, equally obnoxious to the Anglo-Saxon race in their hatred of strangers and their methods of warfare, are cleverly thrown into contrast by the character of Stevens, Turquoise-eyes they called him, an "American prospector who has come along to wake up the fertile, fossilised territory of New Mexico by finding a long-disused mine. The Indians receive him as a friend, and he renders them great services, but, by reason of their terrible memories of Spanish cruelties and slavery in the mines, they jealously guard the secret of that mine which the prospector is seeking.

"Gold," said Tostado, one of the chiefs, as Stephens sat in the midst of them on the occasion of his first visit, "we ask you what sort of life you live, and you answer us that you live only to search for gold. Why here is the gold. You carry it with you," and with a reverent grace the fine old chief laid his dark fingers gently on the long yellow locks that flowed down from under the prospector's wide sombrero.

But, in spite of those yellow locks and turquoise eyes, the hero does not immediately command our sympathy, and he has an irritating trick of soliloquy. Presently, however, as the love of Manuelita, the velvet-eyed daughter of Don Nepomuceno, a wealthy Spanish Mexican, grows upon him the contrast between the passionate hearts of the sons and daughters of Mexico, the Children of the Sun, and those of the Americans, the chill of whose frozen North has eaten into the very marrow of their bones, begins to disappear, so that, at last, the hero proves himself as ardent a lover as he has already been shown a staunch friend and a splendid fighter. And as a fighter he leaves nothing to be desired, even by the most blood-thirsty of old maids. That single-handed conflict with eleven Indians makes our pulses beat quicker. Grimm's Tailor, with his Seven at one Blow, was nothing to it. We take our leave of Mr. Townshend with the hope that he will work this vein further and give us before long another tale of Indian life.

THE TREASURY OFFICER'S WOOING, by Cecil Lewis (Macmillan, 6s.), gives a capital picture of official life in Burma. The native element—dacoits and all—comes in occasionally to make the thing more convincing and to remove an inconvenient character by assassination. But the chief interest lies with the Europeans, whose loves and jealousies, marriages and attempts at marriage, go on much as if the Burmese forest were in Mayfair. The style is clear, simple, and good, and the dialogue not particularly brilliant, but always easy and true to life.

It seems early to be presented with a story of the recent war between America and Spain. An artist would have preferred to wait a little longer, to let his impressions settle down and actual history be sufficiently forgotten to give fiction a fair chance to compete with it. Mr. M. P. Shiel—for whatever inartistic reason—has thought it better to be absolutely up to date, and rushes out, first in the field, with CONTRABAND OF WAR (Grant Richards, 6s.). It is not a bad story. But it is not quite so good as the narratives of actual events now appearing in the American magazines; and we can detect none of those touches of human nature which might compensate for this inferiority.

In THE COUNTESS TEKLA (Methuen, 6s.) Mr. Robert Barr has an excellent story to tell, and works it out with great skill, on the whole, though an occasional heaviness of style a little handicaps him. We think perforce of the charm Mr. Anthony Hope would have bestowed upon the masquerading Emperor—a charm which is somehow absent from Mr. Robert Barr's gallant Rodolph. Countess Tekla is better, and when she wheedles her bearish old uncle she is irresistible. Altogether, the book makes good reading, and kept our interest steadily up to the grand final scene where the Emperor claims his own and the hand of Tekla with it.

Miss Lily Dougall, the talented authoress of so many successful novels, has given us in THE MORMON PROPHET (Black, 6s.) a half historical, half imaginative account of Joseph Smith, the real founder of the Mormon sect. But, to be frank, we cannot say that she has succeeded in interesting us in her hero.

MISS NANSE, by Sarah Tytler (Long, 3s. 6d.), is a pleasant volume, having decided affinities with Mr. Oliphant's stories and with the immortal "Cranford." It abounds in quietly charming descriptions of the two old Scotch gentlewomen who, in their fallen fortunes, take to high-class dressmaking, while for those who find such subjects tame there is a villain and a well-managed mystery.

THINGS THAT HAVE HAPPENED, by Dorothea Gerard (Methuen, 6s.), is a readable collection of short stories, some of them in the author's best manner. The first story is the most humorous. Its picture of the impecunious French geniuses would make an excellent little lever de rideau. A few of the tales are very slight, but worth reading for their pleasant style. It is certainly a curious coincidence that Madame Longard de Longgarde should, in "Paula's Caprice," have hit upon almost precisely the same central idea as Guy de Maupassant in "Les Bijoux," but involuntary plagiarisms of the sort have happened before, and it would have injured the little volume to omit so fascinating a story as Paula's. Her husband is, perhaps, the most human and sympathetic character in the book.

There is something about the manner of Mr. G. B. Burgin's writing that is sufficiently akin to humour to deceive the careless reader. He has caught the trick of disguising the most commonplace remarks so that they acquire an air of originality. His characters seldom say anything smart or illuminating, but we feel that this is merely because of their wonderful self-restraint; they could astonish us if they chose, but they have schooled themselves to talk like conventional people. It is well for Mr. Burgin that he has this faculty, for it gives a certain flavour even to so unsatisfactory a story as THE HERMITS OF GRAY'S INN (Pearson, 6s.). Were it not for a constant feeling that he is on the brink of something comic no reader would care to wade through a volume so full of false sentiment and forced situations. The central idea of the book—that of a brotherhood of confirmed bachelors—extorted its last smile, one would imagine, several decades since; and the humour afforded by Mrs. Pag, the laundress, and her son Simon, is of the thinnest description. Thin as it is, however, we prefer Mr. Burgin's humour to his pathos. The love-story of Colin and Eunice gives a welcome touch of freshness to the book.

BORROW AND GIFFORD.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—In Dr. Knapp's elaborate work upon George Borrow there is a statement of some interest to readers of "Lavengro." Borrow came to London in 1824, and applied to Sir Richard Phillips for literary employment. Phillips was just starting the Universal Review (called by Borrow the Oxford Review), and took Borrow to call upon the editor. Borrow describes the interview in "Lavengro" (chap. xxxiv.). The editor is a "little old man" living in a house with a small garden in "one of the purlieus of the city." He is surrounded by musical instruments and a pile of books. These books are unsold copies of a translation of Quintilian made some years before, and the editor offers to sell one to Borrow at half-price. The review collapsed in January, 1825, and the editor was left, says Borrow, to compose music and sell his Quintilian.

Now, says Dr. Knapp (vol. I., p. 93), this editor was William Gifford, of the Quarterly Review, and the "Quintilian" was Gifford's "Juvenal." Though Dr. Knapp is clearly a most careful and accurate student of Borrow, the identification seems to be impossible. Gifford, it is true, was a "little old man"; but at this time he was a rich bachelor with a sinecure of £1,000 a year and large savings; he was living at 6, St. James's-street—not in a "purlieu." He had edited the Quarterly from its start in 1809; his health had broken down in 1822; the review had fallen into arrear; and in the autumn of 1824 he resigned the editorship. He was courted or hated by all the leading authors of the day. Is it conceivable that he should just then have undertaken (though "sub-rosa," as Dr. Knapp says) to edit a new review, to be written by literary hacks and published by that singular person, Sir R. Phillips? The "Quintilian" was pronounced by Phillips to be "a drug," as Borrow tells us. Now Gifford's "Juvenal," as Dr. Knapp himself observes, had reached a third edition in 1817; and another edition appeared, I may add, in 1826. Clearly it was not a "drug," and Gifford, though penurious, was not likely to have a pile of unsold copies in his room, or to be offering them at half-price to stray visitors.

Who, then, if not Gifford, was the editor? I find in Lowndes' "Manual" that an edition of Quintilian was published in 1822. The editor was J. Carey. Now, in the "Dictionary of National Biography" there is a short notice of John Carey (1756-1826) (uncle of the American economist, Henry C. Carey). Carey was a classical teacher, and edited a number of Latin works. He also edited the School Magazine and contributed to the Monthly Magazine, both of which belonged to Sir R. Phillips. Obviously he was exactly the kind of man whom Phillips would be likely again to employ as editor. Moreover, he died in 1826 at Prospect-place, Lambeth, which was then in the "purlieu," and might probably have a small garden. I submit, therefore, that Carey was the editor, and that Quintilian means Quintilian. Though Borrow puts a "translation" instead of an edition, he does not appear even to have opened the book. Borrow's accuracy, if I am right, is thus vindicated, though his biographer must (on this occasion only) be convicted of a slip.

SUBJECT INDEXING.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—I was deeply interested with the article in Literature of January 7th, entitled "A Record of Contemporary Literature." The subject index already issued from the British Museum, covering the period 1880-95, is of the greatest possible value to us in this distant part of the Empire, and if it could be kept up to date year by year it would be invaluable. Recognizing the great use of a good subject index in a national library, as this one is, I have given special attention to the question of indexing all our books with considerable minuteness; and having soon realized that the first necessity was absolute uniformity of methods, based upon an authoritative set of rules and list of subject headings which could be consistently used by any number of workers who might be engaged upon the task, I compiled a "Guide to our System of Cataloguing," which gives fairly minute instructions and rules, and a list of the 6,000 subject headings which we have already found necessary to use for indexing the 120,000 volumes in our own library. We index every article and paper that is published in the Australasian scientific and literary periodicals.—Yours truly,

A FIELD FOR MODERN VERSE.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—A month ago, while fresh from the study of Dante, I received news which greatly astonished me. The final raptures of the "Paradiso" had hardly ceased to vibrate in my memory, and for some time I had been dwelling in the charmed atmosphere of the "Vita Nuova," when suddenly I learned from my admired contemporary, Mr. Stephen Phillips, that a "revelation of the life after death" was "slowly filtering into the intellect and imagination of the modern world," was, indeed, "gradually usurping the modern imagination." I was deeply interested, and followed Mr. Phillips eagerly through three pages of the Dome, while he conducted me among "realms of darkness, of ice, of twilight, of glory," explaining how the spirits of the departed created their own atmosphere, environment, and scenery, exhibiting "a conception capable of infinite variety of treatment, with all the fascination of scientific truth," and "behind and above all these phenomena . . . the central idea of evolution." Through Hell, Purgatory, and Paradise Mr. Phillips led me in the brief space of ten minutes, and after such a journey performed in so short a time I was naturally a little out of breath, and did not immediately recover my ideas. When I had recovered them I began to ask myself how Mr. Phillips knew all this, and whence had come this revelation of which I now heard for the first time. A passing phrase in his article about "communications made through trance or by the governed hand" gave me a sad suspicion that he had been among the mediums, while the general tenor of his doctrine seemed to indicate that he had perhaps been reading the memorabilia of Swedenborg, the most prosaic soul ever blessed with poetic visions. The writers who, in another number of the Dome, criticize Mr. Phillips' article seem to have received the same impression, and a month's reflection, followed by a perusal of their criticisms, leaves me full of doubts as to the value of this new "field for modern verse" which Mr. Phillips has discovered. I return to my Dante, and, as my lips pronounce inaudibly the rhythmical syllables of his verse, I keep wondering whether an age enlightened by "communications received through trance or by the governed hand" is really likely to produce a song of the unseen world more impressive or more convincing than this of the long dead Florentine, who believed in the pseudo-Dionysius, and had no chance of "applying the law of evolution" to his visions.

Dante "imagined a definite place of darkness, or fire, or beauty, to which the soul repaired"; he believed that the place of torment was in the centre of the earth; that Purgatory was on an island in the antipodes; that appointed angels controlled the movements of the celestial spheres; that the souls of the blessed enjoyed the beatific vision in the Empyrean, beyond the Primum Mobile. He had not read Swedenborg or Omar Khayyám, and did not know that the spirit "creates its own atmosphere, environment, and scenery." Yet he produced the greatest poem in modern literature, and expressed the despair of the lost and the rapture of spirits who see God in language which, in spite of all the havoc that time and knowledge have made with his cosmology and philosophy, still moves us as if the suffering and blessed spirits had themselves spoken. Why was this? Whence did the poet draw his inspiration? How was he prepared to receive it? By what experience did he gain such vision and such utterance? Had he played with the planchette? Had he listened at séances to spirits that mutter and peep? Had he been directed by a magazine article to "a new field for modern verse?" I open the "Vita Nuova," and at paragraph XXIX. I read:—

"Quomodo sedet sola civitas plena populo! facta est quasi vidua domina gentium. Io era nel proponimento ancora di questa canzone, e compiuta n'avea questa sovrascritta stanza, quando lo Signore della giustizia chiamò questa gentilissima a gloriare sotto l'insegna di quella Reina benedetta Maria, lo cui nome fue in grandissima reverenza nelle parole di questa Beatrice beata."

Then at paragraph XLIII. :—

"Appresso a questo sonetto apparve a me una mirabil visione, nella quale vidi cose, che mi fecero proporre di non dir più di questa Benedetta, infino a tanto che io non potessi più degnamente trattare di lei. E di venire a ciò io studio quanto posso, al com'ella sa veracemente. Sicchè, se piacere sarà di Colui per cui tutte le cose vivono, che la mia vita per alquanti anni perseveri, spero di dire di lei quello che mai non fu detto d'alcuna."

And in the 25th Canto of the "Paradiso" I read of

"il poema sacro,
Al quale ha posto mano e cielo e terra,
Sì che m'ha fatto per più anni macro."

In such passages as these we see the working of Dante's mind; we watch the growth of his conception. We come near to the strenuous spirit who loved Beatrice with a passion of white fire; who thought and wrote for her as the knight of romance fought for his lady; who brooded on her memory when she was dead, and associated her beatified spirit with all his best moments, his highest reveries; who was exiled and afflicted, and hated as intensely as he loved; who threw himself with ardour upon the strange scholastic learning till it broke into light and music. The song of Dante was wrought out of his life with labour, with agonies, with blood and tears. It was conceived in a passion of love and regret, matured through years of struggle and sorrow, born in moments of inspired rapture. That world of torment and blessing—he knew it, for he had lived in it. He had tasted the bitterness of the outcast, the joy of mystical vision; he had learnt by experience that the soul has no hope and no stay save in the Eternal. Thus he came to feel and to make us feel with overpowering conviction the reality of the unseen, the want of God which is the one abiding misery, the knowledge and love of God, which is the goal of all love, all thought, all knowledge. What does it matter that his cosmology, his physics, and his metaphysics, his politics and his Biblical criticism are not ours? St. Peter, in the "Paradiso," catechises him, and is entirely satisfied of the soundness of his faith. He worships one God in Trinity, and Trinity in Unity, neither confounding the persons nor dividing the substance, in the most irreproachable fashion. We are less particular than St. Peter. We do not much care what was the theology of Dante; his heart speaks to our heart.

If the "half a dozen of the younger men who have written indubitably fine poetry" will believe me, these are the rules of the game. The planchette and the mediums will not help them. Only out of arduous thought and deep experience come those inspired moods to which the unseen world reveals itself. I entirely share Mr. Phillips' impatience with the narrow materialism of our day; I doubt not that the great poet, when he comes, will find "our little life" the threshold of an infinite existence opening itself in glimpses to the eye of faith and hope. But I do not think it likely that any poet, great or small, will find in the rapping of tables or the ravings of trance the suggestion of a music which shall express seraphic ecstasy more piercingly than the terzina :—

O gioia ! ò ineffabile allegrezza !
O vita intera d'amore e di pace !
O senza brama sicura ricchezza !

or touch the source and spring of eternal beatitude more unfailingly than the incomparable line :—

In la sua volontade è nostra pace.

LITERARY AGENTS.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—Referring to your article on "Literary Agents" in Literature of April 1, there is one point—I think an important one—which has apparently escaped your attention, viz., that the literary agent will add one more "middleman" between the author and the public. There were already two—publisher and bookseller, now there will be three. Must not this addition necessarily lessen the profits hitherto divided by three, but now to be shared by four?—Yours faithfully,

MR. BEESLY'S "DANTON."

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—Your reviewer of the above-mentioned work sneers at what he is pleased to term "the foolish old stories" concerning feudality in France on the eve of the Revolution. I would commend to his notice a work lately published—viz., "La France d'après les Cahiers de 1789." In these Cahiers we find recorded a state of things that defies exaggeration.

"THE RAPIN."

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—In a notice of my book, "The Rapin," this week your reviewer says, "We are introduced to a princess living in the Faubourg St. Honoré, who receives actresses and out-at-elbows painters from Montmartre—a thing which the princesses who live in Paris never do." In the book the word "Montmartre" never occurs once. No painter of any sort is represented as having been received by the only princess in the story, and actresses from Montmartre do not call upon her, nor does she call upon them. The princess receives an actress, but the actress is a star of the Comédie Française. May not a great French actress drink tea with a princess whose husband was once a banker? The heroine of my book was sketched from a living girl. I never asked her whether she could cook omelettes or not, perhaps because she was a person unsuggestive of frying pans. The grisette who can't cook an omelette is, according to your reviewer, unfit to figure in a romance. I make no comment on this statement; it is a statement that makes comments on itself.

Yours truly,

H. DE VERE STACPOOLE.

Our reviewer writes :—

On reference to Mr. Stacpoole's book I find that for "painter" I should have written "poet," and that the poet in question did not live in Montmartre, but in the Rue Turbigo, in the Quartier Montmartre. For these mistakes I apologize. But I insist that the poet was of the well-known Montmartre type, and that neither poets nor painters of that type are received by the princesses who live in Paris. As regards the actresses, I see that the omission of a comma has made me say, "actresses from Montmartre," when I meant to say "actresses" simply. For this, too, I apologize. But when Mr. Stacpoole asks, "May not a great French actress drink tea with a princess whose husband was once a banker?" I can only reply, "No, she may not." Any one who knows French society will bear me out in the statement that that rule is absolute—for reasons into which it is unnecessary to enter here. Mr. Stacpoole's statement that he does not know whether a certain grisette of his acquaintance can cook an omelette or not does not seem to me to have any bearing on my statement that "the grisette who cannot cook an omelette is so exceptional that she may be ignored." The technical term for Mr. Stacpoole's retort is, I believe, ignoratio elenchi.

EXCEPTIONS PROVE THE RULE.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—The following appears in "Among my Books" of April 1 :—

And if I were a man I suppose I should constantly be writing, "However, Mrs. Dash cannot be denied that rarest gift of her sex, a sense of humour"; and each fresh exception would only establish the rule a little more firmly in my mind.

The quotation is not made with any idea of controverting any theory or statement about women and humour, but to draw attention to what seems to be a misunderstanding of the sense of the aphorism that "exceptions prove the rule." Nowadays, in nine cases out of ten, when the phrase is used, it is noticeable that "proves" is given a signification certainly almost diametrically opposed to what it had when first it came into currency. "Prove" is not to "establish"—it is to "test." Exceptions do not establish the rightness of the rule. They test it. And a moderate amount of them will break it down and show it to be a bad one. The proof of the pudding is the eating of it. It is tested when it is eaten. It may be found out to be of all kinds as well as of a good kind. And a rule may, when tested by exceptions, be found to be no rule at all.

Mr. Fisher Unwin is bringing out a new series entitled "The Overseas Library." Published at a shilling, paper, and two shillings, cloth, the Overseas Library will make an attempt to paint Colonial life for readers in the home-country. The local colour of Paraguay is the inspiration of "The Ipané," a volume of characteristic sketches with which Mr. Cunningham Graham will open the series. After that South Africa and British Guiana will furnish volumes.

At Easter next year will fall what may be described as the sixth centenary of the "Divina Commedia"—that is to say, next Good Friday will be the six hundredth anniversary of the assumed date of Dante's departure on his journey through the three kingdoms of the other world. In commemoration of this centenary, Messrs. Methuen propose to issue a new edition of the text of the "Divina Commedia." The editing of the volume has been entrusted to Mr. Paget Toynbee, whose text will in the main follow that of Witte's minor edition, published at Berlin in 1862. The original Witte, of which a faulty reprint was issued several years ago, has long been out of print, and is now very scarce. Messrs. Methuen's venture will, we hope, supply a long-felt want—namely, a sound text of the "Commedia," in a clear, readable type, on good paper, and at a moderate cost.

Messrs. Methuen are also going to issue yet another edition of Cary's translation, under the editorship of a well-known Dantist, which will form three volumes of their "Little Library." The history of Cary's Dante is a curious one. The complete work was first published in 1814, at the author's own expense, in three diminutive volumes in boards, at the price of 12s. It was noticed with praise by the Gentleman's Magazine and with contempt by the Critical Review, and then for several years lay dead and forgotten. In February, 1818, it was mentioned in a lecture on Dante by Coleridge, who had accidentally made the author's acquaintance on the beach at Littlehampton a year or two before. The effect was immediate. A thousand copies of the neglected first edition were at once disposed of, a new edition was called for, and within a few months Cary pocketed a sum of nearly £250 by what he had come to regard as a dead failure. The Edinburgh and Quarterly both published favourable articles on the work, which, in spite of all attempts to supersede it, has now for more than eighty years held its place as the translation of Dante, the translation, in fact, as Dr. Garnett has well expressed it, which first occurs to the mind on the mention of Dante's name.

A re-issue in five pocket volumes is also announced by Messrs. Isbister of Dean Plumptre's translation in terza rima. The Dean's performance was not an unqualified success, and is hardly likely to become a standard work. The notes especially require a severe pruning, though we hope that such gems as the Dean's delightful personally conducted tour of Dante from Wissant to London and Oxford, and thence into Somersetshire, and into his own cathedral at Wells, will be allowed to remain. When the translation first appeared the Dean was accused, or thought he was, by one of the quarterlies of having made unfair use of the work of a fellow labourer in the same field. This accusation excited the Dean's indignation, and was the occasion of a warmly worded communication to the Guardian, copies of which he sent to his friends. He had no difficulty in disposing of the charge, which practically amounted, in his view, to one of petty larceny against a dignitary of the Church.

The new volume of the Highways and Byways Series, Mr. Gwynn's book on all that is picturesque in Donegal, Derry, and Antrim, is to give Mr. Hugh Thomson a long looked for chance to contribute a series of landscape drawings for book publication. Although Mr. Thomson's successes have mainly been in the revivifying the classical novelists or the elder poets, his predilection is for water-colour and landscape. Donegal, Derry, and Antrim are well known to him, for his early days were spent in Ireland.

"Dissolving Views" is the English title Dr. Georg Brandes, the Danish critic, has given his latest volume of æsthetic studies, which consist, for the most part, of holiday criticisms made on his travels in Italy, France, Belgium, and Germany.

Messrs. Bell will publish this season the first volumes of the new Shakespeare, which Mr. Byam Shaw is illustrating. It will be called the "Chiswick Shakespeare," and will be in pott 8vo. size, printed in a special type. Each volume will contain a single play, and will be illustrated by six full-page drawings, as well as head and tail pieces. The title-page and end-papers have been designed by Mr. Gerald Moira, and Mr. John Dennis has supplied a short introduction and glossary to each play. The first two volumes, Hamlet and the Merchant of Venice, are nearly ready. Others will be published at intervals.

In a recent note in regard to some books by the author of "The Washer of the Ford" we regret to find that we had placed the name of Fiona Macleod in inverted commas. We understand that she has the natural wish while sacrificing publicity not to sacrifice her own name.

Mr. Sidney Whitman writes on April 1:—

I notice a review of my "Story of Austria" in this week's Literature in which I am credited with being an M.A. This is a mistake of the publisher, to which I immediately drew his attention at the time, although you will find that the M.A. is only printed on the cover and is absent on the title-page of the book. It is my collaborator, Mr. McIlraith, who is an M.A., as you will perceive by enclosed slip, which was issued by Messrs. Fisher Unwin before the book was out.

Messrs. Blackwood's "Modern English Writers Series" is to be begun by Professor Saintsbury's monograph on Matthew Arnold, which will be ready shortly.

Messrs. Hutchinson are bringing out immediately a book by Mrs. Aubrey Richardson entitled "Famous Ladies of the English Court." It is a vindication of the characters of many ladies of the English Court whose lives have been depicted unfavourably by contemporary memoir writers.

"The Sovereignty of the Sea" is to be the title of Dr. T. Wemyss Fulton's book on the origin of the English claim to the ruling of the "British Seas." It will contain many maps and illustrations, and will be published by Messrs. Blackwood shortly, in one volume.

Messrs. Chatto and Windus have again commissioned Mr. T. W. Speight, the author of "The Secret of Wyvern Towers" and many other novels, to write the "Gentleman's Annual," the title of which will probably be "The Web of Fate."

Mr. Bloundelle-Burton's new novel, "Fortune's My Foe," will be published by Pearson about the 12th instant, while the Appleton Co., of New York, will produce it at the same time in the United States. The story introduces both the Siege of Carthage and the Battle of Quiberon. Mr. Bloundelle-Burton has received offers from Germany for both the translation and dramatization of his last novel, "The Scourge of God."

Mrs. Archibald Little's volume, "Intimate China: the Chinese as I have known them," which will shortly be published by Messrs. Hutchinson, is to contain some hundred and twenty illustrations.

A new and cheaper edition of Mr. Frederic M. Halford's "Dry Fly Fishing in Theory and Practice" will be issued early in April by Messrs. Vinton. The entire work has been thoroughly revised.

BOOK PRICES CURRENT.

National idiosyncracies express themselves in many divers ways and leave their mark in many unexpected places; but it may be questioned whether there is any more striking example of the Anglo-Saxon genius for individualism, and for going as one pleases, than the system, or want of system, on which the Anglo-Saxon publisher fixes the prices of his books. In Continental countries, where they have their état civil and their compulsory military service to popularize the habits of orderliness and method, a row of books has the uniformity of a regiment of soldiers; while a bookseller's shop, viewed as a whole, suggests a number of such regiments massed together in a brigade, a division, or an army corps. The case of France may be taken as typical of that of the Continent in general. We begin with the popular reprints

VOL. IV. No. 15.

(mostly in blue uniform) at one franc a volume; we proceed to the new novels (almost invariably mustard-coloured) at three-francs-and-a-half a volume. A certain class of graver works (taller and stouter than the novels) are sold at seven-and-a-half francs; for twelve-and-a-half francs we buy books of travel and memoirs, on large paper, with, in most cases, a certain number of illustrations. Other prices, of course, are to be encountered now and then and here and there; but these are mostly what the physiologists call "sports." The general scheme of prices no more varies from year to year, or from publisher to publisher, than does, for instance, the general scheme of charges for admission to the different parts of a West-end theatre. It is found that there is money in the book trade on those conditions, and the publishers are satisfied to let well alone, instead of competing with each other by making rash experiments.

It does not require to be proved that, in passing from the foreign to the English book trade, we are passing from the region of applied science to that of indiscriminate experiment. The fact salutes the eye in every bookseller's shop, and is, at the present moment, more conspicuous than it has ever been before. In the old days of the three-volume novel, order did, to a certain extent, prevail. But the three-volume novel was sacrificed to a sudden caprice of the circulating libraries; and since that time confusion has got steadily worse confounded, and every man has set himself to undersell his neighbour. According to the taste and fancy of the publisher, any given new novel may make its first appearance at six shillings, at five shillings, at three-and-sixpence, at half-a-crown, at two shillings, or at eighteenpence; and it is understood to be only a matter of days before the experiment of publishing new novels at sixpence will be tried. This is a splendid example of Anglo-Saxon energy, enterprise, and ingenuity, and it is not impossible that a publisher here and there may profit by it. But to the majority of publishers—and in a greater degree to the majority of authors—the immediate results of this cheapening of books threaten to be exceedingly disastrous.

Certain aspects of this important question are discussed by a correspondent whose letter we print in another column. Our correspondent's main point is that cheap books need a large circulation to yield a profit, and that a reduction in the price of a book does not necessarily—or even normally—mean a proportionate increase in the demand for it. At the first blush of the thing, such a statement certainly has all the air of a deliberate denial of ascertained economic truth. In the case of the ordinary articles of commerce—in the case, for example, of tea, coffee, tobacco, silk hats, and fur-lined overcoats—the increase of the demand keeps pace with, if it does not run ahead of, the cheapening of the supply. Why, it might plausibly be asked, should not the same thing be expected to happen in the case of books? The answer to the subtle question is a simple one. In the first place, books differ from a good many other articles of commerce in the fact that a single copy, however cheap, may serve the wants of a good many people. One copy of Tennyson may satisfy the needs of a whole household of thoughtful persons, but each thoughtful member of the family will require a separate pipeful of tobacco to smoke while reading it. In the second place, a man's demand for books is strictly limited by the time at his disposal for reading them. Even with books at their present prices, most of us read as many of them as we care to read, and should not trouble to read a great many more if they were actually given away. A few calculations will suffice to show how herculean is this task of making books more profitable by making them cheaper. In the case of the sixpenny book, our correspondent has pointed out that 50,000 copies must be sold before any profit worth considering is shown. But we all know that many books—and these by no means worthless books—appear, for which it would be impossible to find 50,000 readers, even if the copies were delivered gratis as supplements to the morning newspaper. Equally hopeless, however, is the case of the really popular author who thinks to increase his profits by issuing his books in cheap editions. The record sale, up to the present, of a six-shilling novel is, we believe, about 150,000 copies. Twelve times as many copies would have to be sold of a sixpenny novel to make it pay equally well even if the margin of profit on a sixpenny book were the same. As a fact, this margin is only about half that on a six-shilling book, and it would therefore be necessary to sell about twenty-four times as many copies in order to attain the same pecuniary result. This works out at 3,600,000 copies. That is to say, unless one out of every five adults in the United Kingdom bought a copy, the successful author would be a loser by this cheapening of his work.

We have purposely treated the question from the author's point of view because it is, in the main, an author's question. It touches the publishers to a certain—and even a considerable—extent; but to authors it is absolutely vital. For this reason: the publisher can multiply himself, and the author cannot. Suppose author and publisher are dividing equally the profit earned on each book published, and that the profit on each book amounts to no more than £20. A publisher who publishes fifty books a year will still be doing pretty well; though each of the fifty authors whose books he issues will be in a very poor way. Consequently, though the price of a book is generally fixed by the publisher because he is the man of practical experience, it is really the authors who have most to apprehend from the new craze for cheapening books. Not being men of business, they probably do not completely realize the precise bearing of the movement on the value of literary property. The committee of the Society of Authors understands, however; and it seems to us that the case is eminently one for a well-considered word of warning on the part of the committee, if not for pourparlers, with a view to concerted action, with the committee of the Publishers' Association.

All literary men (in America no less than in England) will endorse the sentiments expressed in the Poet Laureate's letter to the United States Secretary of State on the subject of international copyright. It certainly is one of life's little ironies that, while the French, who regard us as their enemies, respect the property of our literary men, the Americans, who consider us their friends, decline to do so, except on conditions that are always onerous and inconvenient, and sometimes absolutely prohibitive; and there could be no more convincing proof of the sincerity of the recent talk of Anglo-Saxon brotherhood than the application of the policy of the open door to Anglo-Saxon literary goods. The United States and Russia are, at present, the only great nations that refuse adherence to the Berne Convention; and the adherence of Russia is promised as soon as Russian domestic copyright law has been set in satisfactory order. If the United States would follow suit, it would be hard for the other recalcitrants—such as Holland, Denmark, and Sweden—to resist the increased pressure of public opinion that would be brought to bear upon them.

It is, of course, neither the authors nor the publishers (but only the printers) of the United States who insist upon the principle of the "manufacturing clause." The existence of such a clause in a Copyright Act is obviously just as indefensible there as in Canada, and our opinion of the attempts to introduce it into the Canadian Acts has been frequently and frankly given. But, in the United States, there is not even the excuse that the printers must either print foreign books or none at all. The literature of the United States has, of late years, been increasing by leaps and bounds; and the printing of English books (whether pirated or copyright) is now quite an insignificant fraction of the printing business of the country. The printers, in short, would hardly suffer at all by the act of justice which Mr. Alfred Austin asks for; while the gain to authors would, in many cases, be enormous.

The annual report of the Royal Literary Fund, showing an income of £4,000, and an invested capital of nearly £60,000, has elicited some characteristically energetic comments from Sir Walter Besant in the current Author. Sir Walter's point is that, in view of the present flourishing state of the literary industry, this is more than enough, and that it is time for us all to discontinue our benefactions to the Fund. We should be glad if we could share his view that literature is no longer any more precarious than any other profession; but the facts hardly seem to warrant such optimism. It is still, with few exceptions, only in light literature that a writer can earn an income comparable to that of a solicitor or a doctor; and, even in light literature, he is at the mercy of the incalculable caprices of the public, in a sense in which other professional men are not. Alterations of the law and new discoveries in medicine have very little effect upon the earnings of the lawyer or the general practitioner; but a sudden shift of the fashion from idealism to realism may, in the twinkling of an eye, knock a big hole in the emoluments of any novelist who is not exceptionally adaptable, and give the Royal Literary Fund good opportunities of usefulness. The fact that, in the same number of the Author in which he declares that the Fund is large enough, Sir Walter Besant repeats his demand that the Civil List Pensions should be confined to persons distinguished in Literature, Science, and Art, seems to indicate that he is not always equally sure of the prosperity of men of letters.

An accomplished chef of M. Sardou's nationality is supposed to be almost independent of his material, and to be able to produce dishes of exquisite savour from meats of most unpromising quality. It must be with something of the same faith in M. Sardou's culinary gifts as a playwright that all London is awaiting the presentation of his Robespierre on the Lyceum stage to-night. That his hero played the most important of parts in the crisis of the First Revolution does not prevent him from being absolutely the least picturesque and dramatic of all its leading actors. Rivarol's caustic saying that every one in this much vaunted Revolution was "below the mark, even down to the assassins" seems specially to fit Robespierre. He is almost the only one of the Jacobins who, though finally the most powerful of them, never seems to gain any dignity from his power. One would have felt it no dishonour to have been put to death by Danton or even by Marat—men whose political stature would have struck one as at least on a level with their crimes. But to have been sent to the scaffold by Robespierre must have seemed like falling a victim to the rigours of a country pedagogue enrage, whom Nature had intended to whip little boys and only Chance had endowed with power to cut off the heads of men.

One departure from history, or at any rate from tradition, M. Sardou, it is understood, has felt himself bound to make in order to lend a touch of humanity to this ferocious pedant. He has had to work in "the love-interest" by representing Maximilian as the hero of an early amour, which, as the fruit of it has, in the play, attained to manhood, and as the father only lived to be thirty-six, must be supposed to have taken place while Maximilian was still in his teens. This does not sound eminently probable, and is certainly very unlike the Robespierre of the Revolutionary era, who, though he was followed at the height of his power by an adoring train of women worshippers, like a bloodthirsty Bunthorne, was always supposed to be as indifferent to the allurements of the "eternal feminine" as the younger Pitt himself. Likely enough, however, M. Sardou will be able to adduce some historical authority for his new reading of the part; there is historical authority for new readings of every part in these days. Only the figure of the hero whom Sir Henry Irving is to "create" to-night promises to differ widely enough in many respects from the "sea-green incorruptible" of Carlyle.

We do not suppose that everybody, as one of the new Sunday papers said in its first issue, was last Sunday discussing the question of Sunday journalism, for the simple reason that every newsagent in London has for years been selling Sunday journals, and then the existence is at least a hundred years old. If we are to have Sunday newspapers at all, it is certainly a relief to have something worth reading. The excellent people who are protesting against Sunday issues do not realize, we fear, what Bishop Jackson called "the sinfulness of little sins." They are horrified at sensational crimes, but they condone peccadilloes; and it is only when two well-known papers simultaneously follow the example of numerous smaller proprietors that they remember that Sunday should be a day of rest—a day of rest, that is, for the newsagents. No one seems to have a word to say for the journalists and compositors who produce Monday's papers.

Dictionary of National Biography. Vol. LVIII., Ubal dini—Wakefield. Edited by Sidney Lee. 9½ × 6½ in., 463 pp. London, 1899. Smith, Elder. 15/-

The historical interest of the fifty-eighth volume of this Dictionary centres round two great names, Vere and Villiers. The traditional prestige which has attached itself to the former is derived from the continuance of the family in the male, though not the direct male, line and its possession of the Earldom of Oxford for more than five centuries—from 1142 to 1703. Perhaps the best known members of it are the ninth Earl, the favourite of Richard II., and the seventeenth Earl, that eccentric and violent courtier of Elizabeth's reign, whose strange career is related by Mr. Sidney Lee. But the two brothers who form the subject of Sir Clement Markham's book, "The fighting Veres"—Sir Francis and Sir Horace—rank high in military annals for their services in the Dutch War of Independence, and the former particularly earned a place among the great commanders of history. The Villiers present a truly varied list. The first and second Dukes of Buckingham occupy nearly twenty pages. The career of the former, the favourite of Charles I. and the victim of the knife of Felton, is told by Dr. S. R. Gardiner; that of the second, the Buckingham of the "Cabal" and the "Zimri" of "Absalom and Achitophel," by Mr. C. H. Firth, who adduces the evidence which refutes Pope's account of his death in "the worst inn's worst room." With pitiless historical fidelity Mr. Thomas Seccombe recounts the liaisons of Barbara Villiers, my Lady Castlemaine, adding the remark that "much work upon the dark corners of her career and the secret influence that she exercised awaits the historian of the reign of Charles II."; and side by side with the fairest and most wanton of the mistresses of Charles II. we have the fourth Lord Clarendon, Foreign Secretary at the outbreak of the Crimean War, and his brother, Charles Pelham Villiers, whom he supported in his crusade against the Corn Laws. The life of the former is from the pen of Mr. J. A. Hamilton, who narrates it with care and impartiality, though he omits to mention that Clarendon refused an advancement in the Peerage after the conclusion of the Treaty of Paris. The younger Villiers, the veteran champion of Free Trade, who only died, it will be remembered, at the beginning of last year, is dealt with in an admirable biography by Mr. H. J. Robinson. It is a good example of the treatment of the lives of more recent, and contemporary men of note, which we venture to think are in this Dictionary sometimes subordinated to those which appeal more to the historian's love of research. It may be doubted, for instance, whether a man of no greater note than Edward Veel, the Nonconformist, whose chief claims to distinction were that he was tutor to the father of John and Charles Wesley, and published two volumes of "Discourses," would have found a place in this volume had he been a contemporary. His biography is very nearly as long as that of Sir Thomas Upington, the South African statesman, who died last year. Upington's life is of just about the same length as that of Richard Usher, the clown, and a third as long as that of John Varlo, an agriculturist of the last century. Another recent biography which we cannot regard as wholly complete is that of the late Dean of Llandaff. There is no hint of the fact that his father, the Rev. E. T. Vaughan, belonged to a distinguished family—his brothers, Sir Henry Halford, Sir Charles Richard Vaughan, and Sir John Vaughan, having attained the highest eminence in medicine, diplomacy, and law. There is no mention of his work on the Revision Committee, or of his Court appointments. The notice of his life at Harrow does not include a reference to his work in rebuilding the chapel, or his presentation of a chancel, or to the Vaughan Memorial Library—a permanent witness of the regard which he inspired in Harrovians. And, lastly, his unique position in a time of keen ecclesiastical controversy is hardly fully explained by a mere reference to his “freedom from sectarian bias” and to his own statement that he “stood on the old paths of Christian belief.”

An interesting editorial question no doubt received due consideration from the originators of this Dictionary—that, namely, of the interpretation of the word “national.” Should admittance to the distinguished company rest on place of domicile or on place of origin, or on both? The former is rightly accepted as a qualification complete in itself. The claims of the latter must depend, we suppose, on circumstances. M. Waddington, the son of an English manufacturer, educated at Rugby and Cambridge, finds no place in this volume; nor did Count Taaffe, an Irish Viscount, in Volume LV. But they were both born out of the country, and their parents were in each case, we think, naturalised abroad. On the other hand, the very first volume of the Dictionary admitted, and no doubt rightly admitted, Pope Adrian IV. At any rate, the recognition of domicile as conferring a complete right of entrée brings out in this volume a very remarkable phase in the history of English painting. Royal patronage of Art had begun in the fifteenth century; but it was not till the eighteenth century that a really national indigenous school of painting began to form itself. During the intervening centuries England was mainly content to extend her patronage and hospitality to foreigners, and among foreigners mainly to those who hailed from the Netherlands. How far the Dutch, who struck a progressive note unknown to the countries where classical art had its home, influenced the English school we need not here inquire; but any one who turns over the pages of this volume of the Dictionary will be struck by the continual recurrence of Dutch names of artists—chiefly portrait and flower painters. There are some five-and-twenty such names, one after another, beginning with Van—including, of course, Van Dyck, and only not including Peter Van der Fas because he is better known, under the sobriquet adopted by his father, as Peter Lely. The influx had begun under the Tudors, and it was encouraged by the early Stuarts, who were liberal art patrons. Cromwell was painted by Lely. During the Commonwealth English noblemen made the acquaintance of many artists in the Low Countries, and helped to keep up the vogue of the Dutch after the restoration. Kneller, whose training was Dutch, continued the tradition well into the eighteenth century. To a student of English art the collection of lives which are brought together under the letter V will certainly prove of the greatest interest.

No reader of this Dictionary can have failed to find in each volume certain classes more numerous than others. No doubt this is fancy, though the instance we have just given is a curious proof that it is not always so. The last volume had an extraordinary number of scholars and antiquaries. The present one is noticeable for its actors, among whom the most famous, perhaps, are Cave Underhill—“a comic for three generations,” as he is called in “The Tatler,” and Mrs. Vanbruggen, the famous Restoration comédienne of whom Aston wrote—“Whatever she did was not to be called acting; no, no, it was what she represented. She was neither more nor less, and was the most easy actress in the world.” The names of Vassall, William Vaughan, Vines Underhill, and, far greater than all, of Edward Gibbon Wakefield (whose life Dr. Garnett has recently written) and his brother William, are connected with Colonial expansion. Literature has but few representatives—Urquhart, the translator of Rabelais, Sir John Vanbrugh, Vaughan the Silurist, Lord Vaux, Polydore Vergil, and a few others of less note among whom we may perhaps reckon Wainewright, the poisoner. One error in a date we may point out—viz., that of the foundation of the Church Missionary Society, which has its centenary this year, and is given, under John Venn, as 1797. Any criticism of this kind, or of any other, we may offer cannot lessen our admiration for the scholarly care and truly masterly ability which is devoted to this great Dictionary, now so closely approaching its completion.

Studies in Some Famous Letters. By J. C. Bailey. 8×5½ in., vi. + 308 pp. London, 1899. Burleigh. 6/-

No doubt it is true, as Mr. Bailey remarks, that “Letters, whether regarded simply as a form of literature, or as affording not the least sure material for the study of character, have not, at the present time, as many readers as they may fairly claim to deserve.” But we only wish that Mr. Bailey, or any other student of contemporary “tendencies,” could point to any “form of literature,” save fiction, and—in the case of a very few exceptionally notable subjects thereof—biography, of which the same observation could not be made. Has the very form in which the author pleads the cause of the “letter,” and which he handles with much skill and grace—the essay—as many readers in these days as it may fairly claim to deserve? Most publishers, we imagine, could answer the question with a very decided negative; and would add that the essay is far from being the only literary form to which our highly cultured generation shows an indifference, that their “unlettered” ancestors would have been ashamed to acknowledge. Certainly they used to read letters not only in manuscript—that, of course, was less meritorious in the days of costly postage—but also in their printed form, with far more appreciation of their literary merits than is common in these days, when “correspondence,” valued only and generally only valuable for its matter as distinct from its manner, is “shot” so voluminously and indiscriminately upon the world whenever any new biography of a deceased celebrity makes its appearance.

Mr. Bailey, however, approaches his subject in the sympathetic and leisurely fashion of the eighteenth century, and distinguishes the “points” of the various famous letter-writers on whom he discourses in the volume with much delicacy of critical discrimination. Cowper and Gray head the list (as by incontestable right), and if the author seems to us to rank the former a little higher than his deserts, exalted as they are, we cannot greatly complain. When, as is the case with Cowper, a man has been placed with such universal assent among the first of English letter-writers, it needs but a very slight dash of the “personal equation” for a critic to regard him as supreme. Gray, who challenges him for first place, is put near enough to him by Mr. Bailey to satisfy most of Gray’s admirers, who, if they put him first, would almost certainly unite in voting Cowper a “Themistoclean” second. The papers on these two poets, as on Gibbon, Lady Mary Wortley Montagu, and Edward FitzGerald, have already appeared in various periodicals; the essays on Swift, Johnson, and Lamb appear for the first time. Of these, the first is somewhat unsatisfactory, as, indeed, might well result from the scantiness of its material. The “Journal to Stella" may, of course, be regarded, if we please, as one long letter, and is in its way unique; but, as Mr. Bailey himself observes, the powers of a letter writer can only be tested, and, in fact, can only be developed, by a certain variety in his correspondence, one of the chief excellences of Gray and Cowper consisting, as he justly points out, in the variety of forms, each appropriate to their various correspondents, in which their personalities appear. Apart from the "Journal to Stella," there are few remarkable specimens of Swift's epistolary style; and, indeed, it is noteworthy that the longest extract to be found in the paper on Swift is a quotation from a letter of Pope. Johnson, of course, is a far better subject, and Mr. Bailey does no more than justice to the charm of the letters which Mrs. Thrale received from the gruff old scholar whom she had so triumphantly attached to her train. But we rather regret to see a critic of Mr. Bailey's accomplishment lending countenance to what surely is an exploded theory of Johnson's prose style. "His written language," we are told,

Is sometimes called clumsy; but that is a complete mistake. It is turgid, pompous, heavy, if you will; but there is never a doubt of its doing the work he meant it to do. He uses an axe, perhaps, where a penknife would be enough; but his axe cuts as clean as another man's penknife.

How many the "some times" were when Johnson's style has been described as "clumsy," and to whom is to be attributed the monumental ineptitude of that description, we cannot guess; but whoever it was would be capable, we should think, of finding "clumsiness" in the deliberate steps of the minuet. "Pompous," perhaps might pass, though it is clearly only the denigratory equivalent of "stately," and we have again only to substitute "weighty" for "heavy" in order to convert blame into praise. But "turgid," we must submit to Mr. Bailey, is a totally misleading adjective. Turgidity is an affair of swelling words and inflated phrases. Johnson is no more turgid than Gibbon, whose so-called "pomposity" is due, like Johnson's, to a certain inflexible ceremoniousness sustained in small matters as well as in great, and in the former case, of course, suggesting the use of the axe when the penknife would be enough. But Johnson's prose at its best—as in the "Lives of the Poets," or the Preface to the Dictionary—is, so far as regards his choice of words, a model of vigorous English, which could not be in the slightest degree strengthened or purified—as a turgid style certainly would be—by the excision of its polysyllables. The legend in short of Johnson's sesquipedalian diction was founded upon certain merely occasional and accidental characteristics of his style; and it is very significant that the parody of it in the "Rejected Addresses," excellent where the parodists are content with mimicry of the formal balance of his sentences, degenerates, as soon as they begin to string polysyllables together, into a mere clowning caricature.

The essay on Charles Lamb as a letter-writer is certainly the most original of the whole set, and the most courageous, for Mr. Bailey boldly commits himself to the statement that Lamb was "evidently not a man of generally attractive personality," and that the reader of his letters to-day "cannot but see and feel that there is an unpleasant element in Lamb which had its effect on his contemporaries." If by a "not generally attractive personality" is meant—what should in strictness be meant—that Lamb repelled as many, or almost as many, persons as he attracted, the proposition strikes us as an exceedingly rash one to hazard. That he did not "universally" attract is, no doubt, as true of him as it is of anybody else worth knowing. The personality which universally attracts is not a personality at all: it is the artfully disposed mirror of the personality with which it is for the moment in contact. We all know that Lamb did not attract Carlyle; and some of us, perhaps, remember a certain brutality about a "stammering, staggering" essayist, and the savage retort which it drew from Mr. Swinburne. But we suspect that the charm of Lamb was quite as generally felt as that of one of the two men with whom Mr. Bailey compares him, and more generally so than that of the other. "No one, I suppose," he says of Cowper, "ever came into close contact without loving that beautiful character. The man who knew FitzGerald and did not like him has yet to be found." Doubtless it would have been hard for any one actively to dislike Cowper, but surely one can easily imagine a minority, and perhaps not an inconsiderable minority, who, in spite of his virtues, would not have loved him; while as to FitzGerald, Mr. Bailey's own pages will put us on the track of people who were quite in a position to refute the dictum that "the man who did not like him has yet to be found."

With the author's second reason, however, for denying to "Elia" the first rank as a letter-writer, we have no fault to find; and the passage in which he puts it forth contains so masterly an analysis of the "true inwardness" of a perfect letter that we must transcribe it almost entire:—

The other reason why Lamb's letters cannot carry with them the charm of these others lies in his literary habit and manner. What is a letter? It is written talk, with something, but not all, of the easiness of talking, and something, not all, of the formality of writing. It is at once spontaneous and deliberate, the idle occupation of an hour and the sure index of a character. It must not be all serious, for then it ought to have been an essay or a book; it must not be all trifles, for then it will not have deserved ink and paper. But the most essential of all its qualities are its spontaneity and, so to speak, its personality. . . . These two points are vital. A letter, indeed, will not be literature unless it be written according to the rules of the art of writing; but unless it flows spontaneously from the writer's mind and pen, unless, too, it be from him and no one else, to his correspondent and no one else, it not only will not be literature, it will not be a real letter at all. Now Lamb's letters are weak in both these points. They are too much alike, wanting the play of varied personality, which we get, for instance, in the comparison of Gray writing to West, and the same Gray writing to Bonstetten.

But

The real defect of Lamb's letters, I make bold to say, is their want of spontaneity. . . . It does not strike one in two letters, or ten, or twenty, but read the whole of one of Canon Ainger's volumes, and, charming as so much of it is, there gradually arises a sense of something artificial which fatigues the mind. Lamb plays delightfully in them, it is true, but it is too often the play of a man who has set himself to amuse the company. . . . It is often admirable fooling with admirable seriousness thrown in, too, very likely; but it is too often also a professed essayist working out a set theme.

The ideal letter-writer should be this and that. Charles Lamb was neither this nor that. Ergo, Charles Lamb was not an ideal letter-writer. Many people, we suspect, will be found ready with their Nego minorem: for our own part we are disposed to admit it; but Mr. Bailey's "major" is unassailable. No more ample, acute, and accurate account, in fact, of the ideal letter-writer could possibly have been rendered.

AN UNHAPPY RECENSION.

The addition of the RUBAIYAT OF OMAR KHAYYAM to the Golden Treasury Series (Macmillan, 2s. 6d.) forms a fitting opportunity for a brief examination of some of the unhappiest adventures in recension to which any eminent poet, so far as we can remember, has ever committed himself. There appears, after all, to be a later and greater than that "last and greatest art, the art to blot;" for the fastidious critic of his own work who can stoically delete fine and favourite passages because of slight blemishes in them is less uncommon, after all, than he who can judiciously amend instead of ruthlessly obliterating them. FitzGerald's greatest friend, Tennyson, was one of the most accomplished and unerringly well-inspired of revisers; FitzGerald himself was apparently his exact opposite in these respects. A comparison, stanza by stanza, of the first version of the Rubaiyat published in 1859, and conveniently reprinted in the appendix to this volume with the revised text of the poem, will show that it is hardly going too far to say that FitzGerald has seldom touched any of his original work save to mar it, or varied its form of expression except for the worse. Who, for instance, being familiar with the splendidly audacious opening stanza of the 1859 edition:—

Awake! for Morning in the Bowl of Night
Has flung the Stone that puts the Stars to Flight;
And, lo! the Hunter of the East has caught
The Sultan's Turret in a Noose of Light.

can forget the blank discomfiture with which he saw that both these daring strokes of Oriental imagery had disappeared under the reviser's hand in the edition of 1868, and that, for the novel and vividly picturesque figure of the hunter with his lasso of rays, has been substituted a hackneyed comparison with the archer in the lines:—

And to the field of Heav'n ascending strikes
The Sultan's Turret with a Shaft of Light.

Even if it were possible to plead the greater translative fidelity as an excuse for the change, it would be difficult to allow such a defence to this freest of paraphrasts. But considering that, as the editor points out, "the first stanza of FitzGerald's version is entirely his own," this perversity of such mishandling of his own work is impossible to forgive.

A disappointment as acute as this prepares us for anything, and though we meet with no other quite so grievous, the revised version abounds with small alterations which are sometimes merely fidgety and vexatious, as making no real difference of any moment, but are more often distinctly weakening to the force of the quatrain in which they occur. "What," for instance, ran the original rendering of quatrain XXX.

What, without asking, hither hurried whence,
And, without asking, whither hurried hence?
Another and another cup to drown
The Memory of this Impertinence!

In its revised form the last two lines of the stanza run:—

Oh, many a Cup of the forbidden Wine Must drown the memory of that insolence!

a change which is doubly disconcerting, first, as being fatal to the fine "exclamatory" effect of the poet's protest as originally rendered, and, secondly, as substituting the too limited and definite word "insolence" for one which carries with it not only the idea of "affront," but also of logical inconsequence and incoherence.

Again:—

A Moment's Halt—a momentary taste
Of Being from the Well amid the Waste,
And lo! the phantom Caravan has reached
The Nothing it set out from—oh, make haste.

is surely but a tame equivalent for:—

One moment in Annihilation's waste,
One moment of the Well of Life to taste!
The stars are setting, and the Caravan Starts for the Dawn of Nothing. Oh, make haste!

Even a single line like:—

Rolls impotently on as Thou or I cannot be let alone, but gets changed into the rhythmically inferior

As impotently moves as you or I.

Quatrain XLV. of the revised version is an addition having no counterpart in the Rubaiyat of 1859 and is, no doubt, a striking one:—

'Tis but a Tent where takes his one day's rest
A Sultan to the realm of Death address;
The Sultan rises and the dark Ferrash
Strikes and prepares it for another guest.

But though "local colour" is no doubt attained by the word Ferrash many will regard the alternative quatrain given in the prose preface to an earlier edition as incomparably superior in dignity and force. There the human body is described as:—

A Tent where rests anon
A Sultan to his Kingdom passing on
And which the swarthy Chamberlain shall strike
Then, when the Sultan rises to be gone.

Again, the two effective stanzas of the original version beginning "Then to the rolling Heaven itself I cried," &c., and "But leave the wise to wrangle and with me," &c., have been "revised" out of existence altogether, and the vigorous quatrain which begins:—

For in and out, about, above, below,
'Tis nothing but a magic Shadow Show, &c., reappears on revision in the much weaker form of

We are no other than a moving Show
Of Magic Shadow shapes that come and go, &c.

Everywhere, in short, there is visible the same strange determination to substitute the expanded and elaborate for the terser and more pregnant phrase—the same wanton sacrifice of striking thoughts in order that, freed from them, the line may say what it has to say at greater length, and in a more prosaically narrative form. Thus:—

Then said a second "Ne'er a peevish Boy
Would break the Bowl from which he drank in joy,
And he that with his hand the Vessel made
Will surely not in after wrath destroy?"

The last two lines originally ran:—

Shall he that made the Vessel in pure Love
And Fancy, in an after rage destroy?

"With his hand," for "in pure Love and Fancy!" What an "amendment!" There are, indeed, two noble additions to the revised version for which we can forgive many sins of omission and perversions—the two quatrains which run:—

I sent my Soul through the Invisible
Some letter of that After-life to spell,
And by-and-by my Soul returned to me
And answered, "I myself am Heaven and Hell."

Heaven but the vision of fulfill'd Desire,
And Hell the Shadow from a Soul on fire,
Cast on the Darkness into which Ourselves
So late emerged from, shall so soon expire.

But, in truth, the omissions and perversions are too many to be atoned for even by the excellence of this new matter. FitzGerald's recension of the original Rubaiyat must for ever remain on record as a melancholy example of the way in which the most perfect critical taste may fail a man who sets to work to improve the unimprovable.

THE ANGLO-SAXON'S BURDEN.

The Philippines and Round About. By Major G. J. Younghusband. With Illustrations and Map. 9x6in., xiv. + 230 pp. London and New York, 1899. Macmillan. 8/6 n.

In a short time we shall know all there is to know about the late victorious American campaign, and perhaps even get a little more than we want. "The Sinking of the Merrimac, by the Man Who Did It," "The Catastrophe of the Maine, by the Captain Who was Blown Up," "What I Did with the Spanish Fleet," by Admiral Dewey—these are a few of the titles that have already appeared, or will doubtless appear in the immediate future to enlighten an eager country as to the details of the war with Spain. Yet it may be safely said that the inevitable book about the Philippines will be the greatest surprise to readers on both sides of the Atlantic. In the meantime, Major Younghusband in a narrative that is astonishingly frank and outspoken, lets us into many malodorous secrets with the breezy air of a cheerful British officer to whom expense is no object in comparison with telling the truth. What says the great Mr. Dooley on this subject? "It's a poverty-stricken counthry," writes our Hibernian sage from Chicago, "full iv goold an' precious stones, where th' people can pick dinner off th' threes an' ar-re starvin' because they have no stepladders." Major Younghusband fully confirms these views. One passage filled with fairly appalling revelations is to be found in chapter five, from which we gather that the same reasons which compelled the Sirdar to abandon Omdurman as hopeless have also forced American officers to begin their sanitary operations on Manila by clearing as many Spaniards out of the houses as possible. To close these instances of candour in a chronicle which is refreshing in its absence of the usual reserves, we may refer the student of international politics to pages 104, et seqq., whence it would appear that it is not only in Samoa that Germany has to deplore being represented by officials who are not in touch with sentiment at their own headquarters, and who are positively dangerous in any crisis of unusual delicacy. The remark of an English captain on the spot that "the Germans have got no sea manners" certainly seems justified by the extraordinary conduct of the German man-of-war, "Irene," during the blockade. Admiral Dewey was at last driven to declare that if the Germans did not behave as neutrals he should fire on them. "But that, Sir, would mean war with Germany," said the horror-stricken German. "I am perfectly aware of the fact" was the American's suave reply.

The history of the Philippines might be very fairly anticipated from that preposterous edict which decreed the Western Hemisphere to Spain and the Eastern to Portugal. Fighting immediately began, to settle on which side of the dividing meridian Manila lay. An exhausting struggle about a geographical fact as unalterable as the Equator is a thoroughly appropriate introduction to the story of the islands finally secured by the Power which was on the wrong side of the Papal line of demarcation. They were named after Philip, Prince of Asturias, son and successor of Carlos I. of Spain. In 1762 an inconsequent and apparently inadequate expedition set out from Madras, under Colonel Draper, to "annex" the Philippines before the declaration of war between Spain and England could be known by the garrison. The result was only what the trick itself deserved. For after Draper had taken Manila and secured a million dollars in "war indemnity," the islands were promptly given back to Spain by the home authorities at the Peace of Paris (which seems to be responsible for a good many of our present foreign worries), and a monument was set up to celebrate "the expulsion of the English Army." The marks of Draper's cannon shot can still be seen on the walls of the Polverina, a little bastion which Admiral Dewey's fleet bombarded "by arrangement" last August, as the signal for the surrender of Spain "with all the honours of war." Major Younghusband has no mercy towards the Spanish officers and their ways, and after his dispiriting tale of cruelty and extortion it is a relief to come upon his truly astonishing account of Aguinaldo, the man who appeared above the misty horizon of Filipino society just because the time was ripe for him. He is evidently a person of considerable force of character, and the news of his doings cannot be very refreshing reading for those Americans who imagined that it was all over when the Spanish fleet was sunk by Dewey's merciless and businesslike attack. Major Younghusband's comments on the American soldier, and on the strange development of the great Republic's citizens in their new surroundings, are very interesting. Of their newspapers, of their advertisements, of their chilled beer, and of the complications introduced by an electioneering agent in the midst of a regiment at the front which has several candidates for Congress in its rank and file, the major has much that is of direct and immediate value to report. He was met one fine evening by "an avalanche of horsed vehicles, each head on to the nearest saloon, each driven at top speed by an American soldier, with all its occupants yelling like Sioux Indians." He asked a sentry an unguarded question as to the reason for this outburst. "Lord alive, man," was the reply, "why the Pennsylvania boys has beat North Dakota"; and so they had, at the noble game of baseball. This reminds us of the Russian officer's eager inquiry as to the activity of the English garrison in our latest acquisition in China. He was told that the officers of the English club were laying out their cricket pitch. If the American soldier can approach his own new territorial acquisitions in the same excellent spirit, there is every hope that the United States will develop into a great Imperial Power, in spite of any objections to the contrary from Mr. Carl Schurz or Mr. Andrew Carnegie.

CHILD-STUDY.

The appearance this month of an organ—to be issued three times a year—of the "British Child Study Association," and the recent publication of an original and interesting book called A STUDY OF A CHILD, by Louise E. Hogan, illustrated by over 500 original drawings by the child (Harper, 6s.), will serve to call the attention of those outside the strictly-educational world—a class among whom, we fear, we must reckon most parents—to what is now called the "child-study" movement. "A Study of a Child" comes from America, and in America the "child-study movement" is being prosecuted with characteristic ardour and exaggeration. In England it has its devotees who invite American lecturers to schools and training colleges, there to discourse of "methods" and "results."

The contributors to the new serial are largely American, and it is introduced by Dr. Stanley Hall, President of Clark University, Worcester, Massachusetts. It is called "The Paedologist," a name "intended to be unattractive to children, and to those who, from lack of special interest in the topics treated of, would be 'bored' by that which the title represents." In no spirit of disparagement we may add that the contents of the magazine are conceived in a similar spirit. It will undoubtedly interest the scientific "student" of the child; and what is more important, Dr. Stanley Hall and his colleagues seem to be aware of some of the dangers of the movement, and to take a quite non-professional view of the real meaning and object of "child-study" and of the difficulties of making it subserve a really wholesome purpose. When we consider the work done by Herbart Froebel and others in establishing a more intelligent method of training children, we cannot attach to the "movement" all the importance that some of its advocates claim for it. We are not sure that the task of impressing upon parents those more enlightened principles of education which have been already established is not much more urgent than that of further experiment on the corpus vile of the child. To bring parents and schools together, however, is one of Dr. Stanley Hall's avowed objects; and no exception can be taken to the following result which he claims to have followed from work "in the field of child psychology":—

Child-study has greatly helped the communities in which it has been wisely directed, and increased the love of childhood, and has taught the fact that its ways are not as adult ways, and the recognition of certain inalienable rights of childhood, and has mitigated the severity of the eternal but generally unconscious warfare between children and adults. It has lessened the number of misunderstood children, and taught us to appreciate the great rule that everything pertaining to a school, whether buildings, rooms, desks, text-books, subjects, methods, curricula, should all be plastic and secondary to the supreme law of the nature and needs of childhood.

Professor Earl Barnes, who gives an interesting description of the leading methods of child-study now being employed, divides them into personal isolated studies and organized observations. He recognizes the value of the observations made by mothers and teachers "who know nothing about child-study but know all about children." A mother, though she is experimenting unconsciously, "gets nearer to the real child than she will be likely to get when she has incased herself in a mental suit of psychological nomenclature and formal syllabi." As to the general organized study "the thing most needed to-day is brilliant studies on masses of commonplace children." He recognizes that the gathering together of statistics requires "genius of the first order," and is not accomplished by the mere printing and circulating of a syllabus. "It will be well for us," says another American professor, "if such circulars be not ranked among the common pests of life."

We wish all success to "The Paidologist" if it will continue to bear in mind the necessary limitations of all pure method, and the paramount importance of sympathy in dealing with children. No doubt education as an art has benefited by a close experimental study of child life. But this experimental method is apt to lead to a neglect of certain very essential factors in education, to an exaggeration of method as compared with result, and to a forgetfulness of the fact that the completed moral and intellectual product is the final test of educational practice. It is a far cry from the alternate slapping and coaxing period of child education to the anxious tinkering of modern educationalists. Yet, of the two evils, the latter system, at its fullest development, is quite capable of producing the more pernicious results. Capricious treatment at least develops varied characters. The methodized system tends to produce the prig. And the prig, though often admirable, is always annoying. The vexed question of education, so provocative of cranks, of new and rival "systems," must, we fear, be often very trying to a real child lover. The old, unreasoning, haphazard treatment of children was undeniably bad; yet so many and so great are the dangers of the "child-study movement" as prosecuted by enthusiasts, that it is difficult to give it all the welcome they expect. It may well be disputed, though possibly the attitude is unreasonable, whether a child should be scientifically "studied" at all. It seems almost like taking a base advantage of a defenceless little boy, for instance, to chronicle his baby lisps—not to send to grandma, but merely as a record of mental development—to classify his later remarks, and to ask him to define words without telling him that you are going to send his artless replies to Professors to be annotated.

Nevertheless truth and fairness make it necessary to add that, if the thing is to be done at all, it cannot be better done than in the manner indicated in Mrs. Hogan's book, which is practically a minute record in diary form, of a child's life. It takes a high place, in fact, among the "brilliant studies of commonplace children." She follows in the steps of Prayer and others in her careful observation of a single child, and though she may have hardly realized the possibility of so alarming a result, she affords material for those philosophers who, to adopt Dr. Stanley Hall's phraseology, seek "to build a system of psychogenesis upon a monopaedic basis." The following, taken at random, is an extract from the diary which was regularly kept from the time the child was fourteen months old till he had reached his eighth year:—

February 24th. To-day he said at various times, "Did she take 'em out?" (alluding to some action of his nurse with regard to some toys), "luffy wheel," and "lof Dr. T—," meaning a physician who called recently to see him.

He wanted a book of photographs this morning which he called "Uncle Henery's book," because it contained a picture of his uncle. He said, "Mamma, give Harold pictures," then said to himself "ask mamma gib Harold pictures," as if approving of his method for getting them.

He said to Annie to-day about a broken toy, "I thought you fixed it." He also said, "Hang it up on a nail," pronouncing the "g" hard when saying hang.

In spite of the fact that to the initiated the diary makes a depressing background to his existence, Harold appears to be a childish and happy child, intelligent, but not abnormally clever, which is encouraging. Those parts of the introduction to Mrs. Hogan's book with which we are in most cordial agreement, are on the subject of non-interference:—

It is a well-established fact [she says] that a child learns through playing, and by having opportunity to let nature assert itself spontaneously and without restraint, under watchful supervision, of which, however, it must be unconscious; yet how commonly we see nurses, and even parents endeavouring to attract the attention of an infant, perhaps with the idea of amusing, when most probably its only requirement at the time is to be let alone to do what pleases it. . . . Instead of being quietly placed where the child may reach it, a ball will be shaken to and fro, or up and down, so rapidly that the babe's eyes are unable to follow it; hands will be clapped so loud that the child becomes frightened; the nurse will keep up an eternal jogging on the knee of the body of the child with some curious notion of the necessity for constant movement as a pacifier.

Here again is a passage showing much sound sense and discernment:—

Undoubtedly one of the greatest dangers to be found to-day in the average kindergarten lies in the absorption of method and the aggressiveness of the teacher's personality to the exclusion of spontaneity and the self-effacement necessary upon the teacher's part for the promotion of unconscious development in the child. . . . The child is certainly unformed at this period, hence may be moulded for good or evil, and in consequence man's methods in training must be carefully adjusted so as not to brush away the bloom of the "lovely grace of childhood" [the italics are ours] . . . to treat children sympathetically in order that we may obtain a clearer insight into their mental processes and know better how to guide them, we must certainly absorb the spirit of Froebel, who begs us to live with our children, not only for them.

This is the root of the whole matter. It is the letter that killeth, and unfortunately, in much of the training of latter-day children, it is the "letter" that is apparent to the total exclusion of the "spirit." Theories would do very little harm if every parent, if every teacher, were wise, sympathetic, tolerant, and, above all, possessed of a sense of humour. It is to this fatal lack of humour that most of the extravagancies of the child-study "movement" may be attributed. Why are educationalists so portentously solemn? The care and training of children is a very serious matter, no doubt, but when grave discussions are held as to whether wool or straw-plaiting best educes (we believe that is the correct term) this or that particular faculty, when every trifling communication is made to the child with the air of a priestess officiating at a sacred rite, it is perhaps time that the voice of the scoffer should be heard in the land. The spirit of the movement is right enough; but let parents, guardians, and teachers examine the letter very closely. Methods, schemes, theories have their place, but, after all, it is personality which really counts. Give a child an exhilarating human being to deal with, and, from his nonsense even, he will learn more of real value than from all the wisdom of the Education-machine.

THE CRITIC AS AUTHOR.

The Musician's Pilgrimage: a Study in Artistic Development. By J. A. Fuller-Maitland. 8x5in., 152 pp. London, 1899. Smith, Elder. 5/-

Mr. Fuller-Maitland, who has more than once approached the public in the attitude of the scholar in music—as in his work on the German masters—now gives us a book of a more intimate kind, the result of his experiences as a musical critic. In "The Musician's Pilgrimage," the pilgrim (i.e., the executant) begins as "the prodigy" in the nursery, either idolised or misunderstood, and develops into the student "at the point of time when his will is enlisted on the side of his education, when the impulse to learn takes the place of coercion." The student in due time becomes "the prig." Then love of his art transforms him into "the amateur," and the desire for applause into "the virtuoso." Finally, reverence for the great in music induces the virtuoso to lay aside his knavish tricks, and to use his technical skill only for the furtherance of the sane ideals of "the artist" himself. And now as to "the critic." It might have been expected that the musical critic who has so long had to suffer the waywardness of living performers, persons with feelings that must be delicately handled, would feel a pleasurable excitement in revealing their iniquities when they appear as abstractions—prig, prodigy, veteran, and so forth. But Mr. Fuller-Maitland is most chivalrous in his new hunting ground; so much so that we trust that the few shafts which he does let loose may reach their quarry, whether he be the virtuoso, "whose object is to play louder, to sing higher, or to fiddle faster than any one in the profession," or the conductor whose "sole care is for the delicate shading and the violent contrasts of tone that he gets his hand to produce."

Only in one particular does the author's experience as critic lessen the interest of the book. He is now and again the least bit axiomatic. As critic it may be necessary for him to say that Miss So and So emits a series of meaningless sounds; but as author he need hardly tell us that something more than this is required. An occasional axiom, however, is more than relieved by the ingenious way in which Mr. Maitland has planned the pilgrimage of the performer, with its clear demarcation between the right and the wrong paths at each critical point. He is at times even the reverse of axiomatic, as in his interesting chapter on "the artist," where he says that, "in order to succeed in the portrayal of feeling, the feeling must have ceased to affect the performer himself," a remark which at first sight seems a paradox. Imagine the rage of a performer on reading in his daily paper that it was obvious from his rendering that all feeling for the composition had ceased to affect him! Yet though Mr. Maitland has, perhaps, a little overstated the point, no doubt the fine frenzy of much modern music would a little upset the equilibrium of the virtuoso should he really feel it all at once. On the other hand most great music is of a kind too deep for the tears even of an artist. It can be appreciated, like the highest wit, with little or no muscular results. No one, for instance, who has heard Madame Albani in the Messiah can doubt that, though she rises calm and unshaken to sing the most immortal of songs, she is moved by a deep feeling of conviction in her rendering of the opening words, "I know that my Redeemer liveth."

A CONTRIBUTION TO SPANISH HISTORY.

The Story of the Princess des Ursins in Spain.
By Constance Hill. 8½ x 5½ in., xiii. + 256 pp. London, 1899.
Heinemann. 7/6

There must be many readers, not ill-informed upon the whole, to whom the Princess des Ursins is little more than a name, though no less an authority than St. Simon declared that her history would be well worth writing. His memoirs, indeed, supply a good deal of the material for writing it; and the Princess's letters have been published in instalments in 1777, 1806, 1826, and 1859, the last instalment, discovered at Stockholm by M. Geoffroy, being preceded by a biographical sketch. The full and careful presentment of her career, however, by Miss Constance Hill is a welcome addition to historical literature. The Princess was a widow of an Italian Prince of the Orsini family. At the age of fifty-nine she was appointed Camerara Mayor to the Queen of Spain; and she was the power behind the throne in Spain at the time of the wars between the French and Austrian claimants. Most of the leading events of the period—Marlbrough's victories, the capture of Gibraltar, and Lord Peterborough's expedition—are sufficiently familiar. What is comparatively new, and, therefore, noteworthy and acceptable, in Miss Hill's book is that she enables us to look at the events in detail from the Spanish point of view. There may be little in the book that the student could not get for himself, without much trouble, from the letters; but the picture is well and graphically drawn.

The distresses, for example, of the Court, driven in a hurry from Madrid to Burgos, are described with piquant touches in a letter to Madame de Maintenon:—

I must give you some amusement, dear Madame, by a description of my apartments. They consist of a single room of about twelve or thirteen feet square. A large window, facing south, occupies nearly the whole of one wall. The window is open, and we are unable to close it. A small door leads into the Queen's chamber, and a second door, yet smaller, leads into a winding passage. I dare not explore this passage, for, although there are lamps hung here and there which shed some light, it is so ill-paved that I might stumble and break my neck. I cannot describe the walls as white, for they are blackened with dirt. The furniture consists of my small travelling bed, a camp stool, and a deal table. At this table I alternately arrange my toilet, write my letters, and eat my bread and fruit. As to appliances for cooking, there are none, and perhaps if there were, we should have no money to spend on dainties.

The final fall of the Princess des Ursins from power was due, of course, to the intrigues of Cardinal Alberoni; he objected to her advanced views about the Inquisition, and arranged a second marriage for the King for the express purpose of getting rid of her. The falling of the blow makes a dramatic story, which Miss Hill wisely allows St. Simon to tell for her. The Princess had waited upon the new Queen "in full Court costume richly jewelled." The young Queen asked what the old lady meant by appearing before her so attired "and with manners that were disrespectful." The Princess defended herself; but the Queen pushed her out of the apartment by the shoulders; and the soldiers arrested her and packed her into a coach, and drove her, with "no proper food nor even a change of clothes, for the twenty-three days, at the end of which she reached the border town of St. Jean de Luz." And so ended a career which would have been interesting in any case, but is made absorbingly so by the judicious selection and picturesque vivacity of Miss Hill's narrative.

THEOLOGY.

Sermons, Biographical and Miscellaneous. By Benjamin Jowett, M.A., Master of Balliol College. Edited by the Very Rev. the Hon. W. H. Fremantle, Dean of Ripon. 7½ x 5½ in., x. + 870 pp. London, 1899.
Murray. 7/6

The men now living who look up to Jowett as their academic father, having learnt to value that dry, brusque, but very bracing paternity, will alone provide a respectable band of readers for this second volume of his sermons; and they will, we may hope, be supplemented by a still larger number who value a frank treatment of great subjects, and appreciate original thought, even when they disagree with it. The sermons before us are mainly biographical; there is some theology in the first part, but there is some biography even in the eight "miscellaneous" sermons which conclude the book. Through it all runs the master's special message, which was not so much a theological as a moral one,—a claim for tolerance and charity, a plea for more trust in the light that flowed so rapidly into the world during his lifetime, a warning against traditional conservatism.

This is the spirit which would pursue truth as a duty, in the faith that no inquiry into the origin of man, or his duration upon the earth, nor into the facts of Scripture history, or any other investigation which relates to us as mortal or immortal beings, can ever be displeasing to the God of Truth. They do not seek to defend this or that belief which has been handed down from past ages; if they are true to themselves they are not a party, and have no party interests; they would test all religious beliefs by the principles of morality, and read all controversies in the light of history.

How completely this spirit has been vindicated since Jowett preached his sermon on "Church Parties" in Westminster Abbey nine and twenty years ago! The sentiments appear almost commonplace or old-fashioned to us now. Yet, when they were uttered, their author turned in despair from the clergy and could only claim "the majority of the educated laity" on his side. In the present year of grace it seems to be rather the laity who are inclined to forget the lessons of tolerance and faith in the praevalēbit veritas; while the thoughtful clergy of all parties have assimilated the ideas which, as Jowett truly said, were of no party.

Jowett would have made an excellent biographer; therefore we cannot regret that he took Orders, and thus saved to us estimates of men which would very likely have been buried with him, had not the pulpit drawn him from his reticence. Yet it is curious that one so untrammelled in most things should have bowed to the convention which demands from the preacher a Biblical peg for his remarks. When he ignores his rather perfunctory texts he is best; but in the case of the sermon on

T. H. Green, he wastes a third of his space in moralizing over a not particularly appropriate quotation from the Second Book of Samuel, and thus gives us but a slender appreciation of a most interesting man. It spoils, too, the chance of these sermons becoming permanent literature to find an appreciation of Dickens (lately dead) tacked on to the sermon on "Church Parties"; and there could have been no reason in the inwardness of things for combining Ignatius Loyola and Benjamin Disraeli in one discourse. The attempt to make Bunyan and Spinoza the subjects of a common eulogy strikes us also as a little forced—an athletic exercise in toleration—and we cannot see that these two men of genius "arrived, if not quite, yet nearly, at a common end," although the very most is made of Spinoza's religion; indeed, Jowett seems to see more Christianity in Spinoza than Spinoza would perhaps have seen in Jowett.

But all these biographical studies are good reading, from that of Wycliffe to that of Pascal (which shows curious affinities with Pater's essay on the founder of French prose), and that of "Léon Gambetta and Archbishop Tait." The most valuable are those of the master's own personal friends, foremost among whom is Dean Stanley. Surely nothing more unlike the traditional panegyric was ever delivered than these curious funeral orations; scant in superlatives, strong in criticism, yet by no means wanting in appreciation. They are just what most wise men would wish to be said of them by their friends. For Queens a Bossuet; for Deans a Jowett. Certainly, praise from the Master was deserved; and when, having learned that Tait was "not a great scholar," that his lectures, though plain and clear, cut the knots "rather after the Gordian fashion," that his manners, though kind, were "sometimes what is called brusque," that "he has been charged with regardlessness of truth, and this, rightly explained, is not an accusation wholly without foundation"—when, after these deductions, we are told also of his self-reliance, good sense, courage, and energy in promoting good works, we feel that he must have possessed these latter qualities in a very high degree indeed. Jowett is a lesson to all biographers to pull themselves together and look facts in the face. He is, in truth, extraordinarily fair; and, while condemning the views of an opposing body of churchmen, he can throw in the remark, "But we must also remember that we cannot show the same devoted lives, the same willingness to give up worldly interests for the sake of an idea."

There are many valuable passages scattered up and down in this collection, as the description of mathematics, "the purest of knowledge, the truest of knowledge, the most luminous of knowledge," on pp. 201-2; or the comparison of faith without knowledge and knowledge without faith, on p. 57; or the defence of subscription to the Articles, the enumeration of "the weighty considerations which may induce men of a liberal cast of mind to take Orders at the present day," on p. 145. Once or twice he rises to higher flights:—

Yet we may be allowed to think of him as in the presence of God, with whom is the fountain of light, and in whom the parts of knowledge which we see through a glass darkly, the laws of nature, the truths of figures and numbers, the ideas of justice, love, and truth, which are his attributes, are beheld face to face. But there is no tongue of man or of angels in which such things can be expressed. We meditate on the infinite possibilities of another life, and are silent.

THE PARSON'S HANDBOOK, by the Rev. Percy Dearmer (Grant Richards, 3s. 6d.), appears at an opportune moment. It is an attempt by a competent ecclesiologist, whose literary skill is as conspicuous as his absence of fanaticism, to guide "parsons and others" as to what is, as a matter of fact, the English use in all the details of the management of the parish church and its services. His point of view is thus stated:—

There can be no doubt that the only satisfactory settlement of the question of ceremonial will be through the constitution of an authoritative committee of experts, such as is recommended by the present Archbishop of York. Such a committee, deciding all the questions brought before it with strict impartiality and with exact knowledge, will secure the support of all loyal churchmen, and will gradually establish throughout the land a type of service such as the Prayer-book contemplates, a service unequalled in Christendom for dignity, beauty, and reverence. But, meanwhile, something must be done, both to satisfy the consciences of those who cannot be content with mere nonconformity, and to establish the ceremonial of the future on a sound foundation. No individual, or unauthorized committee of individuals, has any right to dictate in such a matter. But yet much may be done in the way of suggestion; for, in the great majority of cases, it is now certain on what lines a committee of experts would decide.

It is a commendable undertaking to set down the main points which may be taken as settled by liturgical experts, and Mr. Dearmer has done his work extremely well, but his exposition of particular matters of ceremony will probably be accepted more readily than his view of what is, after all, the crux of the controversy—the Ornaments Rubric. He will not allow that the famous rubric refers to the first Prayer-book at all, on the ground that, though the first Prayer-book received Parliamentary authority in the second, it did not come into force till the third year of Edward the Sixth. The conclusion at which he thus arrives is that "the ornaments ordered by our Church are those of 1548, unless their use has been taken away by a rubric of the Book of Common Prayer." In fact, no ornaments whatever had been disallowed, except that the injunctions of 1547 had "ordered the removal of all shrines and everything connected with them, of those images which had been abused by offerings and other superstitious observances, and of those pictures which represented feigned miracles." Mr. Dearmer does not seem to leave much sense to the words, "By authority of Parliament," and shows no reason why the second year of Edward the Sixth was chosen as the standard date. Mr. Dearmer is a Ritualist (in the best sense), and he, of course, assumes that whatever is not expressly forbidden in the Prayer-book is allowed. The result at which he arrives by this method of reasoning is that every article that was to be found in any church cupboard, whether it can be shown to have been in the actual legal use or not, may be, and ought to be, still employed, and that we have practically no rule to go by except the usage of the medieval English Church as interpreted by archaeologists. This usage we have here set out. Into its details we have no space here to enter, but parsons may cheerfully accept Mr. Dearmer as an intelligent guide who has made a serious study of his subject. Of course, they cannot expect certainty. How uncertain usage may be is seen from Mr. Dearmer's disquisition on Colours, from which it appears that so grave a question as whether a confessor ought to be commemorated in green or yellow is still undecided. As befits a scientific student of the subject who believes that the English Church has a mind of her own, he expresses a strong objection to merely fancy ritual on the one side, and to the unintelligent following of Roman use on the other. Lastly, Mr. Dearmer has well-defined artistic views and instincts, and it is in "the vulgarity in the Church" that he finds a cause for the alienation of literary people from the Church. On this subject he is outspoken and even racy:—

For vulgarity in the long run always means cheapness, and cheapness means the tyranny of the sweater. It has been pointed out that the modern preacher often stands in a sweated pulpit, wearing a sweated surplice over a suit of clothes that were not produced under fair conditions, and holding a sweated book in one hand, and with the other he points to the machine-made cross at the jerry-built altar, and appeals to the sacred principles of mutual sacrifice and love.

This is from the "Introduction." In the remaining eight chapters, which have a list of authorities appended to them, the book is severely practical, though by no means dull or pedantic. And if any one, for instance, should be anxious to know what a "Tenebræ Herse" ought to be in a church where "they do things properly" he cannot do better than ask Mr. Dearmer.

SOME COMMENTARIES.

Canon Gore's PRACTICAL EXPOSITION OF THE EPISTLE TO THE ROMANS (Vol. I., Murray 3s. 6d.) will be read with very great interest. For this Epistle has been for at least three centuries the keystone of Christian controversy. Justification by faith, predestination, election—these doctrines found their authority, or were thought to find their authority, in what St. Paul wrote to the Romans. Now the first half of this most interesting Epistle is here explained for us by a most interesting man. For Mr. Gore stands for the unifying influence of modern religious thought. The average member of Parliament and the average journalist are under the impression that we are on the eve of a religious Armageddon; nothing could be farther from the real truth; there has never been a time when men of opposite parties were so close together as now—thinking men, we mean, of course; the others do not count for more than a twelvemonth. The popularity of Canon Gore's writings with Nonconformists, Broad Churchmen, and High Anglicans alike is a sign that those who agree with the same person cannot be very far from agreeing with one another. How Mr. Gore deals with the deep problems of the most closely reasoned of all St. Paul's letters, we must leave readers to discover. His fairness and common sense are nowhere better shown than in his introductory essay on what Paul meant by "faith" and by "works," and on the rival claims of individualism and ecclesiasticism in religion. We rise from the book with a feeling of wonder that there could ever have been any controversy about these matters at all. Certainly, the misunderstandings of the past will not long survive the wider spirit of which Mr. Gore is so true an exponent.

The scope and limitations of THE BOOK OF JOB, by Edgar C. S. Gibson, D.D. (Oxford Commentaries, edited by Walter Lock, D.D., Methuen, 6s.), are clearly defined in the preface:—

The primary object is to be exegetical. The editors will not deal, except subordinately, with questions of textual criticism . . . but will aim at combining a hearty acceptance of critical principles with loyalty to the Catholic faith.

To a certain extent such a foreword disarms criticism; but it remains to the reviewer to point out what these prefatory remarks portend. Nearly all the points at which modern criticism has led to theologically unpleasant conclusions are passed circuitously. Take, for example, the rôle played by Satan. Of the origin and growth of Satanic belief among the Jews—of the change of view evident between 2 Samuel, "Jehovah moved David against Israel," and 1 Chronicles, "Satan stood up against Israel and moved David"—of the change by which the Divine attorney of Job I. and II., maliciously inclined against man, developed into the adversary of the Deity—of all this Dr. Gibson says next to nothing. He contents himself with an attempt to reconcile the portraiture in Job with that of the New Testament. Satan's entrée is taken to show that even now "we ought to regard him in some sort as having access to God." "But the whole subject of the fall of Satan is confessedly obscure." To take a second point. Dr. Gibson clings to the old inspiring interpretation of that famous passage, "I know that my Redeemer liveth," &c. While mentioning that alternative views exist, he does not think it necessary to notice that the old view has been abandoned by critics (except by those who regard the passage, in geological parlance, as an "error") almost unanimously. Dr. Cheyne's late contribution to the subject seems to have been quite overlooked.

It is in his patient, lucid, interest-sustaining explanations of the text that Dr. Gibson is at his best. Sometimes, as, e.g., with regard to Rahab, his notes are really admirable; and this fact makes one regret the more that he has not taken pains to make them always so. In the whole book there does not seem to be a single reference to the curious phenomena presented by the patristic quotations. When notice is taken of Job's aberration from Mosaic rule in making his daughters inherit with his sons, one misses a reference to the Talmudic sentence attributed to Christ, "The son and daughter shall inherit alike." Strangest of all is the omission to make any mention of the recently republished "Testament of Job." Dr. Gibson's work is primarily addressed, so he tells us in the preface, "to clergymen and theological students," and to this circumstance one may attribute its peculiar limitations. The author feels restrained from telling his readers more than may be good for them. Of what is good enough for them he takes, we believe, too low a standard.

Both in respect of its scientific method and the thoroughness of its exegesis, THE BOOKS OF SAMUEL, by Dr. H. P. Smith (T. and T. Clark, 12s.), is worthy of its place in the International Critical Commentary. The task of the commentator is far from easy, owing to the serious corruptions of the Hebrew text, and the peculiar phenomena of "a complex historical process" which the Books of Samuel exhibit. On some points of criticism Professor Smith is cautious. For instance, he questions whether the two distinct streams of narrative found in I. Samuel, 1-15, can be unreservedly identified with J and E respectively. In one of the two documents he finds as many resemblances to the work of the Deuteronomic school as to that of the "Elohist." A useful section of the introduction is devoted to the "Religious Ideas of the Books of Samuel." Professor Smith draws attention to the traces of pre-prophetic religion which survive in these books, and also to the comparatively low and primitive conceptions of Deity. The commentary is the most complete and minute hitherto published by an English-speaking scholar.

Dr. Swete, in his THE GOSPEL ACCORDING TO ST. MARK (Macmillan, 15s.), says that the second Gospel "has gained far less attention than it deserves." The present magnificent edition certainly supplies a want which has been long felt by students of the New Testament. It is strange that the vivid narrative of St. Mark attracted so little attention among early expositors. No doubt there was a common impression "that the second Gospel was a mere abridgment of the first," and that Mark was a mere pedisequens et brevior of Matthew. Recently the practical certainty that the second Gospel stands nearest (at least in its main portions) to the common source has enhanced its historical importance, and in this commentary ample justice is done to Mark's peculiar excellences as a narrator of facts. Dr. Swete, on the whole, adheres to the traditional view of St. Mark's connexion with St. Peter. With regard to the last twelve verses of the Gospel, he approves Mr. F. C. Conybeare's suggestion that their true author is Aristion, who is said by Papias to have been, with John the presbyter, a disciple of Christ. Probably the verses belong to a collection of Aristion's "expositions" (διηγήσεις) of Christ's teaching, and became attached to the second Gospel as a "genuine relic of the first generation." The whole introduction is very careful and scholarly, one section being of exceptional value—viz., that in which Dr. Swete describes the "external conditions of the life of Christ as depicted by St. Mark." The notes represent the very best style of Cambridge scholarship, and suggest comparison with the commentaries of Bishop Lightfoot. At every point the importance to the New Testament expositor of an intimate acquaintance with the Septuagint is made apparent. There are one or two points which demanded fuller treatment in an excursus or additional note. We could have wished for a discussion of Jewish demonology, a subject which the second Gospel brings into prominence. On the whole, however, the commentary leaves little or nothing to be desired, and its attractiveness is enhanced by Dr. Swete's frequent quotation of the spiritual and devotional comments of Jerome, Bede, and other patristic writers. Another valuable feature of the book is the complete index of words used by the evangelist. Finally a reviewer can but cordially endorse the well-deserved compliment paid in the preface to the workmen and readers of the University Press.

Professor Hort's FIRST EPISTLE OF ST. PETER, 1: 1-2: 17 (Macmillan, 6s.), is unfortunately only a fragment of a fragment. It was a part of a commentary originally designed to be one of the author's contributions to a great scheme, which he formed in 1860 in conjunction with the late and present Bishops of Durham, of an exegetical series upon all the books of the New Testament, interpreting them "with loyal obedience to the strictest rules of criticism to the most exact scholarship, and to the frankest historical inquiry." It is therefore a sad reminder of one of the most important proposals ever made by a brilliant knot of scholars, but destined unhappily to fall very far short of fulfilment. It is, of course, characterized by that refinement of scholarship, reverence of mind, and "infinite power of taking pains" which always marked Professor Hort's work. It necessarily suffers by the circumstances under which it comes out, and there are questions which the student would desire to have discussed but which go without discussion. In his essay on "The Provinces of Asia Minor included in St. Peter's Address" he makes a suggestive addition to Ewald's theory in explanation of the order of the enumeration. There is an interesting "Introductory Notice" by Bishop Westcott, and the book is edited with the utmost care and loyalty to its author.

It is to be hoped that Mr. G. W. Garrod's ANALYSIS OF THE EPISTLE TO THE COLOSSIANS (Macmillan, 3s. n.) will have the sale it deserves. People who have not time or money for Lightfoot and Godet can yet obtain a reasonable mastery of the Epistle with the help of this analysis. We wonder how many of those who read the Bible as a religious duty take the trouble to understand what its writers really meant. The increase of sound and sensible commentaries makes one hope that the number is becoming larger than it was. The arrangement of Mr. Garrod's book is remarkably clear; on one page is the text, generally one verse only, which leaves a generous space for MS. notes; the Authorised Version is printed in full, and in a column by its side are those words which are altered in the Revised Version; the opposite page is full of notes, both critical and explanatory; and the more suggestive passages from other commentators are quoted. The book concludes with questions and an index, and contains an introduction, biographical and geographical notes, a comparison with the Epistle to the Ephesians, both a short and a detailed analysis, and three most interesting pages on the Creed as embodied in this Epistle. It would be difficult to suggest any improvement.

We can only hope that the result of the constant output of Commentaries, of which Professor A. B. Bruce's new book on the EPISTLE TO THE HEBREWS (T. and T. Clark, 7s. 6d.) is an excellent example, will be to make the Bible more and more a reasonable basis for our common Christianity. The washy sermon is really a crime, when any one who is not mentally deficient can easily, by the expenditure of 7s. 6d. (for instance), talk sense for six months about the Epistle to the Hebrews. Dr. Bruce's book is rather a series of expositions than a strict commentary; in twenty-one chapters he explains the teaching of this Epistle, so attractive by reason of the beauty of its style, so misleading if the circumstances of its composition are ignored. It was written to Jewish Christians who clung to their old rites, and found it hard to accept the humane simplicity of the Gospel and the humiliation of Christ. This being so, it is hardly necessary to say that certain ingenious Germans discovered that it was not written to Hebrews at all, a theory which shows the refined sense of humour of which the Teutonic mind is capable.

We are glad to see a new edition of Dr. Plummer's THE GOSPEL ACCORDING TO ST. LUKE (T. and T. Clark, 12s.). The author will find some satisfaction in the fact that his cautious and judicious treatment of the problem of the "Census" (St. Lk. ii. 1 foll.) has been amply justified by the recent investigation of the subject in Professor Ramsay's volume, "Was Christ born at Bethlehem?" It may be safely said that this careful and elaborate edition will not be quickly, nor, indeed, ever, wholly superseded.

OTHER NEW BOOKS.

POURTRAITS IMAGINAIRES, par Walter Pater, traduits par Georges Khnopff (Mercure de France, 3f. 50). The latest edition to the series of "Foreign Authors," edited by M. Henry D. Davray, should find acceptance in France. No English writer more scrupulously worked in accord with the paramount French literary tradition than Walter Pater. Not that Pater was an Englishman who wrote as a Frenchman; far from it. He learned a great lesson, but it was a lesson of art only; the lesson of the application of the finest means of expression to the winnowed residue of thought. If any wish to discern how essentially English Pater is, or how absolutely a Northerner, now Flemish, now Anglo-Saxon, let him read this translation of the "Imaginary Portraits." M. Khnopff has acquitted himself well in a task which might have daunted the most daring. But we must add that the "Imaginary Portraits" is incomparably superior to the "Portraits Imaginaires." M. Khnopff's rendering is always faithful, and sometimes admirable; but that living spirit of art which animates the original is absent. We have the voice, but not the intonation; the subtle words, but not the subtle accent. Is it the fault of the language or what, that one reads unmoved so able as well as literal a translation as:—

Il y a un ton en lui qui me frappe comme s'accordant bien avec la grâce de ces bouleaux sans feuilles qui se détachent sur le ciel, l'argent pâle de leur écorce et une certaine délicate odeur de ruine qui s'élève du sol.

and is moved by the (at first sight) seemingly equivalent:—

There is a tone about it all which strikes me as going well with the grace of these leafless birch trees against the sky, the silver of their bark, and a certain delicate odour of decay which rises from the soil.

In fact, the scrupulous sobriety, the rarefied art of Pater, is beyond the reach of absolutely equivalent translation.

In reading this book and M. Khnopff's translation of Mr. Arthur Symons' admirable essay on Pater one is struck by the thought that Pater's work is too Flemish, too Anglo-Saxon in thought, to read as well in French, for all its æsthetic kinship with that language; while the essay of Mr. Symons, on the other hand—and Mr. Symons is the most French in style of all our younger writers—seems finer in M. Khnopff's version than in the original.

A PICTURESQUE HISTORY OF YORKSHIRE (Dent, 1s. n., in eighteen monthly parts), which Mr. J. S. Fletcher is writing, may be judged by the first part, entitled "The Humber and Ouse, from Spurn Head to Howden." The whole will prove to be a useful addition to our county histories. The author has not only made use of his researches among other writers, but also of a wide personal observation and an acute sense of the picturesque. In the present issue he is well supported by the small army of artists which is engaged with him. Mr. Herbert Railton is at his best with the west front of York Minster, his gargoyles of Patrington, and his sketches of Hedon; Mr. William Hyde lends the magic of his romantic method to such subjects as Hull from the Humber, and the Lighthouses on Spurn Head; and the many other drawings all add interest to the book. In an easy and agreeable fashion the author travels from Spurn Head to Howden, and everywhere finds subject for his notes and inspiration for his researches. We have seldom seen a more promising "first part" of a popular historical and topographical work.

Serving his country at a station of no particular importance on the Ganges, Mr. Mark Thornhill had a good deal of leisure on his hands. He spent much of it in observing the birds and beasts and insects, and he kept a diary. Out of the material thus accumulated, he has built a book, HAUNTS AND HOBBIES OF AN INDIAN OFFICIAL (Murray, 6s.), mostly consisting of stray notes on the phenomena of his Indian garden. It is a curiously amorphous book, shifting from ants to elephants, and from locusts to narcotics, with what seems like reckless defiance of all known laws of the association of ideas. But it is light reading, and gives a clear picture of certain phases of the life of Indian Civil servants. Ants seem to have been the inhabitants of his garden which had the greatest fascination for Mr. Thornhill. His first chapter is exclusively devoted to them; and if you open any later chapter at random you will almost certainly find that he has returned to them. He made experiments to test their intelligence, satisfying himself, by the most careful and conclusive methods, that a single ant, on discovering something good to eat, straightway went off and communicated his discovery to all the other ants; and he organized battles between ants and ant-lions, and watched the strategy and tactics of the campaigns. Though one cannot say that the book is brilliantly written, amateurs of natural history will certainly read it with a lively interest.

Fourteen bright and sensible essays, mostly on subjects which concern married women and young women who wish to be married, are brought together in SALVAGE, by Lady Magnus (Nutt, 1s.). The views of the essayist are what is called "old-fashioned." She is opposed to high schools and examinations, holding that a knowledge of cookery and house work is more to the point than a knowledge of the dead languages and the higher mathematics. Yet her pen is trenchant, and, in a controversy, she would certainly hold her own against any girl graduate of our acquaintance.

Vol. XI. of the GENTLEMAN'S MAGAZINE LIBRARY (Stock, 7s. 6d.), edited by Mr. Laurence Gomme, is devoted to the topography of Staffordshire and Suffolk, and is as usual a storehouse of quaint information, as, for example:—

At Walsall a very remarkable custom still prevails. On the eve of Epiphany a gift of one penny is regularly distributed to every person resident in the borough and neighbouring villages. The origin is uncertain. Some say a person of the name of Roxley, hearing a child cry for bread on that day, was so affected that he vowed the like should never occur again, and so he left his manor of Bescot as means to prevent it. And so forth, for the passage quoted is typical of many.

ON CENTENARIANS (Layton, 7s. 6d.) is the title of a carefully-written work setting forth the results of certain inquiries instituted by Mr. T. E. Young, formerly President of the Institute of Actuaries. He particularly writes upon the difficulty of proving "centenarianism," and draws our attention to the fact that only twenty-two indisputable examples of it are known to the Insurance offices, one of them being the eminent Sir Moses Montefiore. It appears that more females than males, more annuitants than assured persons, and more spinsters than wives live to be one hundred years of age. The prize, however, falls to a widow, who was born before the Reign of Terror, and lived until the year of the Diamond Jubilee; the longest lived of the males was born nine years before the Declaration of American Independence, and lived to see the outbreak of the Franco-Prussian War. The part of the book devoted to this branch of the subject is very interesting; the later chapters, which discuss the ages attributed to the patriarchs in the Book of Genesis, are less worthy of serious attention.

If Mr. Alexander Macpherson of Kingussie, who is obviously an enthusiastic antiquary as well as a loyal clansman, has not thrown much fresh light either upon the Highland rising in 1689 or upon the '45 in his GLEANINGS FROM THE CHARTER CHEST AT CLUNY CASTLE (Inverness, Northern Chronicle Office), his burrowing industry has enabled him to unearth a number of letters from such historical personages as Dundee and his Killiecrankie opponent Mackay, Prince Charles, Lord George Murray, and Lochiel. Cluny Castle has always been the residence of the Chief of the Clan Macpherson, who was invariably a good Jacobite. So he was in the habit of receiving friendly epistles from the leaders of the different Risings, and letters occasionally the reverse of friendly from the other side. It is rather to be regretted that Mr. Macpherson has burdened his brochure—his own writing in which is always to the point—with long extracts from forgotten authors.

IN THE CYCLOPEDIA OF HOME ARTS (Pearson, 7s. 6d. n.), by Mr. Montague Marks, we have an indication of the great increase both in numbers and intelligence among all the educated classes of those who practise technical art. The book certainly meets a want, and the strictly practical nature of its counsels is a refreshing contrast to many of the innumerable manuals on special arts, such, for instance, as landscape painting, which already exist. It is fairly exhaustive—treating of drawing and painting in all their branches, and in their latest developments, and on a variety of materials—and not neglecting as a distinct branch of art that of "approaching the publisher"—of modelling, wood carving, leather decoration, metal work, and applied design of various kinds. We do not regret the space saved by omitting any full treatment, for beginners, of photography, and we welcome the place devoted to its stead to taxidermy. The book is well and fully illustrated, and will be found, we think, of real practical value in the home.

Mr. F. H. Deverell visited the Holy Land as "one of a party under the direction of Mr. Cook." In MY TOUR IN PALESTINE AND SYRIA (Eyre and Spottiswoode), he has written the most thoroughly pious book of travels that we remember having read. The note is struck quite early in the volume. A casual acquaintance had suggested to the author that a British occupation of Palestine was predicted in Nahum II. 3, 4, and that the passage, in question, also indicated that the British soldiers—"the valiant men in scarlet"—would be conveyed to their destination by railway. Mr. Deverell's comment is:—

For my part, if this interpretation is correct, I am struck with the boldness of the Prophet in writing these words, not understanding them, and with his entire sense of duty, his implicit obedience, his complete surrender to be led by the inspiring Spirit within him. If, too, this explanation is the true one, and a British occupation of Palestine is really predicted in the Bible, what a splendid thing such an event would be!

The whole book is in this tone and will be appreciated by devotional travellers who follow in the author's track. It contains a good map, and is illustrated with photographs of moderate merit.

We are not quite sure that it was worth while for Mr. Bernard W. Kelly to write the LIFE OF HENRY BENEDICT STUART, CARDINAL DUKE OF YORK (Washbourne). The Cardinal in question is principally remarkable because he was a splendid pluralist, and because, after proclaiming himself Henry IX. of England, he accepted a pension from George III., who had previously had occasion to put a price upon his brother's head. It is clearly better for the reputation of such a Cardinal that the world should be allowed to forget all about him. Still, Mr. Kelly has written his biography passably well, and the members of the Order of the White Rose will, no doubt, be curious to read it. Now and again Mr. Kelly's desire to show that the Roman Catholic religion enjoys a special measure of Divine protection leads him to make statements scarcely warranted by the facts. On page 96, for example, we are invited to observe the Pope "relying for aid on that Almighty power which has ever preserved the Holy See in the hour of danger"; while on page 98 we are told that "the halls of the Vatican resounded with the shouts of an exultant soldiery," that "the Vicar of Christ stood alone amidst flashing sabres and bristling bayonets," and that "the Tricolour waved over the Castle of St. Angelo." The collocation of these passages produces an impression which a more adroit dialectician would have avoided.

EUROPEAN HISTORY (Macmillan, 6s. 6d. n.), by George Burton Adams, of the University of Yale, is the most recent of American school-books; and the most important thing about an American school-book is its politics. For a long while—until quite lately, in fact—these were such as to teach the lads of the United States to regard Englishmen as their natural enemies. In "The Land of the Dollar" Mr. G. W. Steevens quoted some truly terrible examples. By Professor Burton Adams this policy is reversed. Even in writing of the War of Independence he does not spread the Eagle further than it will conveniently go; and he concludes by pointing out that his country and ours—the two great Anglo-Saxon nations—are doing, and have to do, different phases of the same work—"of training up to freedom millions upon millions of alien and uneducated races." It is, in fact, "The White Man's Burden" translated into sober prose for use in schools. It is a pleasure to add that Professor Adams' book is also admirable as a text-book. Shorter and less comprehensive than the similar work by Mr. Lodge, it is better.

adapted to the particular requirements of schoolboys. It contains eight coloured historical maps.

Books of purely local interest are always sure of commanding a certain limited circulation; and we believe that in Norfolk the number of collectors of everything printed which at all concerns East Anglia is curiously large. It is hard to see what attraction SOME NORFOLK WORTHIES, by the late Mrs. Herbert Jones (Jarrold, 3s. 6d.), contains for any readers not specially interested in Norfolk and Norwich. Nelson's Letters to Sir Thomas Troubridge, indeed, are valuable, and deserved to be made more easily accessible than they were in the Century Magazine; and the short sketch of the Princess Pocahontas, with its really lovely portrait of "the great king's daughter of Virginia," is a useful little reminder of an incident which is not without its romantic side. But the essay on "A Poet of the Eighteenth Century" is very thin, and that on the "Worthies of Norwich," which runs to nearly 120 pages, ten of which are filled with extracts in small print form of poems of Henry Earl of Surrey, is a dreary piece of work—a literary attempt to make bricks without straw. Mrs. Herbert Jones was, we believe, a daughter of Mr. Daniel Gurney; as such she was in duty bound to stand by her clan; and, accordingly, we have in this volume a rather attractive memoir of Mrs. Fry and her philanthropic work. Here again the portrait is a striking one. We commend the volume to the usually friendly reception which such books may reasonably expect to receive from East Anglians. We are sorry that we can say no more.

Mr. Edward Carpenter's ANGELS' WINGS (Sonnenschein, 6s.) is an enthusiastic book on the fine arts. His remarks are sometimes suggestive, especially in the chapter on the representation of angels' wings in painting and sculpture, where he deals with the difficulty of reconciling wings with the anatomy of the human body. But, on the whole, the book suffers too much from the author's continual attempt to be eloquent, and from his tendency to over-estimate the emotional as opposed to the scientific element in art. "Naïve" does not seem to be a very appropriate epithet to apply to the frieze of the Parthenon, coming as it did at the end of a long series of scientific work of the same kind; not surely, as Mr. Carpenter says, at the moment when the Greeks were emerging from barbarism into civilization, but more than a hundred years after the death of Solon. The same one-sided view of art leads him to regard the perfection of Mozart as "often rather a cheap perfection," and to the remark that "Mozart might care to create a lovely tune; Beethoven's first need was to say what he had to say." This distinction not only implies—what is untrue—that Mozart sacrificed meaning to melody, but leaves out of count the immense amount of scientific resource which he showed in developing "what he had to say," every bit as characteristic of him as the beauty of his tunes. It would be easy to quote many other equally misleading passages, but we have only space to regret that a writer of Mr. Carpenter's capability should have given us such arbitrary sketches of the history of art; and to hope that, if he gives us another work, he will strike out from his vocabulary such words as "mediumship," "mass-people," "shadow-celestials," "gigantesque," and "forthright."

A TREATISE ON PHOTOGRAPHIC OPTICS, by R. S. Cole (Sampson Low, 6s.). "Photographers" and "Dabblers" are, in the vast majority of instances, convertible terms. That this should be so is, at first sight, somewhat puzzling, seeing that photography summons to its aid so large a portion of the beautiful science of Optics and so large and interesting a portion of the science of Chemistry. But, as a matter of fact, the reason is not far to seek. First of all, as the author of this work rightly remarks, "the photographer is dazzled by the results of his work and his main idea is to turn out each picture more perfect than the preceding one"; in other words as the late Col. Russell paradoxically expressed it, "Photography would be a most interesting subject were it not for the pictures." Secondly, to quote again the words of the author, "writers on optics have for some occult reason deemed it necessary to surround the simplest optical matters with a cloud of symbols repulsive to those who are not mathematically minded"; and writers on the chemistry of photography have been equally "repulsive" in another way, owing to the obscurity of the subject. Thirdly, photography, being from its earliest infancy a source of gain, has attracted into its ranks a number of men who know little and care less about the scientific aspects of the art; and to-day, by reason of the wonderful facilities offered by enterprising manufacturers who work on the principle of you-press-the-button-we-do-the-rest, dabblers are almost as numerous as professionals. We do not suggest that no one should be allowed to take a photograph until he can show a certificate of attendance at a six months' course of evening lectures on optics and chemistry, but we do suggest that the interest of photography would be enhanced tenfold, if the taker of pretty pictures would try to master the elements of these two sciences and understand their bearing on the art of "snapshotting." So far as books can aid him in this laudable purpose the photographer has several excellent treatises on the chemical side of the question, not the least excellent being Professor Meldola's well-known work. Then, as to Optics, there is the present volume. "The object of this treatise is to provide an account of the principles of Optics, so far as they apply to photography, in a form which is of scientific value, while not of too abstruse a nature to place it beyond the reach of all but the professional mathematician or physicist." The author has thus set himself the always difficult task of steering a middle course. In our opinion he has, on the whole, done this successfully though we think he would have been better advised had he not gone quite so deeply into the subject; the amateur, however earnest he may be, is easily repelled and the author has treated him to too many pages of "repulsive symbols" and over elaborate tests. "Photographic Optics" is, we are afraid, quite over the head of the "snapshotter," but it should prove helpful and interesting to the more serious photographer.

Mrs. Edgeworth David's FUNAFUTI (Murray, 12s.) is described as an unscientific account of a scientific expedition to an island of the Ellice Group not very far from Samoa. The purpose of the expedition was to put a diamond drill down a coral atoll, and bring up a core of rock from a depth of 500ft. or so, in order to test the truth of Darwin's coral atoll theory. Mrs. David frankly admits that it was a matter of absolute indifference to her whether Darwin's theory was true or not; but as her husband, Professor David, of the Sydney University, had undertaken to go to Funafuti and investigate the matter, she went with him and looked on. Her concluding chapter on "What the Expedition Accomplished" shows that she was an intelligent, if not a sympathetic, spectator of the operations. Such statements as "excessive monkeying telescoped the lining pipes" indicate an acquaintance with the technicalities of engineering which is seldom acquired by those who are content to judge engineering by its results. In the main, however, Mrs. David's book is merely anecdotal. She gossips about the natives—their morals, their missionaries, their schools, their entertainments—in a bright and chatty style. The most interesting chapter is that which gives literal translations, furnished by a Sydney clergyman, of thirty-one native songs. Most of these, it seems, are songs composed, for educational purposes, on Biblical stories, or geography, astronomy, or natural history. Geography, for instance, is represented by Oh! Thames! The river on which London stands!

Measure its miles inland—measure its miles inland!

Astronomy by:—

There are two moons revolving around the planets at the back of Saturn.

And Biblical stories by:—

Paul said to Timothy, e! He should leave off drinking cold water, e! but drink some wine as good for his sickness. Give the cup of Kava to him who is thirsty, e! Leave off drinking cold water, e!

The book, which is excellent reading, is satisfactorily illustrated by photographs.

I care not much how men prefer
To dress your Chub or Chavender;—
I care no whit for line or hook,
But still I love old IZAAK'S book,
Wherein a man may read at ease
Of "gandergrass" and "culverkeys,"
Or with half-pitying wonder, note
What Topsell, what Du Bartas wrote,
Or list the song, by Maudlin sung,
That Marlowe made when he was young:—
These things, in truth, delight me more Than all old IZAAK'S angling lore.

These were his Secret. What care I
How men construct the Hawthorn-fly,
Who could as soon make Syllabub
As catch your Chavender or Chub;
And might not, in ten years, arrive
At baiting hooks with frogs, alive!—
But still I love old IZAAK'S page,
Old IZAAK'S simple Golden Age,
Where blackbirds flute from ev'ry bough,
Where lasses "milk the sand-red cow,"
Where lads are "sturdy football swains,"
And nought but soft "May-butter" rains;
Where you may breathe untainted air
Either at Hodsden or at Ware;
And sing, or slumber, or look wise
Till Phæbus sink adown the skies,
Then, laying rod and tackle by,
Choose out some "cleanly Alehouse" nigh,
With ballads "stuck about the wall,"
Of Joan of France or English Mall—
With sheets that smell of lavender—
There eat your Chub (or Chavender),
And keep old IZAAK'S honest laws
For "Mirth that no repenting draws"—
To wit, a friendly stave or so,
That goes to Heigh-trollicie-loe,
Or more to make the ale-can pass,
A hunting song of William Basse—
Then talk of fish, and fishy diet,
And dream you "Study to be quiet."

SWISS SCHOLARS IN THE ALPS.

Students of mountaineering literature have discovered that they can hardly follow the subject back for a century without finding themselves in the midst of the Dark Ages. Alpina—a civilized Alpine journal much on the modern lines—made its first appearance in 1806. In its pages Ulysses von Salis and Escher von der Linth exhorted the tourists to climb the giants of the Oberland; but they were preaching to a generation which took little interest in climbing. The statement of the leading guide-book of the period that a visit to the glaciers requires "undaunted intrepidity," and that Grindelwald is the "least dangerous" place from which to inspect them, may be taken to give the measure of their ambitions and their powers; while their point of view is fairly put by the French General Guibert who visited Grindelwald in 1784. He had looked at one glacier, and his guide had invited him to go and look at another. "But," he says, "I was satisfied with looking at it from a distance. It could have taught me nothing more, and I have seen as much of the glaciers as I ever wish to see."

From the modern standpoint nothing could be more wrongheaded. But let the tourists pass. The Swiss, who owe so much to foreign tourists, may at least boast that they are not indebted for the tourists for the early exploration of their mountains, or to the early books about them. So far as this was attended to at all in early times, they attended to it themselves; and Swiss scholars are entitled to reflect with pride that nearly all the early mountaineers were professors at their universities. Towards the end of the eighteenth century, we have the Geneva professors—de Saussure and the rest—exploring the mountains of Savoy. In the middle of the same century we have the Berne professors—Altmann and Gruner—turning out ponderous tomes on the snow mountains of the Oberland. Further back, at various dates, scattered over a period of two hundred years, we find the Zurich professors—Scheuchzer, Simler, and the great Conrad Gesner—going to and fro, over the passes, and up the hill sides, mainly for their instruction, and partly also for their amusement. They all wrote books about their mountain travels—rare books that are not to be picked up every day—books written, for the most part, in barbarous Latin, and printed with abbreviations most puzzling to the reader—but books which, when one can get them, it is delightful to pull down and turn over.

Professor Scheuchzer, for example, is a very charming personality; and his Opusculum Helveticum, published in 1723, is a very fascinating book. One's respect for him is established on a sound basis by the frequent indications that he climbed from a stern sense of duty, and not because he liked it. He was evidently a short-winded person. For he wrote: Anhelosæ quidem sunt scansiones montium; and he gave out that the name of the Gemmi was derived from the Latin gemitus, a groan—quod non nisi cum crebris gemitibus superetur. But there were Alpine problems awaiting solution, and he felt that he was the man to solve them. Were there, or were there not, dragons in the Alps? To the settlement of that question he devoted the best years of an active life. He thought there must be dragons there, because, with his own eyes, he had seen a "dragon-stone" in a private museum at Lucerne; and he knew that the stone in question must be a dragon-stone, because there was sworn testimony to the effect that it had been tried as a medicine, and cured "plague, dysentery, diarrhœa, poison, hemorrhage, and bleeding of the nose." So, year after year, Professor Scheuchzer panted about the mountains, looking for the dragon. He never found one, but he examined all likely witnesses with the zeal of a special commissioner, and issued a report of the evidence which he had collected. His book is full of pictures of these beasts, drawn from the descriptions furnished.

Professor Gesner, though he flourished nearly two hundred years earlier than Professor Scheuchzer, was of a far less credulous disposition. But he also was concerned with the solution of a problem. There was a legend, which we read in the History of Lombardy, of Jacobus de Voragine, Bishop of Genoa, published in 1290, to the effect that the body of Pontius Pilate had found its last resting-place in the marshy lake on the top of Pilatus, "where, according to some accounts, certain diabolic machinations and ebullitions are still seen." Vadianus of St. Gallen had climbed the mountain in 1518, in order to investigate the matter, and had printed the results of his researches in (of all places in the world) a commentary on the De Orbis Situ of Pomponius Mela. He had been told that, if he flung a stone into the lake, Pilate would stir up a tempest; and, though he did not venture upon the experiment, he declared himself "moved to accept the greater number of the stories, in view of the marvels of nature which are established by the experience and authority of many observers, and have received confirmation in almost every quarter of the globe." This confession of faith sounded like a challenge in the ears of Professor Conrad Gesner. How he took the challenge up, and instituted inquiries of his own, may be read in his Descriptio Montis Fracti juxta Lucernam (Zurich, 1555).

It is a book that is a pleasure to dwell upon, because it breathes the mountaineering, as well as the scientific, spirit. Everything delights Gesner—the exercise, the cheese, the view, the solitude. "There is nothing here," he says, "to annoy the ears, nothing to importune them—no tumults or noises from the cities, no brawls from men at strife. Here, from the lofty mountain crests, in a deep and solemn stillness, you will seem to hear the very harmony (if there be such a thing) of the celestial spheres." As for the toil and hardship, he refuses to consider them; though he remarks that those who are not satisfied with the rude mountain fare can have other food carried up for them by their servants. And, he adds, "It will be pleasant to remember the toils and the dangers after they are over, to think of them, and to talk of them to your friends. Nay, more, the very pleasure derived from future rest is the greater when it follows upon hard work, and a man's health is strengthened by it—provided that, as I assume, he is a man of moderately vigorous constitution."

This, though written in the sixteenth century, is as modern as may be; and hardly less modern is the Professor's downright pronouncement on the Pilate legend: "This belief, having no raison d'être in the laws of nature, commands no credence from me." Let us leave him to the glory which it gives him, and pass on to the one earlier Swiss scholar who climbed and wrote a book about his climbing.

His name was Johann Müller (though he wrote as Rhellicanus), and he was a Professor at the University of Berne. The mountain which he climbed was the Stockhorn near Thun, and his account of the ascent is contained in a set of hexameters—very poor hexameters for a Professor—dedicated to Dr. Peter Cunzen, clergyman, of Berne. The poem has little to say about the sublimities of nature, but is principally concerned with the refreshments of which the picnics partook. They had four meals on the way up, and three on the way down—a grand total of seven meals in all. I have ventured upon the experiment of rendering the hexameters into English verse. An example or two may illustrate the spirit of the expedition. Here we observe the party at the moment when they reach the summit.

Thus to deceive the tedious hours we tried,
And then went up a ridge scarce three feet wide;
Thence over fields and pasture lands until,
Through rocks, and towering crags, we've climbed the hill,
And reach the Stockhorn's top. Whence, looking down,
Eastward we see lakes, marshes, and a town,
The torrents of the Simmenthal,—to West
Mountains like billows on the sea's broad breast.

The refreshment department next demands attention and receives it.

Our eyes are sated: 'tis our stomach's turn.
Making a rock our table, we adjourn
To chamois' shoulder, wine, and bread and cheese.
Our rude forefathers lived on meals like these—
The elder Swiss who craved nor foreign spice,
Nor foreign wars, but peace at any price.
While thus we lunch, a cowherd comes and makes
A little offering of milk and cakes.
Pleasant, indeed, we find this second meal;
Like Attic gourmets at dessert we feel;
For A is eating sausages while B
Drinks milk; cream cheese is good enough for C.

On their way down the picnics shot a ptarmigan. Arriving, after further refreshment, at the foot of the mountain, they were hospitably received, and invited to supper, by the nobility and gentry of the neighbourhood.

Young men and old, all toasted us the same,
One filled our goblets in the nation's name,
An aged gentleman of fluent speech,
Like Hector, and—so wide his broad lands reach—
As rich as Croesus—called Lenberrius—
A man of mark, and very vigorous.
And Lupus welcomes this man; that man's light
A third host takes from him. His smile is bright,
He welcomes all, the Master of the Feast;
Whereby we see old customs have not ceased,
But the Swiss manners of old time survive,—
The Simmenthal is keeping them alive,
By kindness to the stranger. Supper done,
We rose and said goodbye to every one,
Vowed that, so long as life stayed with us yet,
Their hospitality we'd ne'er forget.
Then once more started on the homeward track,
And on the morrow to the town got back.

So the poem ends, and such is the manner in which the Swiss scholars cultivated their mountains in the sixteenth century.

FRANCIS GRIBBLE.

SHAKESPEARE'S "TEMPEST."

II.

A very close following of the narrative by Shakespeare is shown in the following. There are no rivers in Bermuda, and the first care of Sir George Somers was to find springs and dig wells, and often they found they got brackish or salt water in them. (A well is still shown in St. George's as Sir George Somers' well). Caliban on three occasions refers to fresh springs. Act I., Sc. II. :—

And showed thee all the qualities o' th' isle,
The fresh springs, brine-pits, barren place and fertile.

Act II., Sc. II. :—

I'll show thee the best springs.

Act III., Sc. II. :—

He shall drink nought but brine ; for I'll not show him
Where the quick freshes are.

Also Prospero threatens Ferdinand as follows, Act I., Sc. II., 462 :—

Sea-water shalt thou drink,

Strachey tells us that " in Furbushers Bay wee had a large Sein or Trammel net, which our Governor caused to be made of the Deere Toyles which we were to carry to Virginia, with which we have taken 5,000 of small and great fish at one haul." This was doubtless in Shakespeare's mind when he makes Caliban sing. Act II., Sc. II. :—" No more dams I'll make for fish." For some cause or other Sir Thomas Gates and Sir George Somers took up their abode in different parts of the island, and Ariel says :—

In troops I have dispersed them 'bout the isle.

Strachey's narrative, only, tells of several mutinies which took place during the time spent on the island, in which we find the hint for Antonio's meditated crime, and the revolt of Caliban, Stephano, and Trinculo. Whilst Gonzalo's commonwealth is, of course, taken from Florio's Montaigne, it is curious to note that the mutineers in Bermuda had somewhat similar ideas in their minds.

Strachey tells how " the outlaws retired into the woods to make an habitation and settlement there, but happily found out, were condemned to the same punishment they would have chosen, and to an island farre by themselves were carried and there left," and Caliban complains Act I., Sc. II. :—

And here you sty me
In this hard rock, whilst you do keep from me
The rest of the island.

The shipwrecked crew were principally employed in fishing, gathering berries, digging wells, capturing sea birds, and cutting wood for the two pinnaces which were built. This round of duties agrees very accurately with those of Caliban, Act II., Sc. II. :—

I'll show thee the best springs ; I'll pluck thee berries ;
I'll fish for thee, and get thee wood enough.
A plague upon the tyrant that I serve !
I'll bear him no more sticks,
I prithee, let me bring thee where crabs grow ;
And I with my long nails will dig thee pig-nuts ;
Show thee a jay's nest, and instruct thee how
To snare the nimble marmoset ; I'll bring thee
To clustering filberts, and sometimes I'll get thee
Young scamels from the rock.

In a note to the Temple Edition of the Tempest, I find that " scamels " is " evidently some kind of rock breeding bird, not yet satisfactorily explained." In one edition of Shakespeare that I have it is written " seamells." It is, perhaps, a pleasing task to explain it satisfactorily and to add another important piece of evidence to my contention at the same time. It is undoubtedly simply a mis-reading for " sea-mews." It is obvious that sea-mews in manuscript can be easily mistaken for " sca-mells." I would like to know whether the first Folio uses the single or double " l." Strachey and Jourdan both describe at some length " a kind of web-footed fowle of the bigness of a ' sea-mew,' that have their burrows in the ground like coneyes in a warren, which all the summer we saw not and in the darkest nights of November and December (for in the night they onely feed) they would come forth but not fly farre from home, and howling in the ayre make a strange hollow and harsh howling. Our men found a pretty way to take them, which was by standing on the rocks or sands by the sea-side, and hollowing, laughing, and making the strangest outcry that possibly they could ; with the noise thereof the Birds would come and settle upon the very arms and head of him who cried ; by which our men would weigh them in their hands, and which weighed the heaviest they tooke." " With many young birds very sweete and fat."

Notice Act II., Sc. I. 185 :—

Seb. We would so and then go bat-fowling.

Such a " traveller's tale " would undoubtedly impress Shakespeare, and, therefore, he makes Caliban say, to cap the climax of his proffered services :—

And sometimes I'll get thee
Young sea-mews from the rocks.

This sea bird became known later in Bermuda as the " Cahow " from the curious noise it made, but it has been extinct for at least twenty-five years. There is a MS. " Historie of the Bermudaes " in the Sloane collection at the British Museum, which has been published by the Hakluyt Society. It is supposed to have been written by Capt. John Smith, 1624. I find in it the following reference to this sea bird :—" For the cahowe (for so sounds his voice) it is a night bird, and all day long lies hid in holes of the rocks, where both themselves and their young are in great numbers extracted with ease, and prove (especially the young) so pleasing in a dish as I am ashamed to tell how many dozen of them have been devoured by some one of our northern stomachs at one meal."

A remarkable parallel can be drawn between Strachey's Narrative and the Tempest, in reference to the employment of cutting wood and carrying logs. It forms an important feature in both cases, being the hardest toil of the shipwrecked mariners of the Sea Venture, and the cause of their mutiny, as also the task set to Ferdinand and Caliban, at which the latter rebels. Speaking of the building of the pinnaces, Strachey says :—" For the furtherance of which, the Governor, persuading as much and more, an ill-qualified parcel of people, by his owne performance, than by authority, thereby to hold them at their worke, namely, to fell, carry, and sawe Cedar, for the Carpenter's purpose, yet nevertheless were they hardly drawn to it." The first mutinies which occurred took the shape of refusing to perform this duty. Several of the shipwrecked crew became so enamoured of the island that they did not want to leave it, which " begat such a murmur and such a discontent and disunion of hearts and hands from this labour, and forwarding the meanes of redeeming us from hence as each one wrought with his Mate how to divorce him from the same. And first a conspiracy was discovered of which six were found principals, who had promised each unto the other, not to set their hand to any travaile or endeavour which may expedite or forward this Pinnace." That Shakespeare was considerably impressed with this portion of Strachey's Narrative, the following quotations bear witness :—

Act I., Sc. II.

Pros.
Fetch us in fuel.

Hag-seed, hence !

Act II., Sc. II.

Cal. Here comes a spirit of his, and to torment me
For bringing wood in slowly.

Act II., Sc. II.

Cal. Do not torment me, prithee,
I'll bring my wood home faster.

Act II., Sc. II.

Cal. A plague upon the tyrant that I serve !
I'll bear him no more sticks.

Act II., Sc. II.

Cal. Nor fetch in firing
At requiring.

Act III., Sc. I.

Ferd. I must remove
Some thousands of these logs and pile them up
Upon a sore injunction.

Act III., Sc. I.

Mir. I would the lightning had Burnt up these logs that you are enjoined to pile.
If you'll sit down,
I'll bear your logs the while.

Act III., Sc. I.

Ferd. and would no more endure
This wooden slavery, than to suffer
The flesh-fly blow my mouth.
And for your sake
Am I this patient log-man.

Apart from these parallel passages which I have quoted, there are many resemblances which cannot be definitely instanced. The same spirit and general tenour which pervades these humble narratives will be found divinely immortalized in the Tempest.

To recapitulate the resemblances which I have noted, we find two fleets overtaken by a terrific tempest, the chief only wrecked, two leaders in each ship, a sudden unexpected rescue, an island reputed enchanted, but proving possessed of all things needful for men's welfare, many striking physical and natural resemblances, the same daily tasks, dissensions, mutinies, and a happy termination. Altogether, these make up a sum total of evidence which cannot be gainsaid. And, having granted that Shakespeare did make use of these tracts, especially of Strachey's Narrative, published in 1612, we must come to the conclusion that there is no foundation for the theory that the play was performed in 1611, but that February 14, 1613, was more than likely the date of its first performance.

So far all that I have written but confirms Mr. Kipling, but I regret that I cannot follow him further. His vivid imagination has led him astray when he thinks he has discovered the scene of the shipwreck in a cove about two miles from Hamilton. It seems a pity to destroy such a pretty idealization, and to prove it but "the baseless fabric of a vision," but the actual scene of the shipwreck and landfall of Sir George Somers are known beyond doubt, and I am only surprised that Mr. Kipling was not conducted to the spot by local antiquarians. The rocks on which Sir George Somers' ship, the Sea Venture, was wrecked lie off St. George's, about twelve miles from Hamilton, and are still known as "Sea Venture Flats," i.e., shoals, and the landing place is a small bay almost opposite these shoals, a little to the eastward of St. Katherine's Point.

The MS. "Historye of the Bermudaes," above referred to, is a very full account of the first thirteen years of Bermuda's history. In it we find that about 1617 "on the north side of St. George's Island is erected upon a rock the smale fort of St. Katherine's in garde of a certaine sandy baye; being the same whereon the first that ever landed in thoes parte first set their feete." Again, in 1622 the Governor sent out divers "and made a discouvrie upon the rotten ribbs of a ship called the Sea Adventure." They recovered from her "a very fayre saker," "a great shete anchor," and "divers barres of yron and steele with some pigges of lead." We read that at this time there was living there a man named Christopher Carter, who was one of the original crew of the Sea Venture, so there can be no possibility of a mistake. This man was one of the chief mutineers beforementioned. He refused to leave Bermuda when Sir George Somers sailed for Virginia, and never afterwards left the island. Thus history and tradition concur in locating the scene of the shipwreck, and alas! it is not Mr. Kipling's "cove near Hamilton." If Mr. Kipling had walked from St. Katherine's Point to the Cut he would have found the actual spot to be equally well suited to the requirements of the play. I am pleased to see that Mr. Sidney Lee in his newly-published "Life of Shakespeare" considers Bermuda's claim to be the original of Prosper's Island "unquestionable." Bermudians jealously guard their claim and their thanks are due to Mr. Kipling for the support he has given to it, in which thanks, as a native, I beg to join.

St. Johns, Newfoundland.

W. G. GOSLING.

(1). Note.—In my reference to the Earl of Pembroke's close connexion with the Bermuda Company I am, of course, assuming the theory, long accepted, but now disputed, that he was a patron of Shakespeare. The expressions used in the dedication of the First Folio seem to show some such relation between them.

Notes.

In next week's Literature "Among my Books" will be written by Mr. Edmund Gosse.

The era of cheapness which seems to be before us in the prices of books—or at any rate of novels—will appear no new thing to those who study the history of bookselling during the century. At the beginning of it popular books were published at truly popular prices by such firms as Walker and Cooke. The Copyright Act of 1842 made the ownership of literary works more secure, and in that way established the value of the property and incidentally added to its selling capacity. The perfection of cheap publishing was attained during the years 1848-51, after the passing of the Copyright Act, by Lord Langdale and Sir Antonio Panizzi, who between the years in question issued a number of farthing periodicals, and many farthing brochures have been issued in our time, though only for the sake of making prospective claim to a chosen title which might otherwise have been seized. The Langdale-Panizzi ventures consisted of "The Elf," published in 31 numbers in 1848; "The Fairy," in 18 numbers, 1848-9; and "Works of the Mite," in 78 numbers, 1849-51. Each number was issued at a farthing, though the circulation must have been very restricted, for the full set of 127 numbers or parts is scarcely to be met with or heard of at the present day.

The publishing world is certainly illustrating the method of experiment which we refer to elsewhere, and running to extremes in the matter of price. Side by side with the penny monthly magazines we shall have Lady Randolph Churchill's guinea quarterly, and while books, new and old alike, are racing down to a standard in which shillings and even pennies are the rule, Messrs. Goupil, as we have already stated, are putting on the market a volume, illustrating pictures in the Louvre, for which the sum of £96 is to be charged. Only five-and-twenty copies, we believe, are to be available for purchasers in England.

In reference to the announcement of Lady Randolph Churchill's forthcoming quarterly, the Anglo-Saxon, it is interesting to note that this will not be the first quarterly magazine issued under this title. In 1849 Messrs. Longmans published a quarterly entitled the Anglo-Saxon. The magazine was partly printed in colours—red, blue, and green—and was evidently considered at the time a very fine specimen of the typographic art. It was illustrated with coloured and other plates, and had an Anglo-Saxon map and calendar. The letter-press dealt principally with matters pertaining to the Anglo-Saxon race, ancient and modern. In "An Address to Anglo-Saxons," the editors stated their object to be "to establish a valuable and sterling work, which shall become as necessary and acceptable and interesting to the Anglo-Saxon in every quarter of the globe as is the daily delivery of his letters by the post." Only four parts of the work were issued, but these form a large and handsome volume.

Four weeks ago we referred to Mr. G. K. Fortescue's invaluable catalogue which for the first time renders the French Revolution Pamphlets at the British Museum accessible to the student. Like the Goethe collection, which, we believe, cannot be matched in any single library in Germany, these pamphlets form one of those collections of material at the British Museum in which other national libraries might be expected to surpass it. Among the material now made accessible, but, as we pointed out, unknown to the author of "The French Revolution" owing to the want of a catalogue in his time, some of the twenty-three volumes labelled "Angleterre" would, we think, have specially recommended themselves to the picturesque humour of Carlyle.

The ignorant hatred of the English Government, the wild suspicion of Pitt, his machinations and his gold, that characterized the revolutionary party in France, assume an almost incredible aspect, even to us, the alleged paymasters of the Dreyfus syndicate. The following pamphlet was put forth in all seriousness in 1793. "Full details of the insurrection just broken out in London, and of the tragic end of George III." Here we read how "George and Pitt" sent a young Englishman to the execution of "Louis Capet," charged to bring back a handkerchief dipped in the monarch's blood wherewith to inflame the English against the Revolution. The handkerchief, being hung out from the flagstaff of the tower, produced a quite contrary effect, for the mob were so inflamed by this ocular proof of the death of a tyrant that they hung out a Cap of Liberty by way of defiance from the top of St. Paul's, and proceeded under the guidance of the "virtuous Lord Stanhope" (the president of the Society of Friends of the Revolution) to arrest and butcher wholesale the House of Lords and the émigrés who were attending there as spectators. Next they dragged George III. from his palace and cut off his head, which, when this veracious chronicler sent off his "copy," was being paraded through the streets on the point of a pike.

Not only anonymous pamphleteers, however, were afflicted with this Anglophobia. Barère, reporting to the Committee of Public Safety on the "assassinat" of Collet d'Herbois, finds the guilty hand of England wielding the blow, and adds a delightful sketch of the history of England from the time of their ancestors the Carthaginians and Phœnicians, to that of Clive, who "with the cold cruelty characteristic of his nation," starved to death many millions of the people of Bengal. Turning to other aspects of the Revolution we find, for instance, three volumes on printing, containing forty-one pamphlets, three volumes on Libraries, thirteen on the Theatre (besides collections of plays), and twenty on Hospitals and Hospices. As a last instance of the completeness of the collections it may be mentioned that it contains Barère's report of May 29, year II, which Mr. Belloc in his recent study of Danton prints, as he supposes, for the first time.

Apropos of current discussions on the morality of publishing newspapers on Sundays, it is refreshing to remember that Sunday newspapers have been with us for rather more than 120 years. The first of them, Johnson's Sunday Monitor, began to appear in 1778, and lasted well into the present century. No number of it earlier than 1804 is to be found in the British Museum, but it is referred to by the poet Crabbe in some lines in which, in 1785, he stated the Sabbatarian case:—

No changing season makes their number less;
Nor Sunday shines a Sabbath on the Press.
Then, lo! the sainted Monitor is born,
Whose pious face some sacred texts adorn.
As artful sinners cloak the sacred sin
To veil with seeming grace the guile within,
So moral essays on his front appear,
But all is carnal business in the rear—
The fresh coined lie, the secret whispered last,
And all the gleanings of the six days past.
With these, retired, through half the Sabbath day,
The London lounge yawns his hours away.

In 1799, owing to the success of the Observer, Lord Belgrave brought in his Sunday Newspapers Suppression Bill. His lordship thought these newspapers "an additional weapon in the band of infidelity"; he pointed out that "the demon of Atheism, whose breath was poison and whose embrace was death, had been stretching out his arms from France, with the malignant hope of destroying every country within his reach"; and he therefore proposed "to make the sale and circulation of Sunday papers a breach of the peace, and to empower churchwardens, constables, &c., to arrest the vendors, and take them before the next magistrate, who should have power to confine such persons for any period not exceeding fourteen days." The Bill was supported by Mr. Windham, who "was afraid the public would have all sorts of ribaldry and Atheism let loose upon them through the medium of these papers," and by Mr. Wilberforce, who "was far from supposing that the reading of papers on the Sunday was among the means of improving the public morals," opposed by Mr. Sheridan, who said that "stale news was as bad as stale mackerel," and rejected by forty votes to twenty-six. As a consequence Sunday papers flourished exceedingly. According to Mr. Fox Bourne, there were, in the year 1813, no fewer than sixteen of them.

Quite recently we chronicled the windfall that had come to the British Museum reading-room. Another institution of the same sort has also been smiled upon by Fortune. This is the New York Public Library, which, through the munificence of Mr. J. Pierpont Morgan, has just been enriched by the acquisition of the famous collection of books and pamphlets, &c., gathered together by the late Gordon C. Ford. The total number of literary items is said to amount to about one hundred thousand, and the collection is considered to be "the most comprehensive of its kind in books and documents relating to American history."

Those who read The Gay Lord Quex in its privately-printed form before the production of last Saturday evening can hardly have been surprised at the enthusiasm aroused by the third act. The play is the most perfect piece of dramatic workmanship Mr. Pinero has given us, and in this act, questionable though its details may be, is its great scene. The two characters who so completely hold the attention of the spectator (or, for the matter of that, of the reader) are really the only ones who make much impression at all. Mr. Pinero has put all his knowledge of character and his talent for displaying that knowledge into the parts of Sophy Fullgarney and Lord Quex, and he is extremely lucky in finding such artists as Mr. Hare and Miss Irene Vanbrugh to interpret them. The play, however, strikes one as too purely a matter of mind and observation to appeal to a very wide public. The ordinary playgoer, one would think, will prefer the strained sentiment and the "prettiness" of Sweet Lavender to the lack of sentiment and the ugliness of too many episodes in The Gay Lord Quex.

Many, too, who admire the play for its power and its wit would admire it still more if the point of view were not quite so "detached" and cynical. Our age is not really heartless, although it tries hard to seem so. It likes to wipe away the furtive tear and to be shown the softer as well as the harder and colder sides of life. Quex as a lover has a grave defect—he is only two years short of fifty. If the public—the big public, not the small number of those who are interested in the Drama for its own sake—accept a play which is without any love story to speak of, it will be a wonderful tribute to Mr. Pinero's talent. This piece supplies one more argument against those who think that epigrams and brilliant dialogue not connected with the main theme can be of any real service to a play. There are very few epigrams in The Gay Lord Quex which would bear being torn from the text. On the other hand, every speech comes naturally from the character who speaks it, and the wittiest sayings are those which would have little effect by themselves, but which are exquisitely appropriate in their place in the drama. The piece will be published in due course by Mr. Heinemann, who has bought Mr. Pinero's other plays.

Literary men in plays are not generally very lifelike. Mr. Wyndham in Mr. Haddon Chambers' new piece is a novelist and journalist, but there is little of "the literary life" introduced into The Tyranny of Tears. Except that Clement Parbury admits to making a very comfortable income out of his novels and that he dictates (in an amusing scene) part of an article to his lady secretary, he might be a member of any or of no profession. However, the label "novelist" perhaps adds a little interest to the character, for a certain mystery still hedges an author—at any rate among people who are not familiar with the profession of letters. Mr. Chambers' comedy is the best piece of work (with the possible exception of Captain Swift, which was in a different vein altogether) that he has yet given to the stage.

A correspondent who wrote as to Mr. Meredith's poem, "The Meeting," in our issue of April 1, writes us that he greatly regrets that he suggested the poem was not mentioned in the bibliography at the end of Mr. Le Gallienne's interesting work "George Meredith, some Characteristics," in which, by the way, it is also quoted. He says:—"As Mr. Lane's bibliography is chronologically arranged, and as 'The Meeting' had appeared in 1860, I turned to the pages that deal with the years '59-'61 for mention of the poem on its original appearance, expecting to find it with some others of that period—such as 'The Crown of Love,' which appeared in Once a Week Dec. 31, '59. Seeing that there was no reference to it in 1860, I failed to note that 'The Meeting' is spoken of on its first republication, two years later, in 'Modern Love,' where the date of its first issue is given, and Millais, not Rossetti, is correctly named as the illustrator. I must apologize for this oversight. The point of my communication was, however, that the poem mentioned is not included in the last edition of the poems, nor in the 'Selections' published in 1897 and 1898. This is merely a personal regret, and, no doubt, as the volumes have been issued with the authority of Mr. Meredith there is good reason for the omission."

It is strange, perhaps, that the only life of Daudet that approaches adequacy is the work of an Englishman. The master himself provided abundant material in "Le Petit Chose," in "Souvenirs d'un Homme de Lettres," and in "Trente Ans de Paris." There is plenty more material in some of Ernest Daudet's fugitive writings, and in de Goncourt's diary. But the material has only been sorted and set in order by Mr. Sherard, in the book which he published on the occasion of Daudet's visit to London. The task, however, is one which properly belongs to a Frenchman, and belongs to M. Léon Daudet more properly than to any one else; and it is to be hoped that he may even yet see his way to undertake it. He certainly cannot be said to have achieved this task in his so-called "Life of Alphonse Daudet," the translation of which, by Mr. Charles de Kay, is just published by Messrs. Sampson Low (6s.). Strictly speaking, it is not a life at all, but a chaotic and hysterical jumble of reminiscences, set down without order or method, empty of dates and facts—an example of impressionism run mad. The most that one can get from it is a few examples of the master's table-talk; as, for instance, "Every Thursday he explained to our guests that Stanley was not a cruel man." Or this on the subject of actresses:—

As to actresses, my father always showed himself amiable and respectful to them. But this very respect was one way of avoiding that familiarity of the green-room, that vulgar use of thee and thou which he hated just as he did everything which was not sincere. He always counselled me, with respect to them, to avoid linking dreams with life and to fly from the disillusionment of the reality. It was his opinion that those of them whose business it is to change souls as they change costumes, however frank and charming they may be, offer very few guarantees to a faithful heart. I was never able to make him admit that that very suppleness itself was their charm. That was one of our quarrels.

On another page we have an account of Daudet's visit to Mr. George Meredith, and here we certainly are made to feel that impressionism is a poor substitute for verbatim report. This is M. Léon Daudet's emotional recollection of the interview:—

How I cherished you that day, O master of the bitterest thought, of the most robust and liberal thought! I understood you to the verge of tears! What things passed that day between the looks you gave forth, and those that emanated from your brother in intellect! What hours worthy of you and of your power of analysis were passed in that cottage where lights and shades played about your aureole. O vast and subtle heart and friend of the French to the point of having defended them in 1870 with a piece of verse unique in its generosity! You are the genius whose brain devours him, and who, with a subtle smile, rails upon evil! Hamlet? Yes, you were Hamlet for Alphonse Daudet.

And so forth. Concerning the great things that the great men said to each other there is not a single word.

The amazing popularity of "In His Steps" engages the attention of M. Abel Chevalley in Le Temps. Finding the book "as badly written as a feuilleton, as theatrical as a melodrama, and as moral as a sermon," he can only speak of "literary epidemics," and refer the phenomenon to what, if he were less polite, he would no doubt call the "madness" of the Anglo-Saxon. But this would be only a fresh statement of the fact, and not an explanation of it. The Anglo-Saxon tendency is to forgive a writer for want of talent if only he is in earnest on more or less conventional lines; the French tendency is to forgive a man for want of earnestness if only he is clever, and fairly unconventional. Whence it follows that the French literary epidemic is generally started by a book like Les Demi-Vierges; while a similar epidemic in England and America is usually set up by books like "Uncle Tom's Cabin" and "In His Steps."

In spite of the emancipating influences of the bicycle and the culotte, it is still understood in France that les demoiselles ne lisent pas Balzac. Apparently the same fact may be predicated of the Municipal Council of Tours, which has decided to refuse any financial support to celebrations of the centenary of Balzac's birth which are to be held next month in his native city. The reason assigned is not any lack of money, but that Balzac's political opinions do not square with those of the Tours Council. The majority of that body are Socialists, and they feel that they cannot take any steps towards honouring so pronounced a clericist as the panegyrist of the "Curé de Campagne." As Balzac's works have been placed on the Roman Index amongst the books prohibited to all devout Catholics, it seems rather hard on him to be thus cast out by the Socialists for the opposite fault. But the Tours Municipal Council do not know their Balzac. If there ever was a novelist who was, at any rate, a sociologist, it was the creator of the Comédie Humaine, who announced in his famous preface the desire to write a history of manners, to do for mankind what Cuvier had done for the lower animals. The action of the egregious Tourangeau body is a fitting parallel to the attempts to discredit M. Zola as a writer on the score of his political opinions; and this in France, the native land of esprit!

A very attractive new review called La Revue Parisienne has just made its appearance in Paris, printed by Lemercier and published by Ollendorff. The first number, sold for one franc, contains articles by M. Ad. Brisson, M. Jules Lemaitre, M. Coquelin aîné, and drawings by Olivier Merson, Van Beers, Caran d'Ache, and Friant. The effort of the publisher betrays the influence of the best American and English illustrated magazines.

The collection of early newspapers formed by the late Mr. William Rayner, which will be sold at Sotheby's on the 21st instant, contains a copy of the exceedingly scarce Continuation of our Weekly Avisors, printed in 1632, described in the catalogue as "the first newspaper printed in Great Britain." This would seem to be correct, though only in a very limited sense, for it was not until August 31st, 1661, that the first regular paper was published, under the title of The Public Intelligencer. All the earlier journals, of which there were many, were in effect intermittent accounts of proceedings in Parliament, being issued as and when circumstances warranted. Of these no fewer than 156 appeared between the year 1641 and 1660 inclusive. It is almost unnecessary to state that the English Mercurie, dated 1588, purporting to give an account of the defeat of the Spanish Armada, is a forgery from the press of James Beltenham, of St. John's-lane, Clerkenwell, and that its date is somewhat later than that of its near neighbour the Gentleman's Magazine, which was founded in 1731. In 1696 there were nine weekly newspapers in London, but not one daily, in 1709 eighteen papers, of which one only was a daily paper, were published, and in 1724 there were three daily; six weekly, and ten evening papers, the last-named appearing three times a week. In fact, at that time and for many years afterwards, more evening papers were published in London than appear now. They were read chiefly in the coffee houses, of which there were numbers in almost every street.

Foreign Letter.

SCANDINAVIA.

NORWAY.

The winter book season in Norway was not distinguished by any monumental work. In writing of Scandinavian literature it is necessary to treat the plays as books, as most of them, certainly all coming from the pen of distinguished writers, make their first appearance, indeed, not seldom their only appearance, in book form. Amongst the books which sold best at Christmas was Björnson's "Paul Lange and Thora Parsberg," one book-seller alone selling 206 copies in Christiania; next on the list came Knut Hamsun's "Victoria: A Love Story." Herr Braekstad's exceedingly able translation will enable English admirers of Björnson to judge of the merits of the play for themselves. It is polemic, as most of Björnson's later work, and deals with the struggle of a vacillating man in a political crisis. The interest and allusions are too local to appeal greatly to foreign readers, but it is none the less a fine play, and in Thora Parsberg, Björnson has added one more great character study to his gallery of worthy women.

Knut Hamsun's charming "Victoria: A Love Story" is not so characteristic of Hamsun the psychologist, the brutal realist, as of Hamsun in a lyrical, tender mood, as one has known him at moments in all his work, pausing in his narrative to point to some change of aspect of nature, or to interpolate two incidental love episodes, as told by the Monk Vendt, so poignant, so exquisite, and so simple as only genius can ever give us. One of the most interesting events in the early winter was the representation on three successive nights of Hamsun's Trilogy of Plays—Ved Rigets Port (written 1895), On the Threshold of Fortune; Livets Spil (written 1896), The Game of Life; and Aftenrøde (written 1896), Sunset. The whole form a fine dramatic conception. In the first we meet the hero, Ivar Kareno, as a young enthusiastic man in his thirtieth year. He is fighting a brave fight, endeavouring to break way for the free expression of his philosophic idea—the elevation of the individual by means of the egoistic principle as opposed to the slave levelling tendency of democracy. The play opens at a crisis, for he is seeking a publisher for his great philosophic treatise. His views bring him into conflict with all the bearers of the old liberal ideas, the adherents of Spencer and Mill, and all the "monstrous mountains of school-learning"—draw upon him the enmity of the entire democratic party of his native land. Through one telling scene after another we follow this martyr to his convictions, through a bitter struggle to the end in which wife and the powers that be forsake him, as he refuses fortune just as he is on the threshold sooner than pay the price at which it is offered—namely, an open recognition of the principles of the great ignorant majority, and a retraction of all the views for which he has suffered so much. The curtain falls on a deserted, ruined man setting out with a brave heart to carry his ideas into a wider sphere of activity. Up to this he has merely been fighting the social powers; henceforth he must do battle with life itself. In the second play we find him a somewhat grotesque victim of life and its irony, the play-ball of adverse circumstances, the whipping-boy in a fantastic drama, in which tragedy and comedy and the "troll" powers of life seem to conspire to tear his philosophy to tatters. At fifty years of age Ivar Kareno has finished with ideas and dreams of individual worth and liberty of opinion. He is a broken, disillusioned man with an intense longing for monotonous respectability and the solid comforts of the snug appointment that he knows await him if he will go in under the yoke. He has fought for twenty years, is a hero in the eyes of a section of the youth of his native country, but he is weary, and he knocks, hat in hand, at the door of the State, prepared henceforth to vote with the majority, and become an expedient "pillar of society," and so enters into the "sunset" of his life.

The first play is a pregnant drama of youth and the dreams of youth; the closing play is a fantastic farce almost cruel in its scathing ridicule of age and the rounding of the circle of life. Sunset is scarcely convincing; perhaps Hamsun did not mean it to be so. One has almost always a feeling that he is laughing genially at his audience, but his irony and mordant humour find a happy play-ground.

SWEDEN.

Amongst the notable books in Sweden may be noticed Ellen Key's "Jankebilleder." "Reflections" is perhaps as good a translation as any. The two volumes contain many illuminative, often daring, and always intensely honest and individual views upon a variety of subjects—the woman question and its dangers, morals, the advance of culture, æsthetics, individual freedom, &c. It also contains an extremely interesting and sympathetic study of Vauvenargues, whom the author considers as a forerunner of Friedrich Nietzsche. She writes with a wonderfully keen insight into the less common sides of human life, and is absolutely free from any of the ordinary prejudices. An open letter to another Swedish writer, Verner v. Heidenstam, in which she treats of the Swedish national character and their strained relations with Norway, is of interest at the present moment.

Of the many translations of Northern writers at present offered to the public I can recommend "Gösta Berling's Saga" (Chapman and Hall) or "The Story of Gösta Berling" (as Messrs. Gay and Bird have it). Of the two versions the former has more literary grace, but the latter adheres more faithfully to the original and is not cut in any way. Miss Selma Lagerlof, the Swedish authoress, has sprung into fame with "Gösta Berling's Saga" and "The Miracles of Antichrist." Her latest book, "Invisible Fetters," is, as far as is possible where all were excellent, an advance on the others. "The Story of Gösta Berling" is a fine romance with fascinating descriptions of wild life, forest scenery, sleighing tours through magic winter landscapes, bear hunts, and pleasant gatherings. The conception is strikingly original, and her treatment of it instinct with power and poetry. The book teems with fascinating personalities, from Gösta Berling, the unfrocked clergyman, lovable, untameable, working his way back to grace through scenes of wild living and erotic adventures, to the fine portrait of Margarethe Celsing, the lady of Ekeby, woman of iron will and golden heart, who founded a refuge for the cavaliers, astonishing wastrels who win our liking and sympathy—a book with much genial humour, a fine sense of the tragic-comedy of life and the wizardry of nature. The style of the original is lost in the translation.

Amalie Skram's "Professor Hieronimus" (Lane) from the Norwegian is much more ably done. Prefaces are often unfortunate, and the quotations from a criticism of Björnson's on this author contained in the one fronting this book are especially so in the case of this most able of woman writers. Many English readers of this clever book will fail to see why he should have called it "epoch-making," and will form a false estimate of her genius when they read that he considered it interesting as showing Fru Skram at her best. Björnson's intense sympathy with everything which throws a light on dark places in society or State might explain it. He was thinking rather of the effect it might have in redressing a crying evil. It must be remembered, too, that it was a roman à clef in Scandinavia, the identity of the professor being but thinly disguised. It is a tremendous indictment (Amalie Skram is too great an artist to make this directly apparent) of the whole private asylum system. She shows logically and calmly how authority absolutely vested in one man, however clever a specialist he may be, is bound to lead to abuse. The ablest, sanest human being might appear to be mad if the doctor and students start with that premise. It is the analysis of the mental processes of a highly-strung, nervous, but absolutely sane woman going through the torture of treatment as a lunatic. There are many poignant descriptions, but no highly-coloured scenes and no brutality. But to realize why Amalie Skram is rightly considered as great a realist as Zola, with perhaps a greater mastery of her material, the English reader must wait for a translation of "Sjur Gabriel," the story of a starving West coast fisherman, or "Two Friends," with its intimate knowledge of life aboard-ship, or the brutal naturalism of "Lucie."

DENMARK.

The Gyldendalske publishing house are issuing a complete popular edition of George Brandes' works. Hitherto the price for single works has been prohibitive. It will come out in sixpenny numbers, the entire collection to cost thirty-five kroner—about two pounds of our money. The value of the edition is enhanced by the fact that Dr. Brandes has revised, emended, and added to it.

FICTION.

The Etchingham Letters. By Ella Fuller-Maitland and Sir Frederick Pollock, Bart. 7½ x 5½ in., 328 pp. London, 1899. Smith, Elder. 6/-

Sir Richard Etchingham, a retired "political" of the Indian Civil Service, has returned to take up his position as head of the Etchingham family at Tolcarne, the family seat in Devonshire, where he settles down with his daughter to keep house for him. Lady Etchingham, his stepmother, moves to London, accompanied by her niece, a pretty Miss Cynthia Leagrave, and by her stepdaughter, Miss Elizabeth Etchingham, a lady some five-and-thirty years old. Sir Richard and Miss Etchingham resume the habit of lengthy correspondence which grew up between them when Sir Richard was in India, and they continue it until a series of marriages rearranges the family group—Cynthia Leagrave marries Major Harry Etchingham, of the Intelligence Office; Laura Lady Etchingham, the trying stepmother, marries a solemn baronet who has previously been rejected by Miss Etchingham; Sir Richard's daughter is disposed of to an agreeable archæologist, so that there is every reason for Miss Etchingham to return to Tolcarne and look after the brother who is more to her than any one living, since her lover was killed in a gun accident seven years before the correspondence begins.

That is the scheme of the book; and it explains sufficiently why "The Etchingham Letters" gain everything by being read continuously. They replaced in the Cornhill Mr. Beeching's charming "Pages from a Private Diary," and the comparison was to their disadvantage; for one can dip with pleasure into a clever man's journal, but one cannot begin at haphazard in the middle of a correspondence largely concerned with the affairs of a family circle. There was, of course, in each instalment plenty of comment upon current topics; but no number of the series could be properly appreciated by itself. The charm of the book lies mainly in that slowly elaborated presentment of character in which no method can rival the epistolary. We get to know very thoroughly at first hand Sir Richard and his sister who are lookers-on at the comedy that is played out before them; and we see through their eyes the other personages in the story; for the few letters which are put in from other members of the family circle only seem to corroborate an impression already conveyed. We understand Laura pretty well before she writes from the Highlands to London for her bronchitis kettle; and we have a very clear idea of some of the subaltern personages, for instance, of Mr. Follett, Sir Richard's scholarly rector, who make no appearance in propria persona at all.

The epistolary method has also the great advantage of lending itself to collaboration as no other can do. Mrs. Fuller-Maitland, one may presume, writes the women's letters, Sir Frederick Pollock the men's; but her contribution to the group of characters is much larger than his. He gives us, besides Sir Richard, only Mr. Follett and a young college tutor, Jem Etchingham, whose letters are so good that one would gladly have seen more of them; but he does not succeed in making us see any woman. Even Margaret, Sir Richard's daughter, is not clear; whereas Mrs. Maitland can present both sexes with impartial skill. Her tedious and fussy stepmother is a creation; but so is the pompous baronet, Sir Augustus Pampesford; Cynthia Leagrave is faintly sketched, but emerges much more distinctly than Margaret; and the devoted Major Harry, whose spare hours are spent in rescuing Cynthia's pet cat, is a well marked character. But the diversity of hands gives an air of good faith and reality to the correspondence and does not destroy the total unity of impression. The family group stands out as a family group, and every page in the book is pervaded by a charm which one values in proportion to its increasing rarity—the charm of scholarship. There is a fine disregard for the suffrages of the million in writing like this, full of allusion, especially to those books which have never been hackneyed, and keep a faint old-world aroma about them. It is agreeable to be reminded that there are people in the world who can do justice to the new and yet have an honest preference for the old, and who do not clamour for crudities. There will always be thousands to welcome thoughts and words hot from the anvil; but there are also the tens who prefer both thoughts and words mellowed by the passage of a century or two, and it is these that keep literature alive. The scholar is not necessarily dead to the present; but times past are necessarily alive to him; that is why the instinct of every literary man is to cherish both scholarship and the scholar. There are many virtues that would less endear a man to us than Sir Frederick Pollock's delight in the old song quoted by Molière in the Misanthrope, with its refrain "J'aime mieux ma mie O gué, j'aime mieux ma mie." In the same letter there is a delightful wish that Charles Lamb might see somewhere in Elysium one of Molière's pieces played by a strong company of the Comédie Française. It is pleasant to see that the reader of Lamb almost grudges himself a pleasure that his beloved author never had the chance to share; also that among the spectators at the performance Musset is to have a seat by Shakespeare. That is a merited tribute, and one rarely paid, to the memory of the only man who ever wrote prose dialogue rivalling in grace and gaiety that of Much Ado or Twelfth Night. Yet we are all human, and even scholars have their defects. Sir Frederick Pollock is less than fair to Maeterlinck and commits the error of parodying him. The game is too easy to be worth playing; who would think of parodying Blake? Maeterlinck works with a method as liable to ridicule as Blake's, but he achieves a great deal more with it. Has Sir Frederick ever read Intérieur we wonder, or L'Intruse?

The best things in the book, however, are not literary criticism, and they are mostly the lady's:—"I never saw a man," she writes, "who looked to me as if he would, if he could, so thoroughly enjoy the importance of his own funeral as does Sir Augustus." The turn of the phrase is not particularly neat—Mrs. Maitland leaves a good deal to be desired in that respect—but the turn of thought is excellent. And this is a pretty saying, though it loses by detachment from its admirable context:—"Richard, is it a fortunate or unfortunate accomplishment, to be able at the same time, as I am, to laugh with one's mind and cry with one's heart?" A certain Mrs. Vivian, who appears constantly in Elizabeth Etchingham's letters, is always witty. This is how she recommends Christian Science for Lady Etchingham's many ailments:—

"I think you might like it very much. Don't you think, Elizabeth, that Lady Etchingham might be very much amused by Christian Science? Lady Clementina Mure says it's done wonders for her, and she means to stick to it and not try the new fresh air treatment. Not that Lady Clementina had anything but malade imaginaire-ism the matter, and, as Hugo Ennismore says of Christian Science, imagination cures what imagination creates."

A saying is attributed by Elizabeth to another of her friends less happy in her life:—"You see one can be dead and be still going about and people don't know that one is dead." Has Mrs. Maitland remembered, or has she forgotten, Mr. Stephen Phillips' "Woman with a Dead Soul?" Another remark—"When Job was afflicted, the loss of his wife was not included among his affliction," ought surely to have been capped by Sir Richard with a quotation from Coleridge's epigram which ends with the line "Short-sighted devil, not to take his spouse." Sir Richard's letters are less quotable than his sister's, but there are plenty of acute things in them too ; for instance this :— “ I know nothing of Colonel Newton's affairs except that he was the kind of man who is apt to leave most trouble to survivors—that is, he thought he was businesslike and was not.” And there is a really impressive passage (arising out of a reference to Leconte de Lisle) about the Jahvé of the Old Testament and His dealings with the unruly Israelites. It suggests to the writer the attitude of “a modern frontier leader managing Afridis in almost the same stage of tribal education.”

What would the tellers of those wild stories of palace treasures and feud and murder in the Books of Kings have thought of a peaceful rustic congregation sitting in an English church to hear them droned out as First Lessons and taking them in a hypnotised fashion as something which must somehow be edifying to modern readers since it is in the Bible ?

Altogether the book is a brilliant book, which appeals only to such people as can at least appreciate scholarship in others ; but for them is decidedly a book to read and to keep.

Obituary.

SIR M. MONIER WILLIAMS.

Indian scholarship suffers a great loss by the death, early in this week, of Sir M. Monier Williams. Born at Bombay, and educated at King's College, London, he was intended for the service of the East India Company, and passed, first of his year, out of the Company's College at Haileybury. Instead of proceeding to India, however, he went to Oxford, where he rowed in the Balliol boat in 1839, took the Boden Sanscrit Scholarship in 1843, and was elected to the Boden professorship in 1860. The most tangible monument of his fame is the Indian Institute at Oxford, which he founded with the view of reviving the esprit de corps among Indian civilians which, in the old days, used to centre round Haileybury, to the library of which he presented his own collection of Oriental books and MSS., and of which he was ultimately appointed keeper and perpetual curator. To secure support for the Institute he undertook three journeys to India, in 1875, 1876, and 1883, and, as a public recognition of his services, he was made C.I.E. in 1880, and K.C.I.E. in 1887. He was the author of many books on Indian subjects. Among them may be mentioned “Indian Epic Poetry,” “Religious Thought and Life in India,” “The Holy Bible and the Sacred Books of the East,” “Buddhism,” “Brahmanism,” and “Indian Wisdom.” The great literary work of his life, however, was the compilation of the Sanscrit-English Dictionary. This occupied the greater part of his time during a period of more than twenty years ; and, as was mentioned in Literature, a fortnight since, he had just completed a second edition of this great work, containing about 60,000 more words than the first edition, as well as a preface justifying the application of the Roman alphabet to the expression of Sanscrit. Sir Monier Williams was a great friend of the missionaries, on whose behalf he often spoke.

Another distinguished Oriental scholar whose death is recorded is Mr. ALMERIC RUMSEY, Professor of Indian Jurisprudence at King's College, London, and author of “The Muhammadan Law of Inheritance and Rights and Relations affecting it,” and various other legal works.

There have been few more industrious archæologists than MR. JOSEPH STEVENS, who died last week at the age of eighty. He began life as a pharmaceutical chemist, but subsequently became a doctor, taking prizes at the Middlesex Hospital for surgery, physiology, and general proficiency. His professional life was passed at St. Mary Bourne in Hampshire, where he not only suppressed the local endemic fever, but sought and found neolithic implements and other relics of primitive man. Appointed surgeon over a portion of the line between Salisbury and Basingstoke, he utilized the opportunity of making a collection of chalk fossils. On his retirement from practice in 1879, he settled at Reading and devoted the remainder of his life exclusively to scientific research, holding, for many years the post of honorary curator of the Reading Museum. The list of his publications includes “A Parochial History of St. Mary Bourne,” “Discovery of Pit Dwellings at St. Mary Bourne,” “The Inn Signs of Hampshire and their Probable Origin,” “Remains Found in an Anglo-Saxon Tumulus at Taplow,” and “Flint Jack : A Short History of a Notorious Forger of Antiquities.”

The death is also announced of MR. THOMAS MOFFITT STEVENS the editor, since 1893, of the Law Journal. Mr. Stevens, who took a studentship at Gray's-inn in 1886, had written a book on “The Elements of Mercantile Law,” and edited the second edition of “Edmunds on Patents.”

Correspondence.

BOOK PRICES CURRENT.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—The over-production of six-shilling novels and the plethora of copyright sixpenny reprints are having a serious effect on the welfare of the book trade. The abolition of the three-volume novel was an act of mental shortsightedness, and is the main cause of the first evil to which I allude. When this form of publication existed it acted as an excellent filter, for copies were only bought by the circulating libraries, and if a work was received with small favour it perished without general loss, and the bookseller was spared the risk of stocking it.

Under the present system, if a novel is over sixty thousand words, it is usually issued in one volume at six shillings, and the consequence is that the bookseller is now asked to buy a large number of books which under the old rule would not be offered to him. It may be said that he need not stock these works, but it must not be overlooked that it is sometimes difficult for him to resist the pressure of the publishers' traveller, and as the books are issued in a form to appeal to the buying public, there is naturally some spirit of speculation. Also, what is popularly termed in the trade as “making up the number” (thirteen copies to the dozen) is a dangerous trap for the purchase of unsaleable stock. The result is that when stock-taking time comes round the bookseller finds on his shelves a sad collection of novels impossible to sell. Of course, this cannot go on. If bookselling is to prosper as a calling, and young authors are to get a hearing, we should revert to the old system. A sale of five hundred copies of a six-shilling volume is poor business, but an edition of this number at thirty-one and sixpence yields a fair profit. The libraries thrive well in the three-volume days, and there is no reason why they should not do so now.

Let us turn to the question of the copyright sixpenny novel. This is having a baneful effect on the sale of cloth-bound books, and authors who have any say in the matter should not sanction the issue of their works in this form. The public is growing accustomed to expect its fiction for this sum ; consequently the demand for higher-priced novels is slackening to a serious extent, and the railway bookstall proprietors can confirm me in this.

A sale of fifty thousand copies is required to realize a profit worth consideration on the average sixpenny novel, and it is only very popular writers who can command this circulation. Therefore, I think it would be wise for authors and publishers to join together for its suppression.

I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

March 14.

DANTON.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—I ask you in fairness to allow me to answer a review of my “Life of Danton,” which appeared, April 1, in your columns. A reviewer can, and your reviewer does, make numerous allusive comments, which may prejudice a casual reader, in very few words, the real character of which it is, nevertheless, impossible to expose except in very many. But some charges I can answer briefly.

1. By way of first "blow" to my "unfortunate performance," he complains that I "refute Courtois, Prudhomme, and Peltier." Courtois coupled with Prudhomme and Peltier! How could I, where do I, refute Courtois? When your reviewer realizes that it would show equal knowledge or rather ignorance of the Dreyfus case to talk of a man refuting "Zola and Beaurepaire" he will see that though his first "blow" has fetched blood it is not mine.

2. He asks where I get my "extraordinary story of the Montmorin plan." From no more recondite source than Bertrand de Moleville, who here, as Royalist, is an excellent authority, and relates the "story" in full.

3. He sees no evidence of my acquaintance with Sorel except my mention of him in the preface—where I expressly name him as one of my main authorities. This "blow" is a blow below the belt, but it recoils, as do the others, on my "unfortunate" assailant. Any one having elementary acquaintance with Sorel cannot fail to see that long passages of my book are based on his. Your reviewer unwittingly helps me to one example when, a few lines later, he refuses to believe that Danton "proposed to compensate Piedmont with part of the Papal States." Now I do not say that. More suo your reviewer manipulates my words. I first state that it is impossible to lay a finger on this or that negotiation and say Danton prompted it. But, as Sorel does, I affirm that the foreign policy of France was in his hands. What that policy was I summarise from the summary by Sorel of a document drawn up as an instruction to representatives on mission, and assigned by him to May, 1793. Sorel, summarising, says that the Republic "se prêtera à dédommager le Piémont: un partage des États du Pape pourrait en procurer le moyen"; and, quoting, says, "Le Pape resterait comme simple évêque de Rome." I could produce passages by the score equally fatal to your reviewer's imputation. As to his secondary contention that Danton would not have advocated such a policy because "strong for non-intervention," it will not hold water. Danton would, as we may gather from his speeches, have drawn a wide distinction between temporal and spiritual rights, and would not have regarded interference with the Pope's temporal possessions as the same thing as interference with the possessions of other Sovereigns.

4. He asserts that I think "Danton knew England because he knew Tom Paine." I can only contradict this point blank. I record Danton's stay in England, his acquaintance with Christie and probable connexion with other English politicians, his reported communications with English noblemen, his having two relatives in England, one of whom wrote to him in English, his dinners with Englishmen in Paris, and his persistent desire for an English alliance.

5. He says that I call Lanjuinais a "bragging Breton." I do not. I say, "There is a story told by one of the Lanjuinais family," and "We may therefore discard this story as that of a bragging Breton."

6. He says that I "accept Barère as an authority." Your readers would naturally conclude that I do so unreservedly, and probably often. But, besides my disparaging remarks on Barrère elsewhere, on the very occasion on which I adduce his testimony, I am careful to say that such force as it has depends on a special reason, which by quotation I make clear, and I add "All this gossip, certainly malevolent, and much of it perhaps untrue,"

7. He suggests that I call the ceremonies of the Catholic faith sacerdotal mummeries. I say that Danton objected equally to sacerdotal and atheistic mummeries—a very different thing. And, though Danton did object to "le prêtre du fanatisme" and "le prêtre de l'incrédulité," I go on to show how little sympathy he had with intolerance towards the ordinary spiritual ministrations of the priesthood.

8. As to his complaint about the absence of textual references, there are, as he very well knows, two sides to that question, which I will not touch on now, but, as usual, he is singularly "unfortunate" in his illustrations. He sniffs, e.g., at my quoting "an eye-witness" without naming him. In translating a passage from the Souvenirs of Arnault, quoted by

M. Claretie, I call him an "eye-witness," which, with reference to the execution-scene, has significance where the man's name would have none. Even your reviewer can hardly refer to this and must, I suppose, therefore refer to my "eye-witness" on p. 203. Now, if any one looks at the headlines of pp. 203, 205, he will see that the eye-witness is named on each.

9. I could not, except at length, deal with your reviewer's interjected sneers with regard to "foolish old tales of the horrors of the feudal system" (!), Cholet, the Royalist exploitation of Paris scarcity, the Eighteenth of April (about which he probably is unacquainted with Robinet's rectification of Schmidt), the closure of the Scheldt, &c. On these subjects I adhere to every word that I say, though not to what he says that I say. I doubt his ability to teach me history or how to write English, and I hope your readers will not, on the strength of his insinuations, credit me with reliance on Hébert or sympathy with Marat. I wish I could attribute to the haste and carelessness which he, in strong contrast to the great majority of my critics, imputes to me, the palpable animus which actually makes him mutilate for his purpose the motto of my book. If, as reviewers have been known to do, he rides off on fresh issues, I trust that it will not be thought that I cannot if I do not reply, and I should not have replied to him now if his mistakes and mis-statements had been less flagrant.

I am yours obediently,

A. H. BEESLY.

P.S.—Your reviewer asks for my authority for stating that the noyade contrivances at Nantes were of pre-revolutionary invention. M. Dubost is my authority, and it will be seen that he vouches for what he says after investigations on the spot. I append the whole of what he says on the subject, in his "Une Page d'Histoire":—

On nous permettra de citer un fait bien curieux qui nous a été révélé dernièrement, pendant un séjour à Nantes. On a beaucoup parlé du trop célèbre Carrier, commissaire de la République à Nantes, pendant la Révolution, et du moyen qu'il avait, dit-on, imaginé pour faire disparaître les prisonniers royalistes. On les noyait, paraît-il, dans la Loire, à l'aide de bateaux dont le plancher mobile s'ouvrait pour donner passage à ceux qu'on voulait précipiter dans le fleuve. C'était effroyable. Mais il est établi que Carrier n'a pas eu le mérite de l'invention. Il appartient aux royalistes nantais, qui avaient autrefois fait la traite des nègres. En ce temps-là, ils avaient fait construire des bateaux qui leur permettaient, quand ils étaient poursuivis, de noyer leur marchandise, et d'échapper ainsi à la justice. Or, le matériel, l'outillage qu'ils avaient fait construire étaient encore là, sur les quais de Nantes. Carrier le trouva, et il appliqua aux royalistes le traitement qu'ils avaient eux-mêmes fait subir les nègres.

EXCEPTIONS PROVE THE RULE.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—Your correspondent who explains that "exceptio probat regulam" means "the exception tests the rule, and may invalidate it," has the authority of Professor Skeat ("A Student's Pastime," s.95). But the interpretation does not appear to be in accordance with the historical facts, given in the Oxford Dictionary s.v. Exception, nor to give the logical value of the maxim as now employed. The value of "negative instances" is preached by Bacon and Mill, and an exception in the modern sense of the word is a negative instance, particularly valuable, because it is "in proximo"—in close relation to the rule. I conclude, e.g., that the greenhouse cistern is filled every evening by the gardener (the rule) because (1) it is always full when he has been at work (2) it was empty (the exception) on the day he was at home with influenza. If a rule is a rule at all it has no exceptions; any contradictory instances ("exceptions") are instances of the counteraction of the rule by some force outside it, and are, therefore, proofs of the rule. It is, however, deplorably true that this is known only to logicians, and the ordinary person, who says merrily in face of a contradictory instance, "the exception proves the rule" means only "if that is the only instance you can quote, it shows that my rule is good for all other cases." And this approaches more nearly to the original legal maxim "exceptio (making exception, excepting) probat (or figit) regulam in casibus non exceptis."

I remain your obedient servant,

C.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—I fear that the rule laid down by your correspondent Mr. J. Stephen is open to worse than "exception." The general understanding of the proverb, if not quite historically accurate, and apt also to be logically vague, is at least nearer the truth than Mr. Stephen's interpretation. Exceptio probat regulam in casibus non exceptis is the true form of the maxim, and the original meaning is that in applying for exemption of a particular case you by implication admit the existence of the rule from which you seek exemption. By a slight extension from the legal to the logical meaning of the words we reach the sense—There could be no exception were there no rule. In other words, if a particular case strikes you as singular it is because you recognize a rule to which it is the exception. The history of the proverb will be found in the New English Dictionary s.v. Exception.

J. P. GILSON.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—The origin and true meaning of this much-misapplied maxim are not far to seek. It is a maxim of law—Exceptio probat regulam—that is, as Cicero more fully expresses it, "Si exceptio facit ne liceat, ibi necesse est licere ubi non est exceptum" (Pro Balbo, 14). For example, if there is a law that a certain thing is not to be done on Sunday, it follows that it is permitted on other days.

PARLIAMENTARY REPORTING.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—Parliamentary reporters will take exception to the epithet "mechanical" which, in your notice of the late Mr. J. F. Nisbet, is applied to their work. It is true that a reporter must know shorthand, but, if he uses it mechanically, he will be a failure in the Gallery. To write intelligent and intelligible summaries of speeches, often badly delivered and imperfectly heard; and on all manner of subjects, too, of which the reporter cannot be supposed to have expert knowledge, and to do this against time is by no means mechanical work; but that, nine times out of ten, is what a Parliamentary reporter has to do. Shorthand writing is not reporting.

Yours truly,

OLIM.

Authors and Publishers.

We mentioned a few weeks ago that Mr. Rudyard Kipling had in MS., but had never issued to the public, a volume of travel articles dating back as far as 1889. Some of these papers, then entitled "The Book of the Forty-Five Mornings," will be included in a volume announced for early publication by Messrs. MacLure and Doubleday under the title of "From Sea to Sea."

Almost immediately before his death Mr. J. F. Nisbet passed the last proofs of his new book, "The Human Machine: an Inquiry into the Divinity of Human Faculty in its Bearings upon Social Life, Religion, Education, and Politics." Mr. Grant Richards will publish it almost immediately. The book is a somewhat daring advance upon Mr. Nisbet's last work, "The Insanity of Genius," and shows that the ordinary man is as much the creature of his organization as the man of genius. The book, in fact, might have been entitled "Man the Automaton," as the writer absolutely rejects free will and all influence of education or surroundings in modifying the organization given at birth. The book contains chapters on dreams, the occult, and on so-called "luck."

We understand that Mrs. Craigie ("John Oliver Hobbes")

has disposed of the acting rights of A Repentance which is now being performed at the St. James' Theatre, for performance in France, Germany, Austria-Hungary, and Russia, and the play will be produced at leading theatres in all these countries during the next six months.

Messrs. Macmillan will publish immediately the popular edition of Mr. Bodley's "France." It will be accompanied by a new preface, reviewing the course of events in France since the first appearance of the work last year. The new preface will also be published separately in a form to permit of its being bound with the editions of 1898.

People seem to be finding out how much they have lost in neglecting "Aurora Leigh." That it has for a long time been in the cold shade of obscurity so far as the mass of readers is concerned is certain. Lately, however, Messrs. Dent have included the poem in their Temple Classics (it makes a delightful pocket-companion in this dainty and convenient form) and now it is announced—rather late in the day—as a volume of the "Canterbury Poets." Has Mr. Swinburne's rapturous eulogy prefixed to the edition brought out last year by Messrs. Smith, Elder anything to do with Mrs. Browning's returning popularity? Or are people finding out for themselves what a wealth of beauty and humanity there is in this work—into which she put all she thought and hoped and saw with eyes so quick to catch the loveliness and pierce the sadness of the world? The feebleness of the story has prevented many readers from really appreciating the poem. But one can surely forget Romney with his platitudes and the overdrawn woman of society when there is so much to charm the senses and stir the heart. If it be read for its poetry, not for its story, "Aurora Leigh" cannot appeal in vain to any one of poetic mind.

There ought to be some interesting pages about the Brownings in the life of the late Miss Kate Field, upon which Miss Lillian Whiting is engaged, and which will be published in America in the autumn. Miss Field—before she commenced authoress—studied music, and studied it in Florence, where she was constantly at Casa Guido, and was on the friendliest terms with the poets. By Walter Savage Landor Miss Field was taught Latin, and she found George Eliot another friend and adviser upon her choice of a career.

Mr. F. S. Stevenson, M.P., has recently completed his work on the "Life of Robert Grosseteste, Bishop of Lincoln." It deals with the prelate's career as a whole and lays stress on his place in the history of thought as well as upon the relation in which he stands to the religious and political movements of the thirteenth century. The member for North-East Suffolk is the author of a volume entitled "Historic Personality," and numerous articles and pamphlets in English and French.

"The History of Intellectual Development" which Mr. Beattie Crozier was obliged to lay aside on account of his eyesight has now been resumed and his next volume is now in hand. The remaining volumes will probably take less time, as they will be more speculative than historical, and will in consequence require less reading and research. Mr. Crozier's method differs from other essays in the History of Civilization; he aims at making his standpoint one of pure evolution, in which institutions, religions, philosophies, forms of government, &c., are judged from their relation to the necessities of civilization at the given time and place, and without regard to the views of men at the present time; and in showing how all the factors have a temporary and relative value as means but none necessarily a final or ultimate one.

Emeritus Professor Bain, of Aberdeen, is about to issue a fourth edition of his work, "The Emotions and the Will." The third edition is dated November, 1876; and he had long entertained the wish to revise it thoroughly for a fourth edition. In his new preface he says:—"Without having discovered any essential error during the long interval which had elapsed since the date of the previous edition, I have on many points not merely obtained advanced views and improved statements of various doctrines, but had actually reduced these to published shape, although in a scattered form." The many demands on his time "and diminished energy during the last few years" have prevented him from putting these scattered statements into their proper places in the work, and he has to content himself with providing full references to papers in "Mind," (of which he was the projector) and elsewhere in which his latest views may be found.

Professor Arber's new British Anthologies are so far ready that Mr. Henry Frowde will publish the first volumes (each of which represents a definite period of our literary history) early next month. These are to be the Shakespeare, Jonson, and Milton anthologies. The whole series will contain about 2,500 entire poems and songs written by some 300 poets.

Mr. Edward Granville Browne, of Pembroke College, Cambridge, the Lecturer in Persian in the University of Cambridge, is seeing two works through the press. One is a hand-list of all manuscripts written in the Arabic character (i.e., Arabic, Persian, Turkish, Hindustani, Afghan, Malay, &c.) preserved in the Cambridge University Library. The number of these MSS., many of which have never yet been described or catalogued, is about 1,300. They are arranged under titles alphabetically, so far as is practicable, the residue of untitled MSS. being arranged in a second part under subjects. This hand-list is being printed and published by the Cambridge University Press. The amount already printed is 128 pages, about half the entire work, which, it is hoped, will be published during the summer or early in the autumn. The second work is an edition of Dawlatshah's "Tadhkiratu'sh-Shu'arā," or lines of the Persian Poets.

Scholars have been waiting for an edition of Gower such as Mr. G. C. Macaulay is preparing on the lines of Professor Skeat's "Chaucer." There is, in fact, no thoroughly trustworthy edition of Gower's English poem, the "Confessio Amantis." That of Professor Pauli is in the main based upon Berthelette's edition, published as long ago as 1532. The "Confessio Amantis" in Professor Morley's "Carisbrooke Library" Series is little more than a reprint of Pauli's edition, omitting, however, the story which even the author of the Reeve's Tale considered unfit for publication. The foreign poems of Gower have been still more neglected, though Warton was probably right in considering his French sonnets more poetical than his English work. For the "moral Gower," as Chaucer called him, was as wedded to the devices of Italy and France as he was to his "common-place book," stored with medieval romances and the laws and definitions of the ancients. While Chaucer charms the reader by the new life which he gave to his imitations, Gower gives an impression of patchwork. But Gower had an exceptional gift for connecting subjects which to the ordinary mind seem quite alien to one another; for this purpose the common-place book never failed him.

The first volume of the series of Reprints of Welsh Prose Works of the sixteenth, seventeenth, and eighteenth centuries, which the Guild of Graduates of the University of Wales, fired by the rising interest in Celtic literature, have arranged to issue through Messrs. Jarvis and Foster, will appear very shortly. It will comprise the tracts, letters, and poems of Morgan Llwyd, and will be a literal reproduction of the best early editions. Subsequent volumes will contain the works of Maurice Kyffin, Theophilus Evans, and other Welsh classics.

The new play by Mr. Gilbert Murray, Professor of Greek in Glasgow University, has just been acted for copyright purposes by Mrs. Patrick Campbell's company in the provinces. Mr. Murray had a brilliant career at Oxford, where he was a Fellow of New College, and married a daughter of Lord Carlisle. The play is called Carlyon Sahib—a curious coincidence, since the title of Mr. H. A. Jones' new piece is Carnac Sahib. It may be seen shortly in London.

The Rev. Charles H. H. Wright, D.D., is preparing a pamphlet on the Irish University Question, in which he will oppose all grants from Government in aid of a Roman Catholic University. Dr. Wright has also nearly ready for the press a work on Prayers for the Dead, which will survey all the Jewish literature extant from B.C. 160 to A.D. 200.

Mr. James Ward, one of the lecturers on decorative art at South Kensington, is writing a book on plant illustration for the use of designers and art craftsmen. Mr. Ward's "Principles of Ornament" has run through three editions, the fourth is now on the press.

A new volume of "Interludes" (the third of the series), by Mr. Horace Smith, is being published by Messrs. Macmillan. It contains more miniature essays, poems, humorous and serious, and some short stories.

Mr. T. S. Holmes is engaged in preparing an edition of Bishop Bowett's Register, and so much of Bishop Gifford's Register as exists, for the Somerset Record Society. These will correspond with the same author's edition of Bishop R. de Salopia's Register in the same issue.

The report on Lord Charles Beresford's mission to the East is to take the form of a considerable volume upon the subject, which will be published next month.

Four of Dr. Conan Doyle's Songs of Action have been set to music by Professor Stanford for use in schools. They will be issued immediately by Messrs. Curwen.

Mr. Rowland Ward will publish next month a volume on "Sport and travel in Portuguese East Africa," by Mr. F. Vaughan Kirby, author of "In Haunts of Wild Game."

Messrs. Methuen will publish shortly the second volume of their new series of Byzantine Texts—"The History of Psellus" edited by Monsieur C. Sathas.

Mr. John Dickson, F.S.A. Scot., the author of "The Ruined Castles of Mid Lothian," has completed a history of the islands of the Forth, which is to be published by Messrs. Oliphant, Anderson, and Ferrier under the title "Emeralds Chased in Gold."

Mr. J. F. Meehan, of Bath, has discovered several new facts in connexion with the visits made to Bath by Shelley and the Godwins, and will have an illustrated article on the subject in the new number of the Beacon about to be issued.

Mr. E. A. Fitzgerald, who has only recently recovered from a severe illness, has nearly finished his work on the ascent of Aconcagua.

The series of "Stories from Maclure's" is not to consist entirely of fiction. It will also include a volume reprinting an article on "The Dangers of Mountaineering," which Mr. Francis Gribble contributed to one of the earliest numbers of Maclure's Magazine.

The Caxton Club of Chicago has published a useful Chronological List of Edward Fitzgerald books and publications. Twenty-two editions of "Omar Khayyām" are included in it.

Mr. Horatio W. Dresser's book on "cure by suggestion" will shortly be published by Messrs. Putnam, who also have in the press and nearly ready for issue Mr. James Barnes' "Life of Paul Jones."

Professor Lionel S. Beale, F.R.S., F.R.C.P., is continuing his series of papers on "Vitality."

Messrs. Keith Johnston and Co. are publishing a new edition of "The Howard Vincent Wall Map of the the British Empire." The London School Board has officially adopted it for the walls of its classrooms, and their example has been followed in many parts of the country and in the Colonies. The map is accompanied by a handbook "Round the British Empire in Ten Minutes with Colonel Sir Howard Vincent, C.B.,

M.P." A monster copy is being prepared for the Greater Britain Exhibition of this year, and for the British section of the Paris Exhibition.

The April number of the American Critic is to contain a facsimile of the first stanza of Mr. Rudyard Kipling's "Recessional."

Mr. Edward Eggleston, of Madison, U.S.A., the author of "The Hoosier Schoolmaster" and many works depicting life in Southern Indiana in pioneer days, is giving up all other literary work to devote himself to his "History of Life in the United States"; he is at present engaged upon the second volume, which will not, however, be ready for more than a year.

A German publisher has hit on a somewhat original idea in issuing a collection of books dealing with Italy under the general title, "Kennst du das Land?" It includes, among other things, "In Goethe's footsteps in Northern, Central, and Southern Italy," Heyse's tragedy, "The Fornarina," and an anthology of songs about Rome.

The new editor of the North American Review, Mr. W. B. Fitts, has appointed Mr. George Leveson-Gower as the English representative of this old and well-known monthly.

The May issue of Chambers' Journal contains the fifth of the series of Reminiscences of the late Sir R. Lambert Playfair, in which he discusses Algeria, where he was Consul-General for thirty years. Among some interesting details of the products given by Sir Lambert, he speaks highly of the Numidian marble quarries at Arzew in the department of Oran. He sent a slab of it to Mr. Ruskin, who acknowledged it thus:—

I cannot enough thank you for the lovely slab which reached me yesterday. I have been meditating on it ever since. I think it is nearly the loveliest and most instructive marble I have ever seen, and indeed I hope to make some use of it in the interior of our museum—of the like of it, I mean, for this must remain at Brantwood, whose little museum of the stones I have specially studied will, I hope, be useful after my death.

The Rev. Hugh MacMillan, D.D., Professor G. Henslow, Mr. T. F. Thistlethorn Dyer, Mr. Francis Darwin, Mrs. Jekyll, author of "Wood and Garden," and many other well-known writers are to be among the early contributors to Messrs. Wells Gardner's botanical quarterly, the Sun-Children's Budget, which is edited by Miss Phoebe Allen and Dr. Henry W. Godfrey. The magazine will contain a quarterly report of the Swanley School for Gardening.

Mr. H. G. Wells, whose health we are glad to hear is now more satisfactory, has accepted an invitation to lecture at the Royal Institution on June 2; the subject of his paper is to be entitled "The Discovery of the Future."

Mr. Upcott Gill will shortly publish from the Bazaar office a cheap quarterly entitled Pensions and Progress, with the sub-title—A Magazine of Help, and Old Age Pensions Record. The editor is Mr. Ch. Cook.

Mr. Maurice Hewlett, author of "The Forest Lovers," has written a story of Italian life entitled, "The Judgment of Borso," which will begin to appear in the May number of the Fortnightly Review.

The Vienna firm known as the Graphische Gesellschaft have arranged to issue a German translation of Mr. Leonard Merrick's novel "The Actor Manager." They are also about to publish serially in the Vienna Boudoir a translation of his volume of short stories entitled "The Stage of Fools." The translations have been made by Mrs. Anna Kellner, wife of Professor Kellner, of that city. Mr. Merrick is engaged on a novel which traces the mental development of a man and a woman in very unusual circumstances, and will probably be called "An Enemy of Society" or "The Weapons of the World."

Mr. W. H. Mallock's new novel, "The Individualist," which will shortly be published by Messrs. Chapman in volume form, appeared in the Fortnightly above the signature of "Wentworth Moore."

Mr. John Lane is on the point of publishing a new novel by Mr. Frank Mathew, entitled "Defender of the Faith." Another novel by Mr. Mathew will be ready for publication in the early autumn.

Miss Dora Greenwell McChesney's new romance of the Civil War—"Rupert, by the Grace of God: the Story of an Unrecorded Plot"—is about to be published by Messrs. Macmillan. Miss McChesney is engaged on a sequence of historical articles to appear in serial form.

M. Zola has, at last, officially announced the publication of his new novel, "Fecondité." The novel will come out in feuilleton in the Aurore.

We understand that the author of "The Autobiography of a Child," which has been attracting a good deal of attention in Blackwood's Magazine, is Miss Hannah Lynch.

Miss Hélène Gingold, the author of "Financial Sketches," will have a new novel called "The Chillingfield Chronicles," published in the summer by the Columbus Printing Co.

Messrs. Service and Paton announce a new novel entitled "The Uncalled," by Mr. Paul Laurence Dunbar, the author of "Tales from Dixie." Here Mr. Dunbar quits his sketches of negro life to describe the eccentricities of a New England community.

To have your novel published in the sixpenny form which is now so popular is, as it were, to become a neo-classic; one of the youngest authors to reap his laurels in this way is Mr. A. E. W. Mason, whose novel, "The Courtship of Morrice Buckler," appears in that form. Mr. Mason has just left London for Tangier and will, we understand, spend a year or more in that country preparing a book which shall embody some of the characteristics of the South.

Owing to the interest excited by the play at the Comedy Theatre in Mrs. Burnett's novels, "A Lady of Quality" and "His Grace of Osmonde," Messrs. F. Warne announce a sixpenny edition of each book.

Messrs. Sands are publishing a novel called "By the Grey Sea," by the author of "An Old Marquise," "Mère Gilette," &c., which is the story of a clergyman who endeavours to reconcile the divergent views of the various sections of his congregation.

Mr. Levett-Yeats' novel, "The Honour of Savelli," is now included in the popular Sixpenny Series which Messrs. Sampson Low are issuing.

Mr. J. Eveleigh Nash's new novel, "The History of Adam's Grandfather," will be published by Messrs. Sands towards the end of May.

Mr. C. Kinloch Cooke, whose memoir of the Duchess of Teck is announced by Mr. Murray, was for some time editor of the Observer and of the English Illustrated Magazine. On retiring from these appointments he was, for a time, connected with a West of England paper. Mr. Cooke was also, for a certain period, private secretary to Lord Dunraven.

Annie Vivanti is a young poetess who has added lustre to the lyrical literature of modern Italy. She was born and spent most of her childhood in London where, her mother, who was a German, associated with many distinguished literary exiles, and lived for some years in London and New York. Then she went to Italy, where her first work, "Lirica," was published in 1890. Carducci wrote an introduction to it, and the book ran through many editions. Equally successful has been her novel, "Marion, Artista di Caffé Concerto," a moving picture of life behind the scenes of a café-chantant. At present Signora Vivanti's home is in New York. Here she has been writing two dramas in which Duse will appear shortly.

A new edition of Dr. Paul Lindau's "Mayfair" has just been published by Fontane, Berlin. Dr. Paul Lindau, who for many years has been the intendant and literary adviser of the famous Saxe-Meiningen Theatre, has lately resigned the post, owing to differences of opinion with Prince Georg of Meiningen on the subject of lighting the stage with electric light. Dr. Lindau is the able editor of Nord und Sud, one of the most distinguished of German periodicals; he is also a very prolific and popular novelist. The milieu of most of his novels is fashionable Berlin society, but the scene of some of his short stories is laid in London and depict low life there with a faithfulness and insight which are remarkable in a foreigner.

CHEAP WISDOM.

All educated Englishmen have learnt by this time, we should hope, to admit with due meekness the inferiority of their language to the French as a medium for the terse and pointed expression of thought. Considered as an instrument of the emotions and the imagination, we are still allowed to flatter ourselves that it has the advantage in compass and power. But, whenever the two languages come into competition in the presentment of the pure products of the speculative intellect, we have long been accustomed to acknowledge and to lament the shortcomings of our own tongue. Wit, we feel, is wittier, and wisdom weightier, in French than in English. The French epigram comes more happily off; the French maxim of conduct or reflection upon life assumes a more concise and complete, a more memorable and quotable, above all, a more impressive form, in the best French than it does in the best English prose. This, we fear, is a proposition which even our sturdiest patriotism, at any rate if associated with critical competence, would find it hard to deny. Most disabilities, however, have their compensations of one kind or another; and we may console ourselves with the reflection that a language which is so generally unequal to the thought can be in little danger of ever surpassing it. When, as a rule, you cannot say a thing as well as it deserves to be said, you can obviously be but seldom misled into imagining that a thing was worth saying because it is capable of being said supremely well. And there is no doubt that this particular vain imagination—this tendency to mistake excellence of form for value of matter—is, and has always been, a snare to the feet of the accomplished French littérateur.

Mr. John Morley, whose excellent address delivered some years ago before the Edinburgh Philosophic Institution, and since published among his "Studies in Literature," contains the best that has been said on the subject, is, perhaps, a little too indulgent to this weakness. He argues that, as "the substance of the wisdom of life, being the result of the common experience of the world, must itself be necessarily commonplace, its most universal and important proposition must in a certain sense be truism"; but he goes on to add that "the truism, however, and the commonplace may be stated in a form so fresh, pungent, and free from triviality, as to have all the force of new discovery." Theoretically, no doubt, this is possible, but, practically, it is of rare occurrence; and the besetting danger of the aphorist of this description is that of mistaking a mere elegance and precision of utterance, which he may owe mainly to the genius of his language, for that freshness and pungency which Mr. Morley rightly regards as essential qualities. This danger, however, is one, to which, as we have said, the French maxim-coiner is more exposed than the English. In his case the production of the illusory epigram is a far easier matter, and the detection of the true character of the product a far more difficult one, than it is on this side of the Channel. The false semblance of wit is much harder for the Englishman than for the Frenchman to achieve. But, on the other hand, the simulation of wisdom is, perhaps, all the more readily within the former's reach. Our language, if it does not with facility become epigrammatic, lends itself very aptly to the sententious. We may safely back ourselves to assume an air of profundity with any nation in the world. Indeed, we doubt whether the solemn Joubert, whose impressive platitudes have, as we know, deceived the very-elect, would not have made even more dupes still, if he had had the advantage of writing in our more ponderous tongue. Mr. Morley, as we notice with interest in recalling a recent controversy in these columns, is not much impressed by this particular sage. He finds him "delicate, refined, acute," but remarks that "his thoughts were fostered in the hothouse of a coterie, and have none of the salt and sapid flavour that comes to more masculine spirits from active contact with the world."

Some of us cannot find in them as much savour as distinguishes the fresh growths of reflection and observation from the crambe repetita of insipid commonplace.

Whether it be, however, that a reputation for wisdom is less attractive to most men than the fame of wit, or that our national distrust of generalizations operates as a discouragement, it is certain that very few English writers have deliberately set to work to compose collections of detached pensées. The eminent French names which meet us on every page of the essay from which we have been quoting have few counterparts in our own literature. A list of moralists about "both worlds" that reaches from Pascal to Chamfort and includes names so famous as those of De la Rochefoucauld, La Bruyère, Vauvenargues, and many others would, indeed, be hard to match in any country. We have in Bacon, perhaps, a greater than any one of them except the first mentioned; but the followers of that particular Immortal, whose so-called Essays are simply so many mines of aphorisms, have been few and far between. Few writers of distinction have sat solemnly down to evolve maxims of conduct and reflections upon the facts of life; and of those who have done so at least one eminent modern writer met with something like disaster. Among minor performers the now forgotten author of "Lacon," in spite of Mr. Morley's too disparaging reference to him, appears to have emerged from the adventure with infinitely more credit than many more famous people. But the Rev. Mr. Colton's note is uniformly that of cynical shrewdness; his wisdom, though genuine enough, does not go very deep, and in genius of course he has no more pretensions to anything like greatness than he had in reputation. The gnomic utterances of our really great writers have been, so to speak, struck out of them by actual dramatic contact with life; we find the best of them, as a rule, in the form of "asides" suggested to them by the conduct or the fate of the personages of their own creation. It is to the pages of the English classical novel, from Fielding to Thackeray and onward to writers who promise to take rank among English classics, that we ought probably to look for the best collection of aphorisms that is to be found in our language.

Such a collection would be of high value: but it would not be large. It is not so in any language, and from the very nature of the case it could not be. The pearls of wisdom and the diamonds of wit are essentially rarities, and an excessive demand for either of them can do no more either for literary or literal jewelry than stimulate the production of counterfeits. This, indeed, is an industry which has already established itself, and which seems to be making considerable progress, especially within the last few years. A sentence in Mr. Morley's paper, dating from before the establishment, or, at any rate, in the very early beginnings, of the industry, has a somewhat depressing significance to-day. In it the essayist speaks with admiration of that budget of moralities and reflections on life which, under the name of "The Pilgrim's Scrip," Mr. Meredith opened to his readers in one of the earliest and most famous of his novels, and expresses the hope that the author of "The Ordeal of Richard Feverel" might one day "divulge to the world the whole contents of Sir Austin Feverel's unpublished volume." But, alas! the wallet has been rifled, or the pretence of rifling it has been made, by a whole troop of Mr. Meredith's disciples since this aspiration was expressed. Or, if their modesty would disclaim the credit of having divined the still hidden wisdom of their master, let us put it that they have all started "pilgrim's scrips" on their own account; and, in the intervals of entertaining us with imitations of the Meredithian dialogue and description, they are all prepared to impress us with flashes of the Meredithian insight into life. The fact that they possess no mines of their own from which to dig these jewels of thought and imagination does not at all disturb them; it is sufficient that they have acquired a certain amount of the lapidary's knack, and can give a superficial air of brilliancy to any worthless pebble that they may pick up. At any rate, they feel bound to be as oracular in manner as their great model; and, at every second page, they arrest the flow of their narration in order to bestow upon us a few scraps of that cheap wisdom by which the half-educated multitude of the present day are so artlessly and pathetically impressed.

The Cromwell Tercentenary is being celebrated by the publication of various books about the career of the great commander. It seems to us that it would also be a good idea if it were celebrated by the cataloguing of the enormous collection of pamphlets relating to his period in the British Museum. No period of history—not even the period of the French Revolution—called forth pamphlets in greater profusion, and an adequate list of those in the national collection would be of enormous service to students.

We must congratulate Mrs. Richmond Ritchie on the successful accomplishment of the task which she undertook in publishing a "biographical edition" of her father's works. Thackeray would scarcely have been so anxious to live only in his writings had he known with what taste and accuracy biographers such as his son-in-law, Mr. Leslie Stephen, and his daughter, Mrs. Ritchie, would fill in the picture, already so clearly outlined to the readers of "Esmond" and of "Vanity Fair." That she has herself recognized the necessity for a set biography may be inferred from the inclusion, which is certainly well advised, in the last volume, of a reprint of Mr. Leslie Stephen's life in the "Dictionary of National Biography," published last year. Her own reminiscences serve to fill in and vitalize the concise record of Thackeray's life required for the purposes of the Dictionary. Incomplete lives, like Anthony Trollope's in the Men of Letters Series and Mr. R. H. Stoddard's Anecdote Biographies of Thackeray and Dickens, were already numerous. Whether, now that she has completed her task, any further biography is required such as that by Mr. Lewis Melville, which has been announced, remains to be seen when the book appears. He is said to have been collecting material for some years for two large volumes purporting to shed new light upon Thackeray's private and public life.

M. Edouard Rod lately assured an American audience that the greatest dramatic triumphs were summed up in the names of Shakespeare and Racine. To English readers this must seem to be an excessive estimate of the author of Phèdre, the bicentenary of whose death was celebrated in Paris yesterday. The classical French drama, which reached its high-water mark in the work of Racine, is one of the most local and limited of literary forms. Molière can be read with pleasure in a translation, but Racine becomes a kind of inferior Home or Joanna Baillie in English. Of all kinds of drama this is the most dependent upon the actual words; a demand to "cut the cackle and come to the 'osses" would send it shuddering to annihilation. Its aim is not to hold the mirror up to nature, but to produce the effects of pity and terror by due observance of a well-defined and arbitrary set of rules.

Hence it is that we find it hard to explain M. Rod's estimate of Racine on other grounds than what Mr. Spencer calls "the patriotic bias." Hence, too, Matthew Arnold pronounced the classic French drama to be "a form radically inadequate and inferior, and in which a drama like that of Sophocles or Shakespeare is impossible." Racine's reputation, in short, despite the service that he did—on the authority of Voltaire—in teaching France "to think, to feel, and to express herself," is one of those flowers which cannot be transplanted. But no student of French can be blind to the "artful beauty" of Racine's verse, which has gained him the name of the French Virgil. And those who have seen Rachel or Madame Sarah Bernhardt in Phèdre can hardly deny its author the power of evoking, in a suitable atmosphere, the greatest histrionic talent—and this, after all, is a test of the true dramatist.

The committee formed to arrange for a memorial statue of Sir Thomas Browne, to be erected in the Haymarket at Norwich, seem to have about a fourth of the money already promised. The subscriptions, however, come almost entirely from local sources, and the committee are quite right in making a wider appeal. The "Religio Medici" has appeared in some thirty-five editions, and its popularity, and that of Browne's other writings, has never varied. Indeed, it is hardly correct to say, as the committee does, that his writings "are again being re-edited"; for, besides recent issues, we have editions appearing regularly at short intervals since 1831. England is not very rich in these local memorials of national celebrities, and they deserve all the encouragement that can be given them.

The Life of William Ewart Gladstone. Edited by Sir Wemyss Reid. 9½ x 6½ in., xx. + 752 pp. London, 1899. Cassell. 7/6

It has frequently been said, though more often perhaps in jest than earnest, that it would be impossible to write Mr. Gladstone's life, except on the joint-stock or co-operative principle. Mr. Morley, as we now know, is addressing himself single-handed to the Herculean task; but it will presumably be a labour of years, and, in the meantime, the rival method naturally commends itself to those who desire to be the first in the field. Sir Wemyss Reid and his colleagues here present us with a biography thus composed—a stout, closely-printed volume of more than seven hundred pages, got up in Messrs. Cassell's well-known manner, and enriched with upwards of three hundred illustrations. The apportionment of the work has been judiciously arranged, and not least so in the assignment of "the main portion of the political narrative" to a single hand. It might conceivably have been dealt with on the principle adopted a few years ago in a certain co-operative history of our institutions, wherein sundry still "burning" questions—such as that of the English Reformation—were discussed by representatives of opposite schools of opinion. Thus, Mr. Gladstone's political career might have been treated from 1832 to 1858 alternatively by a Tory and a Whig, from 1858 to 1886 by a Moderate Liberal and a Radical, and from 1886 to 1894 by a Home Rule and a Unionist biographer. If, however, the work was to be intrusted to a single hand, it was, of course, essential that the hand should be that not so much of a political partisan of any particular colour, as of a devoted and enthusiastic admirer of Mr. Gladstone—a requirement which Mr. F. W. Hirst, who is responsible for no fewer than twelve out of the twenty chapters of the volume, unquestionably fulfils.

Detailed criticism of Mr. Hirst's share in the work, however, would, of course, be out of place in these pages, and we turn from the political chapters to those which relate to other aspects of this many-sided personality. In all of these Sir Wemyss Reid has secured highly competent assistance—in some of them the very highest that could be obtained. Thus the home life of the statesman is the subject of a contribution from what the editor describes as "a thoroughly authoritative source," and which has, in fact, been supplied by a relative of Mr. and Mrs. Gladstone. His "Ancestry and Early Years" are reviewed by Mr. A. T. Robbins; Mr. A. J. Butler deals with "Mr. Gladstone as a Scholar"; Canon MacColl discusses him as a theologian; the Rev. W. Tuckwell treats of him "As a Critic," and Mr. H. W. Lucy "As an Orator." The Editor opens the volume with a "General Appreciation of his Character and Career," and closes it with a short chapter on his "Last Days," besides uniting with Mr. George Russell to contribute a chapter—one of the most interesting in the volume—on "Mr. Gladstone in Society." Sir Wemyss Reid, if we mistake not, has already, in other forms of publication, anticipated most of the reminiscences which he gives us in his "general appreciation." We are not sure whether the notes of a conversation with Mr. Gladstone in 1891 formed part of this previously published matter, but, in any case, it would have been more judicious and in better taste to suppress them. It is difficult to believe that Mr. Gladstone would have approved of publicity being given to the language in which on that occasion he spoke of Mr. Disraeli. No doubt it "serves to illustrate what has been said as to the astonishing frankness with which Mr. Gladstone was in the habit of expressing himself in the social circle"; but when the frankness is so very astonishing as it is here, the presumption surely is that the speaker did not intend his words to be carried beyond the "social circle" within which they were uttered. For the rest, too, it is somewhat unfortunate that the Editor's sketch of Mr. Gladstone's vie intime, interesting though it is in itself, should have been forestalled in the striking little monograph recently published by Sir Edward Hamilton, with whose opportunities of studying his distinguished subject Sir Wemyss Reid's cannot of course compare. What, however, will be new to many people are the one or two anecdotes illustrative of that harsher and more imperious side of Mr. Gladstone's character which it has been too common with indiscriminate eulogists to ignore. The following, for instance, is in this connexion significant:—

to lose a seat which it had been confidently expected that he would win for the Liberal party. The seat, moreover, had been, under peculiar circumstances, lost through a division in the Liberal ranks for which the gentleman was in part responsible. . . . A few days afterwards Mr. X, the gentleman in question, who felt very sore over his own defeat, and looked to his great leader for sympathy and encouragement, presented himself to Mr. Gladstone, at a house where the latter was staying with a party of political friends. Those who were present on the occasion will never forget the manner in which the statesman turned upon the unfortunate intruder and expressed his astonishment that he should have dared to present himself after losing a seat under circumstances so flagrant. The courteous, kindly man whom everybody knew and admired seemed for the moment to be transformed into the general sternly and imperiously rebuking the officer who had turned traitor on the field. . . . In the discharge of his duty he expected loyalty from all around him who professed to be his followers; and when that loyalty was wanting, or when men by acts of folly disappointed the hopes he had formed of them, he dismissed them from his service with a terrible curtness that the Emperor Napoleon could hardly have surpassed.

Canon MacColl's admiration for Mr. Gladstone as a theologian is profound. He has, however, good warrant for it so far as theology is an affair of learning alone. Dr. Dollinger, in a conversation with the Canon, observed that he should place Mr. Gladstone in the front rank of pure theologians, and the Canon believes that "posterity will ratify the judgment." There is nothing, he contends, of the amateur in the statesman's semi-theological and ecclesiastical essays. But, he adds, they touch upon or discuss various aspects and tenets of theology in its diverse ramifications with an easy familiarity which is a better test than any formal treatise. The range of reading which these essays cover

Is truly marvellous. He seems equally at home in Patristic, Medieval, and Reformation theology: in ecclesiastical history, in canon law, in the philosophy of Christianity, and even in the schoolmen. . . . He had read Aquinas not only from his love of theology and dialectics, but as one of the keys to Dante, who was steeped in Aquinas. He had also read Albertus Magnus, and having had occasion to quote Peter Lombard to him, with reference to a theological controversy in which I happened to be interested, I found that he had read the "Master of the Sentences," though he did not profess to know him as he knew Aquinas and Albert the Great. His favourite among the Fathers was St. Augustine, with whose voluminous works he was so familiar that when he had occasion to quote him he knew at once where to find the passage he wanted.

This is certainly not the equipment of an "amateur"; and, indeed, there never was any question of Mr. Gladstone's having accumulated competent and often vast stores of information on the various subjects which interested him. Mr. A. J. Butler, in his able chapter on Mr. Gladstone as a scholar, bears testimony to his Homeric erudition. Nothing has ever been questioned except the soundness of the critical judgment which he brought to bear on his materials. This, in his Homeric studies, was certainly often doubtful, and with all submission to Dr. Dollinger, the same, we suspect, would almost as often be said by professed theologians of his excursions into controversial theology. Of the sureness and fineness of his taste in scholarship there is much more conclusive evidence. It has been proved by many other far more successful exercises than those unfortunate Translations from Horace, of which Mr. Butler good-naturedly gives as favourable an account as he can. As to his position in English letters, it is well defined in this passage from Mr. Tuckwell's chapter on "Mr. Gladstone as a Critic":—

With the great masters of prose in this country—with De Quincey, Ruskin, Carlyle, Newman—no one, we suppose, will class him. Diversity of learning, firmness of grasp, width of range, directness of informing utterance stamp almost every paragraph of his voluminous writing; he is never tawdry, never hackneyed, never commonplace; and yet—he is never eloquent!

Probably no single passage from his pen could rank among the choice morsels of pure prose which we cull from the models of English style.

And this of his oratory, from the pen of one who has probably listened to as many of his speeches as any living man, explains with much acuteness and insight its most marked characteristic, as regarded from the literary point of view—its astonishing circuitousness of construction. This, writes Mr. Lucy,

Was a constitutional infirmity, the result of excessive intellectual capacity. Observing Mr. Gladstone on his feet in the House of Commons confronting a difficulty suddenly sprung upon him, one understood how the habit grew. Cautious by temperament, subtle in distinction of the meaning of words, having in stock an illimitable quantity, he, as he proceeded, saw pitfalls, morasses, stone walls non-existent to ordinary vision. The involution, parentheses, modifications of his, on the average, prodigiously long sentences, were divagations designed to get round or burrow under these perhaps imaginary dangers. Listening to him, one has often wondered where, on sea or land, a particular sentence could finally end. The closest attention was not equal to following all its tortuous turns. But, when read in print, it was perceived that Mr. Gladstone at least did not lose his way. While he was speaking he was thinking out his position. Being on his legs, he must needs fill out the interval with words. These—a "cloud of vague, brilliant, and imposing verbiage"—were spun out till his active mind had arrived at a decision on the precise line to take.

The "Life of William Ewart Gladstone" is an entertaining volume, which may be opened anywhere at random with fair prospect of deriving pleasure and profit from its contents. But it never for a moment impresses us as an organic whole; or, indeed, as a biography at all, but only as a series of studies of the various aspects of Mr. Gladstone's character "by eminent hands." It will only serve to whet the public appetite for the result of Mr. Morley's labours.

CELTIC LITERATURE.

A Literary History of Ireland. By Douglas Hyde, LL.D., &c. 9 x 5 in., 654 pp. London, 1899. Unwin. 16/-

In one of the records of St. Columba it is related that the great Abbot of Iona, after long labours with the pen on the part of himself and his monks, looked at the stored manuscripts, at first with pride, and then with sorrow, and, at last, with a sadness so deep that he said he would not again take pen in hand. We are reminded of this when we think of what Dr. Douglas Hyde has done in this long-anticipated book of his. Here for the first time is told adequately the story of the marvellous literary life of the most fascinating race among the Celtic peoples. Nor, whether Irish or not, could any reader peruse the later chapters without a sense of sorrow for the doom which began so long ago, and has grown to this day, for the race, its literature, its language. The language as a living tongue must perish; the race must be absorbed; the literature, as a living and motive force, can survive, if at all, only in a profoundly desirable, but, alas! no longer distinctively native, resurrection.

That a book such as this is possible at all, that there is a ready public for it, affords the best proof of the immense change which has taken place in the world of letters. It is not so long ago that a famous president of the Royal Irish Academy incredulously asked Dr. Petrie, after an address on Early Celtic Art, "if there was the slightest evidence to prove that the Irish had any acquaintance with the arts of civilized life anterior to the arrival in Ireland of the English," or since a well-known author and lecturer declared that the "sooner the Irish recognized that before the arrival of Cromwell they were utter savages the better it would be for everybody concerned"! There are few now, except those who cannot change their temper of mind or abate confirmed prejudice, who would thus venture to flaunt their ignorance. In literature, in art within a narrower limit, and in the domain of intellectual and spiritual life, the importance of the Celtic race, at a period when England and the greater part of Europe were in the slough of degradation, has become universally recognized. A few scholars in the three kingdoms, in France, in Scandinavia, and, above all, in Germany, have been mainly instrumental in this change. Perhaps the day is not far distant when the opinion of one of our greatest living philologists and students of literature will be taken to heart—that the study of the language and literature of the Celtic peoples is of as signal importance to us as that of any other foreign language and literature whatsoever.

Among those enthusiasts who have done so much there are few who have deserved more patriotic and scholarly gratitude than Dr. Douglas Hyde. His long and exhaustive exposition will be invaluable both to the student and to those who are striving to preserve what may be of incalculable value not only to the Gaelic people of Ireland and Western Scotland, and to the self-contained Cymric race in Wales, but to our Anglo-Saxon race as a whole.

It will, perhaps, be a disappointment to many that Dr. Douglas Hyde does not concern himself with the very remarkable and interesting development of the Gaelic genius in the English tongue, from Farquhar, Goldsmith, Burke, Sheridan, and Moore to the later and contemporary Anglo-Irish poets, romancists, and dramatists. But Dr. Hyde is right; for these men wrote and write in English, after the English tradition, and with English models; and so, of necessity, must be adjudged as English writers. Dr. Hyde's book, in a word, is not, in a wide sense, a history of literary Ireland, but a literary history of Gaelic Ireland. So regarded, however, there are, despite the labour, the research, and, above all, the scrupulous first-hand investigation, of Dr. Hyde, certain limitations in his work. On the one hand, he seems to have ignored important work already done in the same direction, notably Cusack's deserving and valuable compilation; on the other, he has apparently only casually made himself acquainted with Scoto-Gaelic sources. In what he has to say of the relation of the ancient Irish, the Alban Gaels, and the Picts, he has, for instance, obviously ignored, or is unacquainted with, so important a Gaelic record as the eleventh century Scoto-Gaelic poem preserved in the Codex Stowensis (No. XLI.), "A Eolcha Albain Uile," sometimes known as the "Albanic Duan," admittedly the most ancient monument of Dalriadic history remaining. This poem, which throws suggestive light on more than one point constantly in dispute among Gaelic controversialists, begins:—

A Eolcha Albain Uile

* * *
A shluagh feta, folt buidhe

(Ye learned of all Albain Ye wise, yellow-haired race) and has this to say of the Cruithné, or Picts:—

Cruithnigh ros ghabhsad iar ttain,
Iar ttiachtain a h'Eirinn Mhuighe,
X Righ tri fheid Righ ran
Ghabhsad dhiobh an Cruithen chlar.

(The Cruithne acquired the western region (i.e., of Scotland) after they had come from the plains of Erin. Seventy noble Kings of them acquired this Cruithné land (the Cruithen plains).)

Which certainly affords testimony—whether convincing or not is a different matter—that Alban Gaels about A.D. 1000 (the Albanic Duan was written about the middle of the eleventh century) believed the Picts to have been, not an indigenous Albanic race, but a people who had come to Alba from Eri (Ireland).

But most students of Celtic mythology and literature will be glad that so important a book as this has Dr. Douglas Hyde as its author, for to a fluent, agreeable, and often singularly persuasive style he adds true scholarship and wide culture. It is, perhaps, particularly in the third, fourth, fifth, and sixth chapters that his guidance is welcome; for it is in the speculation concerning, and in the sometimes scholarly and sometimes unscholarly discussion of "Early History According to Native Sources," "How Far Can Native Sources be Relied on?" "Pre-Milesian Fable and the Early Pantheon," and "Evidence of Topography and Genealogy," that so many writers prove perplexing if not wholly untrustworthy guides. Dr. Hyde goes carefully, affirms or denies scrupulously, and never with arrogant assurance; and for that we are grateful. It seems to us that on one important point he has said emphatically what needs emphatic iteration—namely, that no stress, or very little, can be laid upon the argument from topography (as to the substantial truth of the pre-historic chronicles, as reflected in place-names, &c.) which has had so much weight with many Irish scholars from Keating and O'Donovan down to O'Curry and others; for if this argument from topography be admitted at all it proves too much. In the selection on the Gaelic Elysium and Belief in Rebirth, Dr. Hyde has nothing to add to what we already know from the scholarly pages of Mr. Alfred Nutt's admirable work on the subject. In the chapters on St. Brigit and Columcille, again, there is little that is not already familiar; and for a fuller survey and understanding of the profoundly interesting and suggestive Brigit lore we must await the long-promised Ór agus Ób of the Scottish collector, Mr. Alexander Carmichael, who in the Hebrides gathered more about St. Brigit and St. Michael than exists probably in any published records. For the general reader the most fascinating section of Dr. Hyde's monograph will be the chapters on the Celtic Sagas and romances. Dr. Douglas Hyde is himself a poet and "shenachie," and it is on this subject that he writes with most charm.

All Celtic literature that is worthy the name seems "to have passed under the rainbow." Its beauty is moving, tragic, mysterious. But so is the literature of the North, so is that of Greece, so is that of other lands; its real distinction is alike in its strength and weakness, that it reveals an impassioned spiritual intimacy with all that is moving or tragic or mysterious, an intimacy that does not seem to us moderns so much of the recognizing mind as of the knowing spirit; an intimacy with things and thoughts, passions and emotions, events and lives and the dreams of men, lit with that rainbow light which we indicate when we speak of the light of the Other world.

The Cuchullin Saga. Compiled and Edited, with Introduction and Notes, by Eleanor Hull. 7½×5¼ in., lxxiv.+318 pp. No. VIII. in Grimm Library. London, 1899.

The history of the magic kingdoms has yet to be written; and though it is pleasant to learn that a well-known student has taken up the theme, one can only wonder meanwhile how the story will read. The day certainly is not past when the "shenachie" will find hearers for his tale of how Bran and Maelduin, how Teig the son of Cian, and Brendan of Ara, and Cuchullin and Oisín of the Songs, and others, went and returned, or at the last came back no more from the shadowy kingdoms "beyond the west," "beneath the wave," "under the rainbow," in Hy Brasil, or Flathinnis, or Tir-n'an Óg. But the story-teller of these ancient lovely dreams can arrest his hearers only by words which have been gathered from Magh Mell—the Plain of Honey. These things are alive or are phantoms, in proportion as they are adequately revealed; and, apart from the few students of comparative mythology and folk-lore, there is no public for the "shenachie" whose tale is only glibly repetitive of the outward or verbal part of the old lore. Such an one is as a flower-seller who would offer us flowers without colour or fragrance.

Miss Eleanor Hull's achievement is one for which all who love Gaelic literature must be grateful; and the "Cuchullin Saga," as she renders it in a sequent narrative compiled and adapted (alas, too ruthlessly adapted sometimes) from many sources, is in certain respects a model of industrious and loving labour, with no little supplementary interest in the way of charts and an excellent map of ancient Ireland. But, in no ungracious spirit, it must also be added that Miss Hull has not, when attempting the imaginative retelling of imaginative lore, the art of words. Like the grey crow of Highland legend, "she craws readily, but doesna sing weel." Her narrative is a mosaic; it is not a book. The complex and manifold Cuchullin legend is told in divers ways; when Miss Hull herself redacts the theme, she wavers between archaic diction, the phrasings of the hour, and the bald succinctness of the specialist. And why, having adopted the variant "Cuchullin" as the Saga-name of Setanta, does she continually vary the narrative with Cúchulainn; and why is Conchobhar sometimes so written and sometimes Conachar? That these are faults incidental to her task, or to her method of achieving that task, and not wholly to be imputed to Miss Hull, is evident from her able and scholarly Introduction—itself a most welcome and interesting piece of work.

But there is one more serious objection to state. There is no living writer who has so well and so beautifully, if not always with scholarly exactitude, told the story of Cuchullin, as Mr. Standish O'Grady. All who have striven to retell, or to work in the spirit of, the old heroic sagas of the Gael, for the sake of their beauty and wonder and romance rather than for their merely scientific interest and value, owe more to Mr. O'Grady than to any other. The Cuchullin story lives in his pages as it does nowhere else, and is told with a passion and beauty (at times, indeed, extravagant) which has made every one of the younger generation his debtor. After reading Miss Hull's careful but catalogue-like account of the most famous of the Gaelic heroic sagas, "The Cattle Spoil of Cooley," will the newcomer to these old tales experience any magic or charm, any beat at the heart, any stir to the pulse? The most terrible conflict in ancient Celtic literature is that of Cuchullin and Fardis at the Ford; but in Miss Hull's compiled narrative, or rather materials for narrative, the reader is, as it were, entertained by a showman at a booth rather than by the living eloquence and passionate imagination of a bardic singer inspired by a transcendently tragic theme. On the other hand, Miss Hull has nowhere claimed to be other than a formal introducer.

While, however, it might well be that Miss Hull did not strive to emulate Mr. O'Grady, it is almost unpardonable that she not once alludes to him—readers must not confuse Mr. Standish O'Grady with Mr. S. Hayes O'Grady, the scholarly author of "Silva Gadelica"—or to his fascinating pages, either in her Introduction, prefaces, notes, or appendices. It is as though some one should write the "Morte d'Arthur" saga, and never allude to the one incomparable telling of the tale of Arthur, nor to Malory himself.

So much it has seemed necessary to say. But this must not prevent acknowledgment of what is welcome and praiseworthy in Miss Hull's book. Her Introduction, as already stated, is admirable. Much of her book will stimulate further study. Her notes and appendices are praiseworthy. She has been loyal to MM. Whitley Stokes, Kuno Meyer, Windisch, D'Arbois de Jubainville, and her other authorities, and that involves no slight credit. The book itself is in every way a welcome addition to the Grimm Library. The type and paper are better than in the "Voyage of Bran" volumes, and to the student the map and charts are of particular interest.

PRIMITIVE MAN IN THE NEW WORLD.

History of the New World called America. By Edward John Payne, Fellow of University College. 9×5½in. Vol. I. (1892), 18/-; Vol. II. (1899), 14/-. Oxford.

Clarendon Press.

Introduction to the Study of North American Archaeology. By Prof. Cyrus Thomas. 8½×5½in., xiv.+391 pp. 1899.

Cincinnati: Clarke and Co. 8/- n.

The remarkable book which stands first of these two is much more than might be supposed from the severe brevity of its title. We call special attention to this at the outset, in case readers might pass it by, not caring, perhaps, to hear over again the story of Cortez and Pizarro, of Washington, of Maximilian, and the Civil War. Mr. Payne takes the word history in its widest sense. He is not content to begin with the Spanish conquest, but he investigates with minute care the early history of the American races, their origin and diffusion, their languages and their degree of savagery, barbarism, or civilization. More than this even; so instructive has he found these races, that he is led to examine by their means the general questions of the nature and origin of civilization and of language. Throughout the work we have been struck with the thoroughness of Mr. Payne's methods. He is ever on the look-out for general principles, laws of advancement, the tendencies of an age, the pregnant hint of some acute mind which bears fruit in discovery. Through a mass of complicated details he guides the reader by his clues, until the course of history appears inevitable, and the human race moves forward, not in erratic leaps and bounds, but by ordered and regulated steps.

This method is well exemplified in Mr. Payne's account of the Discovery. He examines the opinions of the ancient world as to what lay beyond the great ocean stream, and their inferences from the roundness of the earth that there were probably other continents than those known. He shows how the discovery depended on certain physical conditions; and that given the Arctic current, the Equatorial current, and the trade winds, America was bound to be discovered sooner or later. In connexion with these physical conditions he traces three historical processes—the extension of northerly exploration, the extension of southerly exploration, and the inquiry into the relation between Europe and Asia. The narratives of the early voyagers are full of interest, and Mr. Payne rightly accepts the Norse discovery of "Wineland," Newfoundland, and New England. Columbus appears in his right place, not as a man of great ideas who staked all on the existence of a new world to find, but as a shrewd and determined trader, who was convinced on the evidence that India lay across that wide ocean, and went there for the double purpose of enriching himself and of carrying the Gospel to the heathen. To the last he refused to believe that he had found a new continent; and had he really thought that the land opposite Spain was not India, he never would have sailed thither. To the last he regarded himself as the chosen instrument of God to bring light to the nations that sit in darkness. The story is here told critically and with clearness, and will brush away a number of popular misconceptions.

The succeeding pages open up a wide question of universal interest. What is the cause and what the process of human advancement from savagery, through barbarism, to civilization? McLennan, in his second series of "Studies in Ancient History" (Chapter VII.), points out with his usual insight that the terrible struggles which the human race has gone through have been the cause of its preservation. Mr. Payne goes a step further, and shows how the arduous quest for food has been the cause of advancement. In thus postulating a simple and natural impulse which cannot be called in question, he shows a true philosophical spirit. It is so simple that its importance has been generally overlooked; but Mr. Payne works out his theory in minute detail, and traces each step in so convincing a manner, that we feel sure this will be accepted by ethnologists as an axiom. Human advancement depends on the existence of a food surplus, without which there can be no progress. In his earliest stages man depends on the natural supply of food, and is a fruit-eating or hunting savage. The fruit-eating stage is depicted with great vividness in the early part of the Book of Genesis.

Naked, shameless, and fearful, feeble in force, and languid in desire, largely dependent in the food quest, which principally occupied him, on the industry of his female companion, incapable of self-control, because moral restraint was necessarily unknown to a creature whose only guide in life was the food taboo, though the penalty for the breach of this was death, he grovelled in superstition, heard the voice of the dreaded gods in every wind, and attributed to the sleek, well-nourished, and fatally armed serpent a higher degree of intelligence than he possessed himself.

And a savage he must remain, so long as the natural supply of food remains unexhausted. The gradual advancement of man is traced in the use of fruits and roots, which can be more easily stored and longer kept, and finally to the discovery of cereals. It needs a higher degree of intelligence to perceive the value of cereal grasses, to cultivate them, and to prepare them for food; and these take less room in storing, last longer, and are worth more. Their cultivation leads to observing the signs of the seasons, and thus makes some kind of a calendar necessary; the measurement of the fields creates a rude geometry; while the necessity of storing, and the habits of industry formed by tending the soil, suggest and make possible the erection of large buildings. Agriculture has also an effect on religion. The old malevolent demons which hunter-tribes fear give place to the benevolent spirits of the food plants, and those heavenly influences are worshipped which foster their growth. Customary rites are done at propitious seasons; food is offered to the spirits which give it, and these are believed to share in the tribal feast, and become the chief members of the community. Custom becomes law, rite develops into right; and the idea springs up of some standard of conduct outside man and superior to him.

But agriculture involves continuous work throughout most of the year; moreover, stores of food offer an irresistible temptation to marauding savages. Thus it becomes necessary to create a class set apart for agriculture, and another set apart for defence. The defenders must also be the ruling class, otherwise they could not live. The cultivators would never consent to work for the support of those who remained idle, unless these were the stronger. In early stages of agriculture the task of cultivating falls on the women while the men defend their stores and eke them out by hunting or fishing. Suppose, now, that the supply of game runs short, or that the tribe is compelled for any reason to become stationary. Virgin soil yields a far richer crop than that which is continually cultivated; and now the labour of the women is insufficient for the needs of the tribe. Some men must assist, and those will probably be such as are not best fitted for hunting or war. The stronger men will compel the weaker to work, and in addition will set to this labour any captives they may have made in the wars. The children of these and of captive or fugitive women will in time become an agricultural class, who are practically the slaves of the warriors. As the number of male serfs increases the women can be withdrawn from tillage and set to domestic tasks; their labour thus lightened, they are able to rear more children, and the tribe increases in numbers and strength. Thus we come to the third great step in human advancement—"the creation within the community of an industrial class, in subordination to a non-industrial class which directs and protects it." Mr. Payne shows how the advancement of the American tribes was limited by the lack of many important cereals, and of all the chief animals which can be domesticated. Both animals and vegetables are most numerous in the Old World, and hence civilization went much further here than it could go in the New.

Mr. Payne now passes to the origin of language, which he describes as an artificial basis of thought. As agriculture and the taming of animals produced an artificial store of food, so language formed an artificial store of experience, and became a means of still further advancement. He enters upon a long and able discussion of the origin of language, which he presents in a new light. Modern philology has too much neglected this matter, doubtless because of its extreme difficulty. The school of comparative philology, led by Karl Brugmann, is concerned with tracing the Indo-European languages to a common source, which is shown to have been a highly organized and inflected language. There have not been wanting speculations as to the stage which preceded this, and the question whether language arose by "adaptation" or "agglutination"; the prevailing belief seems to be that the next stage backwards was one where men talked by means of uninflected "roots," and Chinese is pointed to as a language of a very early type. How those roots arose no one seems to have any clear idea; but there is a vague notion that the chief factor in the origin of language was imitation of sounds, the Kling-Klang theory, as it has been well called. Mr. Payne has come to a totally different conclusion. He finds imitative words to be a comparatively late growth, because they belong to a time when general conceptions were already known. (See ii. 148.) As to roots, they are "one degree more artificial than that which they are asked to explain." He holds that man's original speech was of the nature of a "holophrase," that is to say, a conception was expressed by one irreducible utterance, longer or shorter, which could not be analysed into parts having a meaning of their own. It is here that the American languages are so instructive; and he is able to trace, from primitive dialects of low tribes to others more developed, the gradual splitting up of the holophrase, and the development of the noun, verb, and adjective. In a most ingenious way he connects the sounds of human speech with the processes of mastication, and so brings language into direct relation with food. When man assumed the upright posture, he could no longer get rid of things from his mouth by simply opening it. The motions of spitting and puffing developed the organs which pronounce the dental and the labial, which sounds were now added to the guttural or swallowing sound. All the phonetic system he shows to be based on the muscular movements used in food. It thus became possible very early to play many variations on the original cry, according to the position of tongue and lips while the voice issued forth. The sense of hunger may well have "suggested the contacts associated with the satisfaction of hunger," and thus the first words may have been created. Between this and the lowest known dialect, there is, of course, a huge gap; and Mr. Payne does not show exactly how it was bridged. He suggests, however, an influence which was certainly great, and which has, we think, not been suggested before—the arbitrary will of the chief families or the strongest men. He has, moreover, taken us a long step backward in showing that the speech of the most savage American tribes is almost entirely personal. That is to say, they use separate holophrases to express such ideas as "my-father, your-father," and yet have no conception of the general term "father." The missionaries find it necessary to speak of the Trinity as "Our-Father, His-Son, and their-Holy-Spirit." In these dialects the noun is personal, just as the verb is in inflected languages. Mr. Payne is led to the conclusion that "there was once a time when language consisted of irreducible personal terms; of words which advanced grammar would rank as nouns or verbs, according to the nature of the thing designated; and which expressed the limited number of conceptions occurring in savage life under that relation through which conceptions first found oral utterance, the shifting relation of personality." What was mainly present to his mind was not things, but the relation between them; and "as relations are logically indivisible, each was necessarily expressed as a whole, by means of a mass or quantity of sound." This mass of sound might be broken up, doubtless, if it consisted of more than one syllable; but the parts had no meaning whatever by themselves. This is no theory; it is the actual fact in most American languages. By degrees the holophrase does get broken up, and the parts get meanings, just as we speak of "isms and ologies," extracting the common part of a number of words. This is the origin of the general term. The next stage, after the noun is dispersonalised, and the general term is found, is to evolve the abstract term, a great step which opens the way to a new world of thought. The noun, verb, and pronoun are treated by our author in detail; animate and inanimate declension, modes of expressing time, and kind or intensity of action, the negative and object conjugations, number and gender, each has its turn. The rest of the second volume is taken up with a discussion of the origin of the American tribes and their various migrations, and a sketch of the Mexican and Peruvian civilizations.

We hope enough has been said to show the importance and the novelty of the theory of language here set forth, and of Mr. Payne's account of the history of human society. As to the latter, we find no flaw in his reasoning; and his theory of language is the only one we have seen which is based on something more solid than guesses and probabilities. Here we have facts; even those who reject the theory for the Old World cannot but admit it for the New. We have read the book with absorbing interest, and we believe it will give a stimulus both to ethnology and to linguistics. As, a century ago, that brilliant scholar, Sir William Jones, gave the impulse which produced the modern school of comparative philology, so we hope this book may prove a new starting point, and may turn young scholars from the unprofitable trifles which now too often exercise their ingenuity, to a new and inspiring theme.

Professor Cyrus Thomas' "North American Archaeology" confirms Mr. Payne's theory of the migrations from another side. Mr. Payne shows at some length that man most probably entered the American continent from Siberia, at a time when the climate in those regions was temperate, and in two ways—the first immigration being by land, when the sea was lower than it now is, and there was a neck of land joining Asia to America: the second by sea, after the submergence of this isthmus. The glacial age, he holds, made life impossible in the north, and drove the tribes southward. Professor Thomas comes to the same conclusion—namely, that the migration of tribes has been from north to south. His book is chiefly a summary of the opinions of others, and hence the testimony of American scholars may be taken as supporting Mr. Payne in this point. However, the matter is one which might well have been left out of Professor Thomas' book; there would then have been room for a more complete account of the actual finds. As it is, however, the book contains a great deal of useful information. An account is given of the famous mounds and stone outlines of North America. Some of these represent animals, and Professor Thomas thinks them remarkably life-like. The two specimens he gives do not seem to us to be very life-like: and we think a good many more should have been given. A number of plans, views, and sections are given of the mounds and the fort and village enclosures. In the latter, explorers find a great many beaten surfaces of clay, which it appears some are not ready to accept as hut-sites. There can be no reasonable doubt that they are hut-hearths; such are found elsewhere, and these are remarkably like the hearths at the lake village of Glastonbury, where, as in America, the huts were built with wattling. Professor Thomas treats in turn of all the various objects found in excavation—pots, plain and ornamented, pipes, axes, arrowheads, images of earth and stone, textile fabrics, engraved shells, and so forth. There is an interesting account of the various modes of burial. In some cases the flesh seems to have been removed from the bones before burial; though Professor Thomas does not say so, we have no doubt it was eaten by surviving friends. This book can hardly be called satisfactory or complete; but it may serve for those who wish to get a general idea of the subject without caring to make it a special study.

Creation Myths of Primitive America, in Relation to the Religious History and Mental Development of Mankind. By Jeremiah Curtin, Author of "Myths and Folk Lore of Ireland," &c. 9 x 5½ in., xxxix. + 530 pp. London, 1899.

Williams and Norgate. 10/6 n.

The Americans are a remarkable people, and Mr. Jeremiah Curtin is an extraordinary man. Best known, perhaps, for his translations of Polish novels, Mr. Curtin has also made excellent contributions to Celtic and Slavonic folklore. In 1895 he went, by arrangement with Mr. Dana, editor of the Sun, to collect myths in Mexico, California, and Guatemala. These myths of the native American races Mr. Dana published in the Sunday editions of his popular newspaper. The Sunday paper is, we understand, the staple of the intellectual food of America's teeming millions. As such it may be a popular institution, but we do not look to it for the dissemination of culture. Yet culture the Sun diffuses; for, if mythological research be not culture of the most disinterested kind, what is? The most active newspaper editor in this country would not offer to the most highly educated public a weekly set of records of, let us say, Saunthorpe or Noongaburrah myths collected by a special correspondent. The experiment would spell ruin. That a journal like the Sun should present such matter to a huge class which reads next to nothing but Sunday newspapers is a remarkable fact, and does credit to the intelligent curiosity of the Western democracy.

Many of the myths are those of the Wintu people, which used to occupy the right bank of the Sacramento River from its source to the sea. Out of perhaps 10,000 Wintus, the population fifty years ago, some 500 are now left. In 1889 Mr. Curtin, who was then making linguistic researches for Major Powell, of the Bureau of Ethnology, endeavoured to find some land on which the remnant of the Wintus and their neighbours, the Yanas, might settle undisturbed. President Harrison selected lands for them, but they have no landmarks, and are daily ousted by whites. They hope, poor fellows, that they may be protected and assisted by Congress. We hope so, too! As for the Yanas, they were almost all massacred by white ruffians, in 1864, in revenge for the murder of two women, of which they were not guilty. Plunder was the chief motive of the white miscreants, the Yanas being an industrious people who owned a few dollars. The details are incredibly abominable (pp. 517-520). As to savage myths in general the student is now in an unlucky position. If any traces of a Supreme Being are found, anthropologists can always say that he is "borrowed from missionaries." Though the earliest explorers of America, including, it seems, Columbus, may report exactly parallel myths before missionaries arrived, that does not seem somehow to count for anything. We note this and pass on. "The Wintu system," says Mr. Curtin, "is remarkable for the peculiar development of the chief divinity, Ollebis, called also Nomblietawa." Ollebis means "dwelling on high." Nomblietawa means "The Left-handed Hurler from the West." From his beautiful abode above the world Ollebis sees everything, and, though not all-powerful or all-wise, "is able through the knowledge and services of others to bear rule over the world in all places and everywhere." This is exactly the position of the Australian god, Baiame, or Baiame, with his "All Seeing Spirit," his agent in dealing with mankind. Baiame has been explained away as in his higher attributes a "loan god" borrowed from missionaries. Mr. Curtin says that "no Wintu has been converted to Christianity," their "adherence to primitive religion is unweakened. . . . Their faith is of the firmest: they are full of awe: they believe that Ollebis is up there now in the 'Central Blue' . . . and from there sees everything that happens." His house "has in it and around it all the flowers that have ever bloomed, flowers whose roots can never die" (p. 492). Precisely the same creed exists in Australia, as to Baiame in his land of flowers. Ollebis, the primal Being, "who was in Ollepaniti before there was anything down here on earth," does not look much like the glorified ghost of a dead ancestor. Mr. Curtin is strongly opposed to Mr. Herbert Spencer's doctrine. "We have seen attempts made to show that real gods have been developed by savage men from their own dead savage chiefs. Such a thing has never been done since the human race began, and it could never have been imagined by any man who knew the ideas of primitive races from actual experience or from competent testimony." We are much of Mr. Curtin's opinion.

Having arrived at the idea of the primal permanent Ollebis, the Wintus do not maintain their speculation on the same high level. The result is myth, as among other backward peoples. Thus the Maoris and Zulus have their metaphysical hymns full of the most abstract ideas known to philosophy. But they have also their puerile fables of the creative wars and loves of a pre-existing race. The Australian will say that Baiame or Noorele "made everything," but will also tell innumerable legends of the origin of species in the metamorphoses of a race pre-existing. The Wintus, in the same way, account for all things as results of metamorphoses among a race earlier than the race of men, and as a consequence of their loves and wars. Ollebis looks on, directs, selects, punishes, and blesses; he does not create by "thinking himself out into space," like Awonawilona in the hymns of the Zulus. The legends of these metamorphoses are long, dull, and puerile, an exception being the powerful and satirical myth of the origin of death, sex, and human conditions in general. ("Sedit and the two Brothers Hus," pp. 163-177.) This myth would have pleased Plato; it represents profound early speculation stated in the usual form of a fable. The other tales treat the pre-existing race—"the Alcheringa people," in Australian phrase—as living on the ordinary Wintu level, with more developed magical powers.

Scattered and peeled as the Wintus are, they probably no longer retain, like the Zunis and Navajos, their ancient ritual or any esoteric doctrines which may have been communicated in the sacred rites. Their mythology, as collected, is a detritus, and, though probably free from foreign contamination, appears to have lost the ritual with which it must have been intertwined. At least, we hear little or nothing about mysteries like those of the Zunis and Navajos. The general impression left is that all speculative ideas, good and bad, low and high, were poured out indifferently by the primitive intellect to take their chance of survival in religion and mythology. The consequence was that combination of the adulterer and the Lord of Thunder in the person of Zeus which perplexes St. Augustine in his "Confessions." The business of human progress has been to eliminate the puerile, and retain the lofty, ideas which co-exist in the beliefs of the earliest thinkers. But it is an error to hold that the higher ideas are necessarily the later in evolution, or the result of European influence. They are found everywhere among the least civilized and most inaccessible peoples. "When I talk of these things I am afraid I feel kind of scared," said a Wintu to Mr. Curtin. Obviously he did not talk in Wintu, nor do we gather exactly whether the myths were translated by Mr. Curtin from the original or communicated to him in the American language. It would also be most important to know whether the narrators were paid for their stories. This practice at once produces a shoddy new mythology.

THE ROMANCE OF THE OCEAN.

Idylls of the Sea. By Frank T. Bullen, F.R.G.S. 7½ x 5¼ in., 266 pp. London, 1899. Grant Richards. 6/-

"Immense" was the word which Mr. Kipling applied to this writer's former volume, "The Cruise of the Cachalot," and it would apply equally well to the "Idylls of the Sea." We are told that Mr. Bullen has been a fo'c's'le hand, and we have seen that his manner of writing is occasionally not unworthy of Stevenson. The result of a combination of these capacities is inevitably interesting.

Mr. Bullen writes as a sailor of a sailing-ship. There are no screws, funnels, and smoke in his pages. His ideal or typical ship is not the liner, the "ten thousand ton hotel," but such a boat as he describes in the brilliant sketch called "Running the Easting down," the "5,000 ton four-masted sailing-ship Coryphæa, with every one of her thirty-four wings spread and drawing," the creature of the winds and the slave of calms. Mr. Bullen has looked on the sea with his own eyes, and his descriptions and colouring are of an unexpected newness. The little sketch called "The Birth of an Island" is a beautiful piece of prose, valuable as much for the manner of its writing as for its knowledge and fancies. This idyll is worthy of an enduring place in prose literature. Very little behind it in literary value are the sketches called "In the Crow's Nest" and "Running the Easting down," a description of the ship driving sixteen knots an hour before a gale. Those who might take up this book with a compassionate kindness for the prose of a sailor will find that Mr. Bullen is in need of no such feeling. We have found his work more interesting than the finished style of M. Pierre Loti, for instance, and in some ways it reminds us of Stevenson rather than of Kipling.

The greater part of the volume is devoted to the study of sea beasts, whales, sharks—for whom Mr. Bullen has a tenderness we do not share—devil-fish, and the Kraken. The devil-fish of the Caribbean Sea is new to us. This is an account of one of Mr. Bullen's meetings with the thing:—

When I was a youngster I was . . . one calm afternoon leaning over the taffrail, looking down into the blue profound, on the watch for fish. A gloomy shade came over the bright water, and up rose a fearsome monster, some eighteen feet across, and in general outline more like a skate or ray than anything else, all except the head. There, what appeared to be two curling horns, about three feet apart, rose one on each side of the most horrible pair of eyes imaginable. . . .

Although quite sick and giddy at the sight of such a bogey, I could not move until the awful thing, suddenly waving what seemed like mighty wings, soared up out of the water soundlessly to a height of about six feet, falling again with a thunderous splash which might have been heard for miles.

Mr. Bullen has some words to say about the manning of merchant ships with an undue proportion of foreigners, which should be noted by the authorities. "The Board of Trade scale of provisions is a hateful abomination," he writes, and the wretched wages of chief mates and skippers of many ships in the Mercantile Marine lead to the overmanning of these ships by foreigners. This is a subject which should not be allowed to rest here, and we hope that Mr. Bullen will again take up the cause vigorously.

THE NEAR EASTERN QUESTION.

Travel and Politics in the Near East. By William Miller. 9½ x 6¼ in., xxiv. + 515 pp. London, 1898. Unwin. 21/-

This book is not the work of an ordinary globe-trotter. Mr. Miller is already known as the author of a useful historical sketch of the Balkans, and it is clear from the book before us that he has often visited most of the scenes described, has stayed long in them, and has enjoyed good introductions. Everywhere he has made searching inquiries as to government, trade, industry, natural advantages, and the state of society; and he has filled his book with a great deal of exact information which cannot fail to prove useful. The places which he has studied are Dalmatia, Montenegro, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Albania, Greece, Crete, Samos, Macedonia, Bulgaria, and Stamboul. These districts are well selected, since they are all different, and each has its lessons. Nor is the book without interest for less serious readers. On the contrary, it is full of happy literary allusions, good stories, both tragic and comic, pleasant gossip, and the good humour of a traveller who does not mind roughing it at times.

Within the narrow limits at our disposal we cannot give a fair idea of the amount of information which Mr. Miller has provided. The subjects range from brigandage to agriculture, from falconry to scenery, from finance and high politics to national costume. The portions which are most interesting just now are his description of the Austrian government of Bosnia and his forecast of the future of Greece and of Turkey. The Austrian rule of the occupied provinces wins his highest admiration, and he thinks that it would be a blessing to the world if Austria were to "run down to Salonica." To Baron von Kállay he pays a well-earned tribute for his strong and just administration. As regards Greece, he gives a lucid sketch of the chaotic state of politics and some interesting pictures of the public men of that country. We cannot agree with him, however, in his opinion that King Otho was a man fit to be King of any place; nor does he seem to us to have formed a true estimate of King George. The present King of Greece may be a worthy man, but he must be strongly condemned for his lack of interest in his adopted country. We rejoice to see that Mr. Miller has much good to say of the Greeks: their brave endurance of pain, and their generous relief of their Cretan and Thessalian brothers. But Mr. Miller does not realize that the late war, mad though it was, had something heroic about it, because it arose from burning indignation at the tyranny of Turkey over the Cretans. He says that the Turks "on the whole behaved very well in Thessaly." Here again he is inaccurate; all that can be said is, they have behaved worse elsewhere. Before they left Thessaly they gutted all the chief towns (except Volo) and burnt most of the villages, not to mention instances of the usual outrage. Those who believe that the reform of Turkey is possible will do well to read Mr. Miller's chapters on the utter corruption of the Turkish Government. The studies of Crete and Samos are interesting, but here again we note some mistakes. In Samos Mr. Miller imagined the gendarmérie to be composed of Turks; but those smart and stalwart men are the Samian national "army," and the only Turks in Samos are a small Turkish garrison (placed there in violation of the Constitution) and the crew of a small steamer in the harbour of Vathy. Mr. Miller found the Samians prosperous; but he did not notice the widespread feeling of sympathy for their neighbours which keeps them from being contented. "How can we be happy," they say, "when our brothers in Rhodes, Cos, Calymnos, and the other islands are slaves?"

More important for the present-day politician are Mr. Miller's chapters about Russian and German intrigue and the decline of British influence. England was until lately universally beloved by the oppressed peoples of the Levant; now they are beginning to doubt us. We wish that all members of Parliament and all intelligent voters would ponder the later chapters of this book.

A number of pictures illustrate the work, sufficient for the most part to give a general idea of places, but not always good. We miss the ancient bridge of Mostar and the famous Easter dance of Megara; but nearly everything else of interest has a picture. Many are quite pretty, as the olive groves of Corfu and the harbour of Rethymnos.

GOLD MINES.

KING SOLOMON'S GOLDEN OPHIR (Leadenhall Press, 2s. 6d.), by Dr. Carl Peters, is described in its sub-title as a "Research into the Most Ancient Gold Production in History." The mystery of Ophir is not only a question of archaeological interest, since it is obviously probable that if the site of this famous gold producer can be definitely discovered there will be rich leavings waiting for treatment by processes that Solomon could not command. Dr. Peters shows, in a closely reasoned argument, good cause for believing that "our name of Africa (A-F-Rica) contains the ancient root of Ophir (Aleph, Phi, Reah), and that therein the key must be sought by which the Ophir mystery may be really revealed." He points to the fact that the derivation of Africa has hitherto been a puzzle to philologists.

Further, until this day, the learned men of all nations were of opinion that neither Phoenicians nor Jews had a comprehensive name for that part of our globe which we call Africa. . . . Can it be seriously believed that they had no comprehensive name for regions, the connexion of the parts of which they must have perfectly understood? My theory that Ophir was in the earliest times the Semitic name for Africa as a whole solves this question at once.

Pursuing his inquiry he finds in Sofala or Sofara (Sa-Ophir) another variant of the same name and draws the conclusion that the district which furnished gold for King David's temple was the land between Limpopo and Zambesi, where "have been found the ruins of grand temples and fortifications, in connexion with mining works . . . evidently of Phœnicio-Sabæan origin, and of an age anterior to the time of Solomon." These old workings are calculated to have extended over an area of about 4,000 English square miles. Among the many curious and interesting sidelights that Dr. Peters throws on his argument we may mention that at Zimbabue, the most famous of these mining fortresses, "religious celebrations were still being performed in the ruins on the hill, according to an ancient and curious rite. The sacrifices, in which cattle were killed and their blood sprinkled, appeared . . . to present remarkable resemblance to ancient Jewish rites."

Many books have been written about the goldfields of the Rand, but public interest in this wonderful field expands pari passu with its ever growing output, and we have no doubt that THE WITWATERSRAND GOLDFIELDS, BANKET AND MINING PRACTICE, by S. J. Truscott (Macmillan, 30s.), will find a wide circle of readers. Mr. Truscott writes from the point of view of a mining engineer, and his work is severely technical. Slimes and stopes and crosscuts and winzes do not mean much to the general reader, or even to the average investor, but this book will be a storehouse of information to the practical student of mining engineering, and will well repay perusal by all who wish to know anything of the mechanical means by which this remarkable district, in which mining has been sobered into a steady-going industry, turns out its 400,000 odd ounces of gold per month with the regularity of clockwork. The work is well illustrated with plans, diagrams, and photographs.

IN THE GOLDFIELDS OF AUSTRALANIA, by Herr Schmeisser, assisted by Dr. Karl Vogelsang; translated by Henry Louis, M.A., &c. (Macmillan, 30s. net), we have the results of a rapid journey of inspection made by these two well-known German experts. Herr Schmeisser approaches the subject as a geologist, and his work deals chiefly with the strata and formations of the countries—Australia, Tasmania, and New Zealand—that he includes in his survey. He tells us a good deal more, however, in pleasant and chatty style, and has plenty to say about his travelling experiences, some of which were exciting enough, and about the general aspect and conditions of the Australian colonies. He also gives an interesting, but all too brief, sketch of the history of gold mining in these regions; and it is instructive to note that from the very first the industry attracted the genius of shady and mendacious characters. "Dailey, a convict, announced in August, 1780, that he had discovered gold, but confessed later that he had mixed filings of a brass buckle and of a guinea with some earth." The writer does not pretend to give much attention to the financial side of the question, but there are many passages in his work which investors might do to heart with advantage to their bank balances. For instance:—

The Australian prospector is perfectly aware of the fact that the extreme richness found in pockets at the outcrop very often disappears as depth is attained, and he therefore tries to sell his discovery as rapidly as possible. The report of a mining expert, which is a necessary preliminary to such a sale, would probably be optimistic unless he were to insist that deeper trial shafts should first be sunk or levels driven for the careful investigation of the nature of the deposits.

If the unfortunate shareholders in the Londonderry mine—to mention only one flagrant example—had but noted this fact in time they would be richer to-day. As for the experts, on the strength of whose reports millions of English capital have been thrown away to enrich promoters and vendors, it appears that "men of all occupations—sailors, officers, doctors, druggists, merchants, book-keepers—become experts with surprising rapidity." One such expert actually "reported on a deposit solely on the strength of specimens that were laid before him." With facts such as these before us, it is not surprising to find that Herr Schmeisser sums the matter up by saying that "financiers who are not mining experts ought not to be lured into doubtful security . . . they should not invest if they are not in a position to bear the total loss should the investment prove a failure." And if, we may add, they are in this enviable position, why should they jeopardize it by pursuing after wild cats?

THE GREAT PYRAMID.

The Book of the Master, or the Egyptian Doctrine of the Light born of the Virgin Mother. By W. Marsham Adams. Illustrated. 7½ x 5¼ in., xxii. + 204 pp. London, 1898. Murray. 6/-

The Great Pyramid, so far as we know, was built for a King's tomb. Elaborate precautions were taken that it should not be rifled. Unfortunately they were unsuccessful. The body which should be there is not, and the obvious purpose cannot be materially proved. Hence the door was opened not only to Arab burglars and common seekers after treasure, but to everybody who possessed the genius for making theories. It is like roulette, where every one has an infallible system. And, unluckily, the pyramid, it must be confessed, rather encourages theorists. It is built in such a way that it might very well have been an observatory, if it had not been a chief's barrow, and as no mummies were found, it may have been diverted from its original purpose, like Cæsar's dust. Again, it has certain dimensions which, when multiplied by some number or other, will infallibly equal some interesting astronomical measurement. Or, if you divide the base of the pyramid by one of the casing stones, you get the quotient 335·25, which is the number of days in the year; while if you multiply the casing stone (the length, we presume, but this is left doubtful) by ten million you arrive, naturally enough, at the length of the polar axis of the earth. In the same way, the area of Printing-house-square is a certain number of millionths of the surface of Jupiter—Jupiter towns, as the late Mr. Anthony Trollope used to say. The curious internal passages of the pyramid offer valuable occasions for speculation to those who will not recognize their obvious purpose as entrances to vaults, and among the imaginative students who have “laboured” this branch of research Mr. Adams holds a distinguished place. We are not sure that an equally brilliant theory might not be constructed to account for the secret chambers and mysterious passages in Sir John Soane’s Museum; and, indeed, since the museum is situated in Lincoln’s-inn-fields, the area of which is commonly believed to equal that of the base of the Great Pyramid, the suggestion may be worth elaborating. Mr. Adams totally rejects all previous theories. According to him the pyramid was neither a tomb, nor a treasury, nor an observatory, nor a “prophet floor-roll of human history,” though it has elements of all these various functions. It was the scene where the neophyte was initiated into the mysteries of the Egyptian religion, and was the visible counterpart of the so-called ritual of the so-called “Book of the Dead.” Mr. Adams brought the subject before the world in an earlier volume, of which the present work is a development. Indeed, the New Review was first privileged to receive his “Clue to the Mysterious Religion of Ancient Egypt”:

That clue was afforded by a comparison of the secret passages and chambers contained in the Great Pyramid, or “Secret House,” of Memphis, to which the Egyptians of old gave the title of the “Light,” with the secret passages and chambers portrayed in the sacred papyrus describing the “Entrance on Light,” which we at present call the “Book of the Dead,” but which the Egyptian priests entitled “The Book of the Master of the Secret House.” And the correspondence which I pointed out to exist between them resulted in the two mysteries partially, at least, illumining and disclosing each other.

The accuracy of the theory is supposed to be supported by a positively Delphic saying of Professor Maspero, who wrote “The Pyramids and the ‘Book of the Dead,’ reproduce the same original, the one in words, the other in stone.” It is to be noted that the oracle says “pyramids,” but there is no other pyramid in all Egypt save that of Cheops to which Mr. Adams’ explanation applies. This unique character of a solitary pyramid is one of the objections to the theory. Egyptian kings were not wont to allow their predecessors an uncontested superiority in their buildings, and if the Great Pyramid were really a special temple of initiations it is certain that there would have been imitations in later reigns. Mr. Adams, we admit, works his absurd theory out beautifully, and, we must add, most eloquently. His book is charming, and the mysteries it discloses appeal delightfully to the spiritual, though scarcely to the archaeological, imagination.

A “BORN PREACHER.”

The Unheeding God. By Thomas G. Selby. 82 x 5½ in., 384 pp. London, 1899. Hodder & Stoughton. 6/-

Now and again there appears a volume of sermons, and still more rarely a volume of speeches, which deserves to escape the speedy oblivion that swallows the ordinary discourse. Mr. Selby’s collection of twenty sermons is distinctly one of these. It is worth reading and keeping, for it is the work of a man who evidently goes into the pulpit because he has something to say, and not because he has to say something, of a man, moreover, who can make his points with singular force and acumen. His sermons have curious titles—“An Early Chauvinist,” “The Dirge of the Dead Hand,” and so on, but each of them grapples with a definite, and generally a difficult, subject, dealing with it honestly and thoroughly in a way that comes home to the average thoughtful person. That is the secret of his power. Most eminent preachers are also scholars; and, however simple their words may be, their thought runs on subtle lines, and can only be appreciated by a University audience. Mr. Selby’s vocabulary is not simple, but his thought is; he writes as a man who has indeed read much and pondered well, but whose reading has been that of a man of the world rather than of a scholar, and his meditations about men rather than theories. To say this is to say that he is a born preacher. He is not an orator in the usual sense of that word. Calmly and steadily his sentences proceed, without a note of passion or any appeal to emotion, and end, without attempt at peroration, in some thoughtful sentence. The weak, vicious methods of those who speak for effect are eschewed by him, and the passion of genius which such speakers attempt to imitate is beyond his province. At the same time his sermons are sermons, not polished essays, weapons too fine for pulpit use, as are the printed discourses of many far greater men. It needed an effort to understand a preacher like Dean Church; it must have required a cultivated mind to appreciate the periods of a Massillon; but Mr. Selby can be understood by every one who can follow a newspaper article. He is true to the function of the preacher, for he mediates between abstract thought and the concrete man.

He is a preacher, but not a writer. He lacks that first necessity in the maker of prose—the power of welding sentences together. Each phrase rises up at you and hits you; his style jumps and bumps along, from full-stop to comma, from comma to full-stop, without grace, without music, without distinction in the choice of words. He writes as a speaker writes. Therein lies his power, and therein lie also his limitations. Take, for instance, as an illustration both of his matter and his manner, his account of the world’s effort to “cure our malady of heart and win us back to its scenes of happiness”:

Look at the glitter and bravery and good-fellowship offered you here, and be content. And if that is not enough it sets its worldly-wise men to frighten us out of our little bit of piety by telling us what a gloomy and purgatorial affair a religious life is. But the heart-sickness persists. It would be the height of infatuation to return to the melancholy illusions of the past. The sadness of the world is a sign of its growing penetration. Material well-being cannot effectually satisfy us. The light literature of the day is weird with the writhings and the wailings of lost souls. Writers who ring the praises of lust, classical nakedness, gilded pruriency land themselves at last behind the iron bars of a despondency from which there is no escape.

That Mr. Selby is a master of the preacher’s art is shown by his use of illustration. An average audience cannot follow a speaker into the regions of thought unless he is constantly enticing his hearers with attractive and informing pictures. Mr. Selby’s fertility of resource in this matter is simply amazing. Does he wish to explain that true order must consist in a living intercommunication of parts? He describes the crypt of the Capucin Church at Rome, with its ghastly arrangement of bones and skulls, to show that, though the grouping is faultless, “this ingenious gruesomeness is the mere travesty of order.” Does he wish to show that distant upheavals of thought may “clog” our spiritual atmosphere? He has ready at hand a volcanic eruption which threw up enough matter to fill a “box as big as Hyde-park, and equal in height to the dome of St. Paul’s,” and filled distant skies with a mysterious darkness. The receptiveness of the Christian life is contrasted, in a sermon on “Cumulative Grace,” with the river which flows for a thousand miles without receiving a single tributary. Faithful to the meticulous duties of the reviewer, we have counted up the number of illustrations in the sermon on “Order,” and have found no less than thirty-five: bridges, battles, machinery, Bedouins, boulders, wrecks, earthquakes, pagodas, all rise up and do his bidding. He is indeed an illustrator rather than a theologian, an expounder rather than an original thinker. He writes broadly and temperately for modern men of average culture, not about the higher ranges of thought, but about the world in which they live, its miseries and difficulties. He is above his hearers, but not beyond them.

TINTAGEL.

I.

Hearken, thou fortress inexpugnable !
 Make answer, rock precipitous and blind !
 What memory of the ages left behind
 Hast thou ? What tales that no man's tongue may tell ?
 Ever with waves that landwards break or swell
 Whitening upon thy gaunt grey cliffs or find Passage through thunderous caverns undermined
 The Atlantic holds thee as in a mystic spell.

Hither from Ireland came the bark that bore
 Tristram the hunter and Iseult the fair.
 Rememberest thou the story old and dark ?
 Sleep they in sea, these lovers, near thy shore ?
 Mourn'st thou them now or dost thou rather wear
 The unsatiated sorrow of King Mark ?

II.

Nay, how should'st thou make answer, thou for whom
 A thousand years go past as yesterday ?
 Thy face unchanged, when years have swept away
 All memory of this age's fret and fume,
 And all we lie forgotten in the tomb,
 Will watch the stars' and sun's alternate sway
 Until the old earth's dispeopled orb of clay
 Sinks back to night's unfathomable womb.

Vain as the winds that sweep thy cliffs, our cries
 Assail the deaf ears of the empty skies.
 Vain as the shattered onslaught of thy sea
 From thy fierce walls in wrath flung back again,
 The vaunted works and hopes and dreams of men
 Break on the bastions of eternity.

"UNHAPPY WELSTED."

It is a commonplace of criticism to compare the heroes of the "Dunciad" with flies in amber. We are accustomed to be quite satisfied with their appearance in that cruel museum, and we do not trouble ourselves to ask how they got there. Never, in the history of literature, was an author more successful in smashing the whole regiment of his enemies than was Pope in this extraordinary poem, the adroitness, the courage, and the audacity of which dazzle us more and more the longer we examine it. He long prepared, in silence and obscurity, his cunningly poisoned shell. His friends fretted for the fun to begin. "Why does not Mr. Pope publish ? The rogues he mauls will die in peace," said Swift in February, 1728. But Pope was not to be hurried; he was an artist in destruction, and he would not fling his bomb until the best possible moment had come for annihilating all his enemies in a mass. At last that moment came. The "Dunciad" was flung into Grub Street, and it burst with storm and stink unparalleled. When the rolling vapours cleared away, the Dunces were not. They had disappeared, and they have never been discoverable since.

This disappearance of the Dunces is a positive fact. I doubt if any private person at the present day possesses a collection of their writings approaching completeness. Colonel Grant made a noble effort to gather them together, but I believe that even he became weary of the hopelessness of it, and dispersed his specimens. If, in an impartial spirit, one wishes to see what manner of men Eusden and Oldmixon, Smedley and Concanan, were, it is very difficult to do it. We know all these people through Pope. It is to their relentless enemy that we have to apply for information about them. After nearly two centuries, the satirist still holds the door of the hospital where those wretches lie, and answers the visitor who inquires after Moore-Smythe or Theobald, "Oh ! you can't see the fellow, but I shall be happy to give you any information you require." To speak of one of the Dunces is to stir the ashes of Pope's resentment, to give his splenetic fury another chance of spitting venom. What a sublimity of cleverness there was in Pope ! How delicate was his instinct with regard to his associates ! He charmed the talent of the age, and called it around him to laugh while he tormented the very soul out of the Philistines and the mediocrities.

Among the Dunces there was one who differed from the rest and apparently gave Pope a considerable amount of discomfort. Leonard Welsted lives in popular recollection solely on the score of the magnificent parody of a famous passage in Denham's "Cooper's Hill." In the Third Book of the "Dunciad" successive generations read with delight :—

Flow, WELSTED, flow ! like thine inspirer, beer ;
 Though stale, not ripe ; though thin, yet never clear ;
 So sweetly mawkish, and so smoothly dull,
 Heady, not strong ; o'erflowing though not full.

A parody in which the antithesis is superior to that of the original it imitates. "Unhappy Welsted," as Pope very justly styles him, was the object of constant attention from the satirist, and there is no name which Pope has covered more artistically with derision and contempt. In the great competition the poet seems to summon his most splendid powers together to hurl this unhappy man into oblivion. Nothing in the "Dunciad" is finer than Welsted's plunge into the Sable Stream :—

drawn endlong by his skull,
 Furious he sinks, precipitously dull,
 Whirlpools and storms his circling arms invest,
 With all the might of gravitation blest ;
 No crab more active in the dirty dance,
 Downward to climb, and backward to advance.

In an early note, which he hastened to suppress, Pope permitted himself to appear irritated by what he called "the great scurrility and fury" of Welsted, and as late as 1736, in the "Epistle to Dr. Arbuthnot," he represents himself as patient under the attacks of this man :—

Full ten years slandered, did he once reply ?
 Three thousand suns went down on WELSTED'S lie.

It would be to waste time to continue to enumerate instances of the peculiar irritation which this particular opponent created in Pope.

The reason of this special animosity rests, I think, mainly on a fact that has not received the attention it deserves. Most of the protagonist Dunces were men of inferior education, or at least of undignified mental habits. In attacking them, in violently dividing himself and his friends from participation in their vulgar literature, Pope knew that he ranged his battalion on the side of the angels. But Leonard Welsted was a scholar and a gentleman, a person of the most elegant tastes, and naturally formed to be one of Pope's supporters. With his accustomed adroitness, Pope saw that the only effective mode of defaming Welsted, since the animosity of the latter was implacable, was to present him in a degraded form, by humiliating him in his person, his attainments, and his ambitions. Accordingly, Welsted is one of those who plunge for an indecorous prize in a filthy competition, and, if we examine the numerous references to him in detail, we see that they are invariably contemptuous and offensive. Welsted goes down to posterity in a cloud of scurrility and squalor. Pope was a monstrously clever fellow, and Welsted was obstinate and silly. But it may be amusing to observe that a very little civility might have turned him from one of the gargoyles of literature into an agreeable gentleman who wrote with ease and dignity.

Of all the contemporaries of Pope, Leonard Welsted was the nearest to him in age, since he was born about a week after the birth of Pope (his baptismal registration in the parish church of Abingdon, Northamptonshire, being dated June 3, 1688). He was the son of the rector, and the grandson of a "celebrated lawyer and antiquary." He went to Westminster, where, we are told, he "raised so great expectations of his future genius that there was a kind of struggle between the two universities which should have the honour of his education." Cambridge won in this generous race, and he proceeded to Trinity in 1707. When the "Dictionary of National Biography" reaches his name, doubtless we shall possess the fullest particulars regarding Welsted, whose early life I do not find it easy to illuminate. But he presently marries a daughter of the great musician, Henry Purcell, and in 1715 we find him inditing, what is called by Jacob "a very good" small poem to the Earl of Clare on his being created Duke of Newcastle on the 2nd of August. The panegyric in these verses surpasses the modesty of truth, yet I connect them with the fact that he obtained from the nobleman in question "a place in the office of one of the Secretaries of State." Welsted was now started on his career of usefulness in the public service, and a short poem of compliment marked each easy rise, until the Duke of Dorset—"Heaven bless the generous hand that gave it!"—presented him with a post in the Ordnance Office, which involved a house in the Tower of London. Welsted was now comfortable for life; he rose (through "the generous exertions" of the Bishop of Bangor) to be permanent head of his office, which he combined with a commissionership of State lotteries until his death, "which happened in the Tower," in 1747. He outlived his brilliant enemy three years.

Such was the inoffensive, and highly successful, outward career of Welsted, and his poems reveal a somewhat pompous, over-courtly, semi-professional, fine gentleman, in perpetual guidance of lace-ruffles and a clouded cane. The Muse of Welsted—so unlike the figure travestied by Pope—seems to be always articulating the words "prunes" and "prism," and listening in rapturous familiarity to elderly persons of rank. This is not our foregone impression about Welsted.

But a greater surprise awaits us when we find that his thoughts were occupied almost exclusively upon the classics. He was never without a Horace or a Tibullus in his hand, and he contemplated poetry only by the light of the ancients. No doubt, he was an excellent scholar, and one of his worst offences must have been his repeated contention that Pope really knew no Greek. Welsted's most important contribution to literature was a translation of Longinus' "On the Sublime," which he published in 1712, in the glorious dawn of the Age of Anne; the original edition of this volume contains an appendix of criticism of the English Poets, in which Addison and Ambrose Philips are warmly praised, while no mention whatever is made of the new author of "The Messiah." Here, in my judgment, the mortal sin of Welsted began. Pope, who noted everything and forgave nothing, saw at the outset that this learned and elegant young man, being not for him, was against him, and he bided his time.

Meanwhile Welsted threw himself into the Addisonian faction. We find him patronized by Steele, complimented by Tickell, encouraged by Hoadly, honoured with the acquaintance of the Countess of Warwick. When his poem, "The Invitation," was published in the Freethinker (June 29, 1719), Ambrose Philips wrote a long prose introduction to it. Here we have a peep at Welsted in his house at the Tower:—

If Lucy rules not with her jealous sway,
I shall expect you at the close of day.
Already is my little side-board grac'd;
The glasses marshall'd, the decanters plac'd;
The room is cool; the summer hearth is gay
With greens and flowers, exuberance of the May. . . .
I give you only lamb from Uxbridge fields,
And add the choicest herb my garden yields,— Silesian lettuce,—with soft Lucca oil,
Delicious blendings of a different soil.

This is not what we expect from the filthy Welsted of the "Dunciad." What a clever man Pope was!

To represent Welsted as a good poet is impossible. But in an Horatian exercise he is often above the average of his graceful age in grace. His Oikoyapáia, published in 1725, is a very amusing piece of octosyllabics. The Earl of Dorset has given him a handsome house, and keeps it in good repair. But there is one thing wanting. Welsted addresses himself to the Earl, not to raise

Trophies to thee of tinsel praise, but to invite his benefactor to see how comfortable the poet is. Accordingly, Lord Dorset is wooed in to admire the house, its arrangements, its pictures, its furniture, the panel-glass;

The matted chairs, the locks of brass,
The stove, that cheers the wintry moon,
Or flower-piece, in its stead, in June,
The buffet that, with glasses fine,
Tempts heedless folks to stay to dine, until, as if by accident, they reach a place "where all is blank, and empty all!"—namely, the cellar. There is not a bottle of wine in it, save a paltry "claret phiz" or two, and Welsted withdraws in painful confusion, overwhelmed with shame that his Lordship should have observed his inability

To hail great George in Bordeaux wine, Thy Lord, O Middlesex—and mine!

The hint was well received, and a supply of the finest Hermitage was presently delivered at the "sightly front" of Welsted's house in the Tower.

Welsted, in that unlyrical age, had some versatility in metres. He ought to be added to the slender body of poets who, before Tennyson, employed the "In Memoriam" stanza:—

I, too, the golden harp, my pride
And fair distinction, fain would claim;
Give me a Lyric Poet's name,
And I'll look down on all beside.

This is more than we can quite grant to Welsted, who must make what he can of the ugly immortality which Pope has fastened upon him. The satirist was horribly unjust, and yet, after all, if Pope had overlooked Welsted altogether, who would mention his name to-day?

EDMUND GOSSE.

THE WRITER AND THE PRINCE.

"Ah, Love! could you and I with Him conspire
To grasp this sorry Scheme of Things entire.
Would not we shatter it to bits—and then Remould it nearer to the Heart's Desire!"

Now it happened, in the years of the restored despotisms, that a man sat writing upon tablets at the foot of a great tree in a royal forest. Before his eyes—that dreamed with a restful gravity—went a luminous glade, spilt, in a lessening perspective from his feet, with overflow of the primroses and windflowers that so filled a neighbouring clearing that the stumps of brushwood standing therein were only so many scores of little stark islands set in a sea of white and lemon blossoms.

The sunlight fell like burning green oil from the leaves overhead, firing the turf below in patches. The cushat seemed to dip her beak into it, and to wash her lovesick breast with purring flame. Sounds, seeking for echoes, sank, exhausted with drowsy laughter, by the way.

A girl came up the track singing, her hat, trimmed with mosses and living woodland flowers, swung in her hand. Her neck and arms were bare; kissed by the full lips of the sun, too, in all but the tender creases. She was as pretty as a gillyflower.

The writer—his eyes losing their preoccupied expression—came to earth like a dropping lark.

In one and the same instant a woodcock—its claws clutched, its long beak chinned upon a nestling that it carried against its heart—whirred into the glade; a gun slammed in the copses; the maid screamed; the bird, dropping its chick, went up—tossed, it seemed, on the crest of a wave of air—struck against a tree, and fell dead on the grass.

Thereon, also, lay the girl. The writer rose and hurried to her. She was stricken like Procris. Her eyes were closed; her cheeks were even then falling white; one tiny globe of blood budded on the fair stalk of her left arm.

As the writer stooped over her, a young man emerged from the coppice, advanced, and stood looking down upon the two. The expression on the face of the newcomer was supercilious and a little foolish. His features drew to a sharpish prow. His cheek bones were tinged with carmine. He carried a gun of rare workmanship in his hand.

"It is usually a trustworthy servant, this," he said in a slow nasal voice, that was rather plaintive than apologetic.

He tapped the stock of his weapon.

"It is a servant upon whom I can usually depend, sir, to do my will. My will was not to kill this pretty child."

The writer looked round and up with eyes as cold as morning stars.

"The proud," said he, "who in these days inherit the earth, will never learn that the will stultifies itself through arrogance."

He stooped again; lifted the slack body; raised and bore it to the foot of the tree at which he had been formerly seated. His papers, his pencil, his knife lay there, scattered about the moss.

The sportsman followed, trailing his footsteps sullenly.

"See—have you killed her?" asked the writer.

"It would appear so," said the stranger. "The shot must have glanced."

"And who are you to play so fast and loose with innocent lives?"

"It was contrary to my will, I have told you. And do you not know who I am?"

"Indeed, I know. You are the king."

"I am the king, of course."

"Of course. For who else would think to plead his will for firing at woodcock in this nesting time of May?"

"I plead nothing, sir. You are insolent."

"Well, exert your will, in proof of its omnipotence. Restore this maid to life."

"That is absurd."

The writer laughed; reached for his penknife; applied its thin, glittering point to the wounded arm of the girl. Under the tiny gout of blood a tiny blue knob, like a little sloe-berry, stood up from the skin. He made a small incision, and squeezed out between his finger and thumb a single pellet.

"That is all the injury," said he. "The rest is fright."

Even as he spoke he saw the girl's lids flutter; saw that the tide of consciousness was turned, rippling back to her cheeks.

"She is not dead, then," said the king. "It was not my will to kill her."

"Mine is the will here," said the writer. "King, by as much as this, that I have restored what thou could'st only reave, I am greater than thou."

The sportsman vented a little hee-hawing laugh.

"Well," he said, "I am pleased at least to find I have not hurt the girl. I will indulge the whim to play bandy with you."

He sat himself down on a thick root; fetched a flask of Tokay from his breast pocket, unstopped and drained the vessel without any real expression of enjoyment.

The writer bent over the girl. He addressed, it seemed to him, his own image, very clean-cut and diminutive, in the mirror of the brown eyes that wondered up into his.

"It was only a single shot in the arm," he said. "No wound at all. I have made it almost well. It has bled no more than a thorn prick—three drops, all of which are printed on my handkerchief in the shape of a little heart."

At the words the girl—a towzled nymph—scrambled into a sitting posture, caught sight of the sportsman with his gun across his knees, and fell sideways, frantically clutching at the writer.

"Don't let him hurt me!" she whimpered.

"He shall not again. It was only a piece of carelessness; but he thought you were dead, till I coaxed out the pellet and brought you back to life."

She thought of the piece of apple in Snowdrop's throat, in the fairy tale. She was little more than a child.

"And are you the prince, then?" she murmured.

"No," said the writer. "I am greater than the prince."

He put his arm about the girl to support her. He felt amazingly sympathetic towards this nestling that, he chose to think, had fallen, orphaned, from the woodcock's feathery entrance. By all the pretty tricks of fancy, she was his—the captive of his penknife! When he said he was greater than the prince he felt her heart leap under his hand.

"The prince did the hurt," said he, "but I have effected the cure. To which of us is the better power?"

The sportsman gave a second high laugh.

"Proceed," said he. "Have you only this one illustration to all your boasted superiority?"

"Give me thy flask," said the writer.

"It is drained."

"Emptied into the sour channels of a debased appetite, in truth. For me, in every drop would have slept the germ of conception. By the measure of the rein with which I curb my lusts, I am greater than thou, O, king!"

"Grant thou canst control thyself. Canst thou at thy sole will make or mar another man?"

"The children of my brain are numberless. I am their indisputable lord. Where you are able to do no more than alter the conditions of life, I can create;—nay, if I choose, wonders of such form, living or inanimate, as the world has never known I can create, and to live through all time."

"Hast thou ever an army to fight, without question, thy foes; to serve, with its blood and its loyalty, thine airiest caprice?"

"To every ten such soldiers of yours, I will oppose ten thousand—more fanatic, more blind; more ripe, on both counts, for the service of the antichrist, when the unjust kings from every age shall make their last stand on the brink of the pit."

The sportsman glanced up, with a little half-doubtful chuckle.

"Where quarters this army?"

"In my brain. I have but to close mine eyes, and its countless bugles shred the clouds; the thunder of its rising rolls amongst the hills."

"What then! a jumping nerve in thy tooth shall dissipate all. Listen—I am the lord of life and death."

The writer caught his arm closer about the girl.

"Thou canst not," said he, "be both; or even one. For, if thou slayest, thou hast no longer the life to control; and if thou forbearest thy hand, the life is there in despite of thee. And has not the meanest hind the power to kill, with thee? Nay, he can kill thee, even thee; and what canst thou do more with him? As thou canst slay him, so can he slay thee, man to man. And if thou commit'st the deed to deputy, it is the deputy that arrogates to himself the lordship."

"Admit, I can bend the subject to my will."

"Aye, till his neck snap, because the soul within him is stubborn. But to my rule the soul itself does homage."

"These are sophistries. Is there one thing, in all this realm, that thou, and never I, canst command?"

"Surely. Obscurity."

The prince clicked in his throat. A shadow, as from the wings of a passing bird, seemed to flicker across his face.

"The corner—the corner," he muttered, "in which to hide from myself?"

He looked, with clouded eyes, at the writer, but did not question him further.

"Prince," said the writer; "who was king when Homer sang?"

The other shook his head.

"No," the writer said—"not thou knowest, nor any. See now this well-worn bandana wrapt about the sandwiches on which I shall presently feast (mark you) in great content. See—then close thy lids and I will rede thee a vision."

"Sir," said the monarch haughtily, "I have yet that passing regard for existence that I would not, by assuming mine to be impregnable, or you to be honest, put a premium on possible treachery."

The writer broke into a cackle of furious laughter.

"Hear the lord of life and death!" he cried, "pronouncing himself subject to his subject! But I also, Sir, have a regard for existence, the infinite uses of which I would not stultify for the sake of a dog, much less of a king."

He shook himself into the sober mood.

"Here is my vision," he said; "and be thine eyes open, and opened to it. Of old days a king died, and his body, upon the pyre, was consumed to ashes. The ashes were placed in an urn; the urn was sepulchred. Ages after, the tomb was rifled, the urn broken open and stood aside as worthless in a corner of a mulberry garden. A thief, stealing and devouring fruit, spat forth the pipe, one of which alighted amongst the ashes in the urn. The seed opened and put forth shoot and root. A little mulberry plant arose, grew green, and waxed into lusty strength of foliage. By-and-by its roots, assimilating to the last grain the mothering Royal dust, became pot-bound, and, bursting its prison, the sapling rolled forth upon the ground, in which it was presently given its place by the keeper of the garden. Now, washed by rains and manured by sheep, it grew into a prosperous tree, wherefrom, in a certain season, the young, broad leaves were plucked for food to the spinning worm. And the sluggish fleshy larvæ ate thereof; and the glutinous fibre was converted in them to silk; and of this silk it came to pass that a napkin was woven."

The writer, with a flourish, flicked the handkerchief from its burden and ostentatiously dusted his boots.

"And—?" said the prince.

"To this ignoble office was at the last applied," continued the writer.

The prince got to his feet, stretched himself, and yawned.

"Well," he said, "the moral is all for the imagination, I see. I yield you the prerogative there, Sir, and beg you to make the most of it. For us—nine hundred and ninety nine thousandths of the world—who have none, the issues of life are material. You are greater than I, you say. Yet I can prove your dreams barren of a single prerogative without which all the rest are unleavened bread."

"And what is that?"

"Love, Sir, love—as the king can command it."

He put his fowling-piece under his arm, bowed low to a certain silent listener, and turned and strode away through the wood.

The girl scrambled to her feet. The writer, looking into her face, saw it illumined with a wrapt expression of wonder.

"Oh!" she breathed, "was that really the king?"

"You may well marvel," said the writer. "Such a painted show! One expects to see, when he turns his back, the cross laths that support the canvas. Where are you going?"

He leapt to his feet, and a savage spot of red sprang to his either cheek.

"The man nearly killed you!" he shouted. "It was I brought you back to life."

"I know," she said, twisting her head to look back over her shoulder; "but—"

"But what?"

"It is the king"—and she turned to pursue the withdrawing shadow.

The writer stood a moment with lowering face; then stooped to recover his manuscript from the grass, and, with great deliberation, tore it into a hundred pieces.

BERNARD CAPES.

Notes.

In consequence of the large demand for Literature of November 27, 1897, which contained Mr. Rudyard Kipling's "Recessional" (reprinted from The Times of July 17, 1897), that number is now out of print. As, however, orders for it are still coming in, in large numbers, we propose, in order not to disappoint those who wish to possess a copy of Literature containing this poem, to reprint the "Recessional" in our next issue, dated April 29, 1899. In the same issue "Among my Books" will be written by Mr. Stephen Gwynn; and the number will also contain a poem by "Violet Fane" (Lady Currie).

Our article on Book Prices Current brings us a letter from a correspondent who complains that, in uttering our warning against the danger of making books too cheap, we "entirely neglect the point of view of the consumer." He says:—

You point out that for one family one copy of a book suffices. But had your writer in mind that populous family which meets under the roof of the circulating library, driven there by the dearth of books, almost all of whom would buy the sixpenny novel? Why should the tale I read in a night cost me 5s.? The sum is outrageous. It is not economically justified, it does not compare in price favourably with other amusements. Your writer entered into the question of groceries. May I point out to him that coffee, once consumed, ceases to compete? Why should I give 5s. for such and such a modern poet with his metallic songs, when at that price I can get three or four Immortals, neatly bound and clearly printed? The real need for a cheapening of books comes from the competition of the ancients.

It is, of course, difficult to represent every point of view in one article. We are concerned quite as much for the interests of the reader as for those of the author, and, indeed, all that we intended to do was to show that the sixpenny novel was a concession to the demands of the consumer by which the producer was more likely to be impoverished than enriched. Our correspondent is, however, prepared with a specific against this eventuality:—

Let authors [he writes] be content with a more sober standard of living, and a more humble bearing towards the public. We hear too much of phenomenal prices paid for MSS. Let us hear of a simple and unaffected life.

This, certainly, would be one way out of the difficulty, and we are happy to give publicity to the suggestion. But perhaps the authors will reply that it is rather for the consumers to adopt a more sober standard of living in order that they may be able to afford to buy plenty of books at the present prices. Considering the pleasure and profit to be derived from it, a good book at 4s. 6d. is really cheap compared with a bottle of champagne, or a ticket for a West-end theatre.

The selling of books on the hire-purchase system by the proprietors of newspapers is an innovation that seems to be rapidly establishing itself on a sound basis. In the same week we have the Daily News offering a set of the works of Dickens on this principle, and the Daily Telegraph entering upon the more ambitious task of seeking a market for the "100 best novels in the world." This latter list is evidently compiled with the view of including something to please every taste, even the most banal; and the perception of that guiding principle must to a certain extent silence criticism. Otherwise one would certainly want to know what "The Wide, Wide World," popular as it is, was doing in the same galley with "Tom Jones" and "Peregrine Pickle." Copyright considerations have also, no doubt, limited the field of choice, and account for the fact that Mr. Hall Caine is represented by "The Deemster" rather than "The Manxman," Mr. Conan Doyle by "The Firm of Girdlestone" rather than the "White Company," and George Eliot by "Scenes of Clerical Life," which, when one comes to think of it, is not a novel at all, rather than by "Adam Bede." How else, too, can we account for the omission of "The Cloister and the Hearth" under the name of "Charles Reade," and of "Westward Ho!" under that of Charles Kingsley? French critics will also think it strange that a list of the best French novels should include "Le Juif Errant," and omit "Madame Bovary" and "L'Education Sentimentale"; while all those whose tastes are cosmopolitan will feel that, if foreign novels were to be included at all, place might have been found for some examples of Björnson. The fact remains, however, that any one who buys the Telegraph's books will have plenty of light reading to last him for a long time.

Robespierre is a great success at the Lyceum, but it will do little to add to M. Sardou's literary reputation. From a literary point of view it does not even compare well with Thermidor. But M. Sardou has for a long time been more a playwright than a man of letters. In Robespierre he has wrought a bespoken play with great skill, and turned out an article just suited to Lyceum requirements. There is plenty of spectacle (and very good spectacle it is), just enough drama to hold a series of striking scenes together, a good part for Sir Henry Irving, a fairly good part for Miss Ellen Terry, and nothing to speak of for any one else—except, perhaps, Mr. Kyrle Bellw, whose robust acting forces him into prominence. M. Sardou's spiritist leanings (which led him into that unfortunate experiment Spiritisme) are given play in a very well managed ghost scene. A good many people imagined that the spectres were only supposed to exist in Robespierre's imagination, but M. Sardou has explained that he meant them for visible ghosts, and that it was only Robespierre's eighteenth-century encyclopædism that made him refuse to believe them real. The play has, of course, stimulated the publishers, and Messrs. Hutchinson announce "Robespierre and the Red Terror," translated from the Dutch of Professor Brink.

If Indian life is to be made as good a subject for the stage as Mr. Kipling and Mrs. Steel have made it in fiction, it must be treated more skilfully than it has been treated by Mr. Henry Arthur Jones in Carnac Sahib. The characters are unreal, the story is uninteresting and uneventful. However cleverly "atmosphere" is suggested, it will not atone for lack of plot. This is not a common failing in Mr. Jones' plays. His active imagination generally suggests plenty of ingenious incident and complication. In Carnac Sahib the only incidents are beyond belief, and there are no complications at all. If Mr. Tree wants to give us the drama of action (which should be more at home in Drury Lane than at Her Majesty's) at least he should see that his authors provide some action to make a drama with.

The newest sixpenny paper is the London Letter, edited by Mr. Algernon Locker, at one time assistant editor of the Globe, and subsequently editor of the Morning Post, and Mr. Stafford Ransome. As it is intended to be exported to the Colonies, it must not be judged from the point of view of English readers. It supplies to British subjects all over the world a lucid summary of the news of the week, and treats sport, fashion, literature, and the drama no less carefully than home and foreign politics. A series of papers on "Greater Britons" begins with an appreciation of Lord Palmerston; and a reproduction of Philip's painting of "Lord Palmerston addressing the House of Commons in 1860" is given as a supplement.

The enthusiasm evinced by Mr. F. R. Benson's audiences at Stratford-on-Avon at the annual performances in commemoration of Shakespeare's birthday is well known. This year Mr. Benson shows, as ever, a determination not to trundle to any traditions which may impair the artistic completeness of the plays. On Monday afternoon and evening next he will test the enthusiasm of Stratford Shakespearians by giving Hamlet, the longest of all the plays except Antony and Cleopatra, in its entirety. Another novelty was the performance last night of the second part of Henry VI. This play, which is generally believed to be the result of a collaboration in which Shakespeare did little more than retouch the work of Marlowe and Greene, has been the reverse of popular with stage managers. It has not, we believe, been performed since Phelps produced it during his series of Shakespearian revivals, including all the plays except Titus Andronicus and Troilus and Cressida.

A few weeks ago Mr. Alfred Cotgreave, Chief Librarian to the West Ham Public Library, published in our columns a plea for an annual subject-index to all general literature, to be modelled on the existing system of indexing in the West Ham libraries. Mr. B. L. Dyer, the Editor of The Library Assistant, writes to us in the interest of local libraries. While admitting that a national index, issued annually, would be of the greatest possible value to the student, and serve as a subject-catalogue to the British Museum and to any other library containing all the books of the year, he points out that it would be of little use in most local libraries, except to expose what books are wanting in them. As Mr. Dyer says, the ordinary reader in a public library does not want to find a list of all the books that have been written on a given subject, but a list of all the books on that subject in the particular library which he frequents. A special localized index to the collection of books actually before him is what he requires. This has already been carried out at one or two local libraries—as in the West Ham district—and it is no doubt of the highest importance that all librarians should consider it. The question is probably to some extent one of expenditure, but in a literary Utopia—where, by the way, all the books published would be worth indexing, and no indexer would require a salary—a system in which Mr. Cotgreave and Mr. Dyer would work hand in hand would certainly solve the question which now taxes the ingenuity of the librarian.

Since Henry Shaw in 1833 published his illuminated ornaments selected from MSS. of the Middle Ages with descriptions by Sir F. Madden, there has been a marked increase in the public appreciation of the works of art contained in early manuscripts on vellum. Public museums have absorbed a vast number and probably the best and choicest. Students and admirers of early illuminated MSS. are therefore dependent on those who have the power to bring to light the hidden beauties of national repositories.

The effort now made by the British Museum authorities to achieve something in this direction has been a most successful one. A portfolio containing fifteen plates, with full descriptive text by Mr. G. F. Warner, the assistant-keeper of manuscripts, has just been published, the reproduction and printing of the plates having been entrusted to Mr. William Griggs, who has done his work with great care and skill. Mr. Warner has chosen examples from the abundant stores at his disposal to illustrate certain schools and periods, and obviously Part I. will have to be followed by many others, in order that there may be a fair representation of all. The selection has been well made, and the difficult task of reproducing the colours carried out with great success. Hand-coloured copies of illuminations entail, of course, too much time and labour for the present day, though some quite recently sold by auction at good prices. We congratulate the British Museum on the production of such a very fine and painstaking performance, and for making those who care for them better acquainted with these portions of the national treasures.

A list of "the de jure Royal houses of the world" is one of the most interesting features of the "Legitimist Calendar for 1899" (Innes, 5s. n.). It is surprisingly complete, but, at the same time, contains some notable omissions. King George of Tonga, for example, is included, but there is nothing about King Khama of Bechuanaland, or the de jure successors of that much married monarch King Cetewayo of Zululand. His deposition was surely as well worth noting as that of Queen Liliuokalani of Hawaii. Nor is it easy to comprehend the principle on which Menelik of Abyssinia gets a full paragraph in the best Almanach de Gotha style, while Lobengula of Matabeleland and his dusky Majesty of Benin are ignored. One may further raise the question whether the compilers of the Calendar, Mr. Cranstoun Metcalfe and the Marquis de Rivigny and Raineval, are quite clear in their own minds of the meaning which they attach to the words de jure. It may be true that Prince Augustin, son of General Augustin de Iturbide, is the de jure Emperor of Mexico; but, in that case, how can it be said that he "succeeded" Maximilian who, from the Legitimist point of view, was only a de facto ruler who usurped the rights of the Iturbides. And how is the title of Rajah Brooke to the Principality of Sarawak any better, on de jure lines, than that of Queen Victoria to the Throne of Great Britain and Ireland? And how is the doctrine of the "Divine Right" of hereditary monarchs to be reconciled with the recognition, in the case of Sardinia, of the Salic Law, which is indisputably of human origin? These are questions which we are at a loss to answer; but we are partially consoled by the discovery that the claim of Mrs. Edmund H. Wickham to be de jure Princess of Mitylene appears to be absolutely unassailable.

Occasionally the compilers of the Kalendar plunge into politics. "The true solution of the Eastern Question," they curtly remark, "is to be found in the subversion of the Turkish domination and the establishment of a federal Christian empire, after the model of the German Empire." The Marquis de Rivigny and Raineval is a brave man, who has announced his intention of drawing the sword on behalf of Don Carlos at the earliest opportunity; but he will certainly need all his own courage and all the courage of his ancestors when he takes up the heroic task of federating Albanians, Bulgars, Greeks, Servians, Montenegrins, and other lively members of the Balkan family. It should be added, however, that, in spite of its eccentricities, the Kalendar has a certain historical value. Its lists of the non-jurors, of the descendants of Mary, Queen of Scots, and of the titles bestowed by the Stuart Kings in their exile must have involved much diligent research, and will be very useful to students.

The author of a recently published Welsh novel puts into the mouth of one of his characters an "appreciation" of Sir Lewis Morris. A novel is not quite the place for literary criticism; but we are not sorry to see it, because we are inclined to agree with "V. E. M.," a writer in the New Century Review of this month, that his immense popularity certainly claims for Sir Lewis Morris more serious and sympathetic consideration than he generally receives. We do not believe for an instant that, as "V. E. M." thinks, the tendency of the best poetical criticism is to judge a poet by his verse alone, without considering the thought that lies behind it, still less that this measure has been meted out "with peculiar consistency" in the case of Sir Lewis Morris, who certainly need not claim to be judged by his matter to the neglect of his manner. "V. E. M." is an enthusiast on the subject of the author of the "Epic of Hades," but he does not, in his standard of criticism, seem to us to give any due place to that magical, mysterious quality, "style." Still we are tempted, as he was, to quote at length for the benefit of Sir Lewis' detractors this one lyric which may almost rank with Waller's "Go, Lovely Rose," though it is inferior to it in convincing simplicity:—

Oh, vermeil rose and sweet,
Rose with the golden heart of hidden fire,
Bear thou my yearning soul to him I love,
Bear thou my longing and desire.

Glide safe, oh sweet, sweet rose,
By fairy-fall and cliff and mimic strand,
To where he muses by the sleeping stream,
Then eddy to his hand.

Drown not, oh vermeil rose,
But from thy dewy petals let a tear
Fall soft for joy when thou shalt know the touch
And presence of my dear.

Tell him, oh sweet, sweet rose,
That I grow fixed no more, nor flourish now
In the sweet maiden garden-ground of old,
But severed even as thou.

Say from thy golden heart,
From virgin folded leaf and odorous breath,
That I am his to wear or cast away,
His own in life or death.

In one respect the cause of womanhood has advanced since Virgil's time. It is no longer forens quid femina possit, but the capabilities of the literary lady at which the world wonders. The latest revelation of these is calculated to stagger the literary student. A French newspaper, which holds the proud position, analogous to that which Captain Shandon desired to occupy, of being "written by ladies for ladies," has undertaken a series of researches to show that all the great literary works of the world were in reality produced by women; but, as it is only of late years that it has been considered proper for women to write, they had to persuade some male relative to sign them and become immortal. At present we are assured that Balzac's sister, Madame Victor Hugo, and the negress loved by Baudelaire were respectively the real authors of the Comédie Humaine, "Hernani," and the "Fleurs du Mal." Mr. Butler has also shown that the "Odyssey" was written by a woman, though he has failed to explain her exact relationship to Homer, and the plays of Shakespeare have been attributed, by ultra-Baconians, to Queen Elizabeth. No doubt it will be shown that there was a subtle reference to the authorship of the "Arcadia" in the epitaph on "Sidney's sister," which is ascribed to Ben Jonson, and that Milton's trouble with his second wife originated in her unwillingness to hand over the MS. of "Paradise Lost."

There is a widely accepted idea north of the Tweed that Sir Walter Scott, in his "Old Mortality," is unjust to the Covenanters. The latest complaint on the subject comes from the Rev. Sholto Douglas, who, at a meeting of the Women's Protestant Union, held in Glasgow, lamented the manner in which Scott portrayed the Covenanter. It was absolutely false, said Mr. Douglas, to picture the Covenanter as almost a raving maniac. Now, it is unjust to Scott to speak of him as if he had represented Habakkuk Mucklewrath as typical of the Covenanters in general. Among the extremists (the Cameronians) there were unquestionably men of the Mucklewrath type. The Covenanters, it must be remembered, did not fight for "religious liberty." Theologically they belonged to the narrowest school of Calvinism, and they combined with heroism and devotion to principle a fanaticism which was as intolerant as that of their oppressors. Scott, with a deeper insight than some of his Scottish critics, saw errors on both sides; and he makes use of Lord Evandale and Henry Morton to express these. "Such is the fanaticism and violent irritation of both parties," remarked the former to Lady Margaret Bellenden, "that I fear nothing will end this civil war save the edge of the sword." There is nothing in "Old Mortality" to suggest that Scott had the slightest sympathy with the persecution to which the Covenanters were subjected. It is all the other way. But he saw the Covenanters as they really were, not as they have been idealized.

We have noticed before the researches into the antiquities of Bath made by Mr. J. F. Meehan, and in the April number of the Beacon, "a journal circulating in the Frome division of Somerset," he has some notes on Shelley's visit to the city. Shelley was there from September, 1816, to February, 1817, and it was in the intervening December that he heard of the death in London of his wife Harriet, and a fortnight later was married to Mary Godwin. Mr. Meehan is concerned with the lodgings which Shelley and Mary Godwin occupied, close to the Pump Room. Recently the house was known as Davis' Library, in Shelley's time as Meyler's Circulating Library. Meyler was a man of considerable local note, not only as a Council-man and magistrate, but as the founder of the Bath Herald, of which he was the first editor. He was also, like his relative, Mary Meyler, a versifier of much local fame. He was the founder of the circulating library which went by his name, and is known to bibliophiles as a publisher:—

Meyler published in his time works which, in some cases, because of the later fame of their authors, and the rarity of the books themselves, are most difficult to obtain. One such was a little volume of poems, entitled "Simonidea," published anonymously in 1806 by Walter Savage Landor, a little work that is now worth its weight in gold, as only some three or four copies are known to be in existence. It is even possible that Meyler in the same way may have been of use to Shelley in issuing to the world some of those anonymous publications which Shelley was so fond of producing.

The building where Meyler conducted his library, and where he found accommodation for Shelley, is now unfortunately no longer standing.

In the Outlook Mr. Robert Barr draws an interesting parallel between the careers of Mr. Kipling and the American writer, Mr. Ambrose Bierce. The resemblance between their work is certainly close. Our readers will remember a remarkable poem by Mr. Bierce, published in our columns last August, the tone of which was almost identical with Mr. Kipling's more famous "Recessional"; and when the prose-work of the two writers is compared, the similarity is even more remarkable. "In the Midst of Life" is just the book that Mr. Kipling would have written if he had been an American, and "Soldiers Three" is just the book that Mr. Bierce would have written if he had been an Anglo-Indian. An impartial critic of some third nationality would find it hard to say which of the two books gave the truer view of the detail of war. But Mr. Kipling is popular and Mr. Bierce is not. Why? That is the problem which Mr. Barr sets himself to solve; and he holds that the solution is simple. Mr. Kipling has gone on "pegging away" and Mr. Bierce has not, with the result that the man of one book is forgotten while the man of many books is famous. The explanation still leaves unsolved the problem why Mr. Bierce is less famous than Mr. Stephen Crane, who unquestionably gained his reputation on the strength of his first book. At any rate, if Mr. Barr's theory encourages Mr. Bierce to go on writing and publishing short stories, all lovers of good literature will rejoice.

The Rev. Arthur Washington Cornelius Hallen, M.A., F.S.A., incumbent of St. John's Church, Alloa, whose death occurred the other day, was engaged before his last illness in editing full transcripts of the parochial registers of the City of London from the middle of the sixteenth century. He enjoyed a world-wide reputation as an antiquary and was for many years editor of the Scottish Antiquarian.

Madame Michelet has left a considerable number of her husband's manuscripts containing notes and rough sketches for future works, together with the author's impressions and souvenirs of the men and events of his times, and many curious anecdotes which Michelet had collected for his History of France, but for which he had not found space. Madame Michelet had also prepared for publication the letters which she received from her husband before her marriage. She did not intend this book for sale, but was going to have it published in order to present it to the friends and admirers of M. Michelet.

There has been considerable literary activity in Switzerland during the past few years. Monsieur B. Van Myden has already completed a great portion of his "History of the Swiss Nation." In theology, which not unnaturally interests a people of so many sects, the Protestants—such as M. Jules Boven and Professor Bridel, the respective editors of "Moral Christianity" and the "Revue de Théologie et de Philosophie"—seem to be the most active. Swiss journalism is remarkable for the comparative absence of acrimonious controversy in a country where people have for so long agreed to differ on certain fundamental points. The editors of the weeklies exercise all the modern ingenuity as to the "get up" of their columns. La Semaine Littéraire, La Patrie Suisse, and some others are fairly well illustrated. Moreover, Le Journal de Genève is written in the best modern French. The women's journals are actually written by women. A monthly paper entitled Pages Littéraires devotes special attention to Swiss poetry. The numerous universities occupy a very important place in the literary life of the people. Old and forgotten works on history and theology are revived by the erudite commentaries which issue from the University of Fribourg. The Professors are full of theories as to the best system of education.

The books sold by Messrs. Sotheby last week were restricted entirely to early printed works and vellum MSS., with a few rare charts and maps. The prices obtained did not rule high, the condition of many of the volumes, especially those stated to have belonged to Petrarch, and referred to in our issues of 18th and 25th March, being poor. The Petrarch MSS. were put up en bloc, with a reserve of £200, but no one was prepared to offer that amount. The break up of the set was on the whole favourable for collectors, the twenty-three items being distributed among some ten or a dozen purchasers. The result also bore out an opinion we have often expressed that the sale of valuable books separately repays the vendor better than sets at a reserve price to be withdrawn if the reserve is not reached. In the case of the Petrarch MSS. the aggregate of the amounts paid for each of the volumes came to only a few shillings less than the £200 asked for them as a whole, the highest price for a single volume being £16 15s., and the lowest £2.

The following were the most important of the various fine vellum MSS. included in the sale. "Actus Apostolorum Epistolæ Canonice et Apocalypsis," 158 leaves, fol., thirteenth century, illuminated £24 10s. "Augustinus, Epistolæ," 128 leaves, fol., circa eleventh century, £32. Mehemet Averroes, "Liber de Medicina," 84 leaves, fol., thirteenth century, finely historiated and illuminated, £20 15s. Boniface VIII., "Liber Sextus Decretalium," 260 leaves, fol., thirteenth century, £37. Firdusi, "Shah Nameh," with 63 large painted miniatures, circa 1520, £41. Gregory IX., "Decretales," 316 leaves, fol., thirteenth century, £39 10s. "Psalterium Davidis," 148 leaves, quarto, fourteenth century, £27 10s. "Roman de la Rose," fol., fourteenth century, a fine old French MS., £53. Among the printed books the principal were, Petrus de Aliaco, "Ymago Mundi," fol., on vellum, circa 1483, £36. "Ars Moriendi," a rare edition, supposed to have been printed at Cologne about 1495, £26 10s. "Præclara Ferdinandi Cortesii de nova maris oceani Hyspania," fol., 1524, £59. Dante, "La Divina Commedia col commento di Christ : Landino," 1481, £34. Pius II., Papa "Breve ad capitula et præpositos Ecclesiæ Moguntinæ," 1461, the rare broadside printed by Gutenberg, £52. Xenophon, "Opera," fol., 1534, bound up in an old Grolier binding, the back and sides of which were in perfect condition, £42. Among the Books of Hours were included "Horæ Beatæ Mariæ Virginis," fourteenth century, a MS. on vellum with 38 charming miniatures within ornamental borders, £60. "Horæ Beatæ Mariæ Virginis," a fifteenth-century Flemish MS. on vellum, beautifully illuminated and in splendid condition—the finest manuscript in the whole sale, £96. The miscellaneous items included Petrus Apianus, "Inscriptiones Sacrosanctæ," &c. 1534, containing a rare woodcut copy of a map of America, of which only three other copies are known, £200. "Portolano" of the Infanta Don Enrico of Portugal, circa 1560, containing interesting charts of the sea coasts and lands of America, £70; Alberigus Vespuccius, "Mundus Novus," 1504, the rare first dated edition of the letters of Vespuccius, £102.

American Letter.

A SUBSCRIPTION THEATRE.

Mr. William Archer, the English dramatic critic, well known here for the very eminent and singularly intelligent service he has done modern plays and playing in several ways, has certainly not lost friends among us since he came to the country. His avowed mission was to study our theatre, and he seems to have been doing this in the most enlightened spirit, and with a charity which we cannot always use towards its shortcomings ourselves. Whatever he should have to say of it must have weight with us; if what he should have to say were hopeful, it ought greatly to encourage us; and a suggestion for its advantage in a recent lecture of his deserves more attention than our fickle-minded public commonly likes to give even to good will and good sense. He has found our drama, as I understand, at not such a very desperate pass; he has seen, or is said to have seen, the beginnings of hopeful things here; he has witnessed some things already accomplished by our playwrights and our players which seem not only very well, but even very good; and it is his notion (I write from a report of his lecture) that we could indefinitely better the chances of both by having a theatre supported upon private subscription, such as they have in Germany, where new plays could be tried and approved on their merits. He thinks the chances would be better for these in theatres subsidized by private subscription than in theatres subsidized by the State or city, such as they have also in Germany; but I believe he alleges, in proof, the fact that most of the best new German plays have been brought out at the subscription theatres, rather than any convincing reasons why they might not have been just as well brought out at the State or city theatres.

The fact, however, if not quite accounted for, counts for something and I should, for my part, very gladly see the experiment of a subscription theatre attempted here. Of course, a true American of the sort whose truth is to our principles rather than our interests might feel that such a theatre would not be thoroughly American. A thoroughly American theatre, in his eyes, would be one which was protected by a tariff, and which should rise spontaneously in virtue of prohibitive duties levied upon all plays of foreign origin. With such a theatre in the hands of a patriotic trust, and with a patriotic union of actors vigilant to see that no alien performers were suffered to take part in the production of our native dramas, we should have something thoroughly American. We have already the apparatus for such a theatre on one side in the theatrical syndicate which now controls nine-tenths of the playhouses throughout the country, and we have in past times had something like it on the other side in the disposition of certain actors to apply our alien labour law to the importation of foreign histrionic talent.

But as yet no theatre trust and no actors' union have met on the common ground open to them; and a subscription theatre, though not so thoroughly American, would not be so opposite to the American spirit as a State or city theatre. If it were founded by a number of rich men it would be their enterprise; it would be in the hands of a trust, and in the hands of a trust we always feel ourselves so much safer, or at least so much more at home, than we feel in our own hands, possibly because we are so much more accustomed to be there. The course from a city or a State theatre to the division of property and all the well-known horrors of socialism would be rapid and direct; while the disadvantages of a subscription theatre would be only such as we are used to in some other things. They would not occur so promptly, however, to the mind of a critic fresh from a land of more economic freedom, and it may therefore be worth while to point some of them out.

With us the rich form some such class as the nobles in other countries; and they are too new to their importance to hold it in personal contempt, as long-descended aristocrats safely may and sometimes do hold theirs; they have not yet had time to grow the pseudo-liberality which sometimes distinguished eccentric noblemen. They stand by their order more relentlessly, and their devotion to the social framework which holds them in place is vigilant and intense. In a theatre founded and controlled by them, no play criticizing or satirizing society could be favoured, and no play recognizing or representing occasional if not essential truth in regard to our industrial conditions would be permitted. To be forbidden it need not be a play celebrating a successful strike, or depicting a case of cruel exploitation, or the methods of a combine; it need only be a play calling attention to the conditions. It is not imaginable that their management would approve of such a play as Ibsen's Enemy of the People, or Die Weber of Hauptmann, or even Die Ehre of Sudermann. If Mr. Herne wrote a play dealing as frankly with life in a mining town or a factory town as his Griffith Davenport deals with life on a Virginia plantation, it could never pass the censorship of such a body of subscribers. Mr. Bernard Shaw's satire of Arms and the Man, if they felt its irony and realized its implications, could not be given twice in their subscription theatre, which would in nowise be a free theatre. No dramatist who knew American conditions and American character could write freely for a theatre sustained by the subscriptions of a limited number of rich men, unless he were of their thinking. If some dramatist who did not know our conditions and character, and were not of the subscriber's thinking, wrote freely, he would learn an interesting lesson from the fate of his play in their hands. What has happened in some of our highest institutions of learning would happen in any subscription theatre, unless the subscriptions were kept so low as to diffuse the enterprise among a number too great to be governed by the instinct of wealth.

In such a diffusion, however, there is much more than a gleam of hope for Mr. Archer's plan; a plan which says so much on its own behalf. Something like it is already in operation with respect to lectures in the literary clubs, which now mostly foster that form of entertainment. With a membership of three or four hundred, and a subscription of four or five dollars, such a club now gives itself, otherwise gratis, the pleasure of seven or eight lectures during the season, from men who speak their minds. With a subscription of twenty-five dollars they could have as many plays, from dramatists who also spoke their minds; and if the experiment were tried in ten or twenty places we should have at once a free theatre, where good work could make that appeal to the public which it can now do only on almost impossible terms. How long we should have it is another question, much involved in the temperamental impatience of our public.

CONCERNING A COUNSEL OF IMPERFECTION.

Not very long ago in the London letter of a New York paper I came upon a piece of advice to a young American author which I dissented from so wholly that I wished at once to beg that author and all other actual, or intending American authors, not to heed the mistaken instruction; and I hope there is still time to save some of them from it.

The author to whom it was addressed had written a book of short stories, such as commonly forms the luggage of American literary reputations when they cross the Atlantic; and her book had won a certain favour from English criticism. But her adviser believed that it would have won more favour if it had been more intelligible to English readers in the types of Western American religiosity which it dealt with; he said that the English did not understand and did not care for such types, and he told her that in her next book she "should aim at pleasing an English as well as an American audience."

Nothing could be more friendly than this advice, and nothing more ruinous, as I should be glad to make not only the reader, but the adviser, agree with me; for I have liked some of his work far too well not to wish him to be altogether of my mind in the matter. It appears to me that the young author in question should not only not aim at pleasing an English audience, but should not aim at pleasing even an American audience. She should aim only at pleasing herself in that clear air where the artist perceives that he has truly portrayed the life he knows, and rejoices in work well done. She may be very sure in this pleasure that she has given the very highest pleasure to her readers, and that she has imparted it to the only sort of readers worth having, in proportion to the truth of her work. It does not matter how remote the life or strange the character which she has dealt with; if she has dealt faithfully and convincingly with it, she has opened a new world to them, where if they are fit for æsthetic citizenship anywhere they promptly naturalize themselves and make themselves at home.

If English readers have not sympathy or imagination enough to enter into such a world, then all the worse for English readers. But, without professing to know them very well, I venture to think that the remoteness and the strangeness are the very qualities in American fiction that charm them, and that an American writer could not do a more fatal thing than to aim at pleasing them by portraying the wonted or the immediately intelligible things. But even if they asked this of him, and accepted him in the measure of his compliance, he ought not to comply. His affair is to be faithful to his own environment, and he ought to have no other concern. Human nature is the same in all environments, and the chief delight that an author can give the reader is the delight of discovering it the same under all the masks and disguises that novel conditions have put upon it; of finding himself, his motives, principles, passions reflected in people of a wholly different tradition and physiognomy. This perpetually fascinates and perpetually satisfies; this forms the solidarity of all the arts, and the universality of fiction, which is the highest of the arts.

It is one of the most edifying facts in the prevalence of realism, which is the supreme phase of the highest art, that it has in a manner brought all the world together through just this loyalty to environment. I find nothing unintelligible in what Verga tells me of the peasants of Sicily, or in what Björnson tells me of the peasants of Norway. When Tourguénief and Tolstoy and Dostoyevsky open the book of Russian life one reads without the least loss of meaning; Valdes and Galdós and Pardo-Bazan are never too Spanish to be perfectly good Americans, in spite of the recent war; Zola and Maupassant are rather more difficult, but the life they show does not need a glossary; Thomas Hardy has made us all dwellers in Wessex, where we do not lose a word or look or meaning of the local character. If we come to Americans, was it by seeking to please Englishmen through a choice of American phrases or types which they could easily conceive of that Artemus Ward and Mark Twain pleased Englishmen? Or Mr. Bret Harte, or Mr. James, or Uncle Remus, or Miss Wilkins, or Mr. Crane, or Harold Frederic?

When there is not an Englishman by, Americans sometimes say that the English are slow; and perhaps they do like to think some of our jokes over more than they merit. But if they are slow, they are sure; if they are not very quick, they are very constant; I have not observed that any cheap American author, of the instantly obvious sort, has made much way with them, and I have observed that such of our authors as have justly got their favour still have it. They have got it by being simply and unconsciously American, by trying to be true to the environment in which they were born and had their being. To have been purposely outlandish would have been to fall into the deplorable error of certain English authors who have imitated the American humorists; to have been naturally and unintentionally alien in those temperamental differences under which human nature is everywhere eternally the same has been their good fortune and the main factor in their success.

To be American merely is not to be any great thing. To be single in the aim to represent life as one has seen and known and felt it, that is the great thing; and that is what alone can be safely urged upon any writer, American or English. If one has done a book of short stories about American conditions because these conditions so pressed upon one's fancy that one could not very well help trying to realize them in fiction, one has done one's whole duty and highest duty by the material. Whether it is intelligible in all the terms employed to translate it into art is not the artist's affair. Its universal quality—that is to say, its most personal, special, and peculiar quality—will be sensible to the intelligent reader everywhere, in England as much as in America. This is all that the author can ask. His appeal is never to the unintelligent. He may passionately desire the unintelligent to buy his book, but he could not wish them to judge it; he cannot care whether they read it. In fact, in that recess of his soul where his art dwells, his concern is with nothing but the adequate expression of the thing which he has loved or hated so much that he must try to say it.

THE STORY OF ANCIENT CHALDEA.*

The work of the reconstruction of the history of the ancient East has made astonishing progress during the last few years. The time may not have yet come when we can study the history of Chaldea as a continuous whole, but we have at least whole chapters of its buried story restored to us, and as the work of deciphering the vast mass of material now accessible proceeds, the obscure portions grow fewer, and the story begins to assume a complete form. These important results are mainly due to the explorations conducted by M. de Sarzec at Tello, in South Babylonia, and by Dr. Peters and Mr. Haynes at Nippur on behalf of the University of Pennsylvania. The greater portion of the inscriptions obtained from these excavations are now stored in the Imperial Ottoman Museum at Constantinople, where they are freely accessible to students. Although the authorities of the British Museum have not taken any active part in the work of Babylonian explorations, they have not neglected to keep the collections up to the high standard which they have always had, and the volume of selected inscriptions which they have now issued will be welcomed by all students, not only of history, but also of the important study of the beginnings of civilization in the Tigro-Euphrates valley. The Chaldeans were essentially a race of exact recorders, even in the most trivial matters: any transaction, however small, necessitated a written record. This applied to the individual as well as the State, and thus there grew up a mass of chronicle literature, of the utmost value, in the reconstruction of the earliest chapters of history. In this respect Chaldea presents a marked contrast to the sister civilization of Egypt, especially during the early Empire, where the whole of our knowledge of historical events is derived from the funereal biographies of private individuals such as the inscriptions of Una or Herkuf of the time of the sixth dynasty. The researches I have already mentioned have given an enormous retrospective expansion to Chaldean history, and we now possess a fairly continuous series of dated documents with chronological summaries extending back to about three thousand years before the Christian era. There is then an obscure period of some eight centuries when the records once more commence with the valuable inscriptions of both royal and private individuals of the dynasty of Sargon I. of Akkad about B.C. 3800. Beyond this period we have a mass of historical literature of the most archaic character, written in a cumbrous linear script which places before us with wonderful clearness the records of the city kingdoms of South Chaldea at a period which cannot be reasonably placed later than 4000 B.C. and are probably much earlier. The seventy inscriptions here published by Mr. L. W. King relate to two periods in this long range of history. We have first a group of linear archaic texts containing records of the early rulers of Sirpurra, one of the oldest cities of Chaldea, the ruins of which were excavated by M. de Sarzec, and others belonging to the local rulers of the Kish, an ancient stronghold of warlike tribes. The second series, although not so ancient, are of the greatest value, both for history and for a knowledge of the social life of Chaldea, during the flourishing period of the second dynasty of Ur about B.C. 2500, for they are really what may best be described as the tithe rolls and accounts of the great temple of Nin Sagir of Sirpurra.

The first series commences with a fragment of the now famous monument, the Stele of the Vultures, a large portion of which is now in the Louvre. This monument is certainly at most the oldest known historical record, and its date must be considerably prior to B.C. 4000. It consists of a small stone stele covered with sculptured panels representing the wars of E-anna-du, King of Sirpurra, against the land of Gishban or "the people of the land of the Bow," a state which bordered on the frontiers of Ansan, or the pre-Elamite Kingdom. The sculptures represent the King going to battle in his chariot and followed by his troops, the battlefield with the vultures bearing away the heads of the slain, and the burial of the dead of the victorious army. The last group is extremely interesting, as aided by the fine cone of Entemena, the successor of E-anna-du, now in the Louvre, we learn that the burial of the dead beneath tumuli on the battlefield was the mode which secured immortality for the slain warrior. The fragment here published relates to the apportionment of the conquered lands, tracts being assigned to the chief gods. From the cone inscription we know that a corn tribute was imposed on the conquered land and that this corn was stored in the civic granary, an important institution similar to the larit of the Egyptians. Of great importance, though very fragmentary, are the portions of vases bearing inscriptions of Urmush, King of Kish, a monarch whom we may regard as nearly contemporary with Sargon I., King of Akkad, B.C. 3800. These inscriptions can be restored from other votive vases found at Nippur in which we have recorded the conquest of Elam and the land of Barase, a district of south-western Persia. The land of Barase is probably the region in which the inscription of Annubanini, King of the Lulubini, was found by M. de Morgan—that is at Zohab. It is important to notice that the curse which concludes the latter inscription is the same as that in the door-socket inscriptions of Sargon and does not appear to have been used at any later period. The imprecation is as follows:—

Whoever this tablet shall destroy Mullil and Samas, and Nini his foundation shall erase and sweep away his seed. The same imprecation is found at the end of the inscription of the King of Guti, that is the Goim, the warlike tribes on the east of the Tigris, now in the British Museum. From the style of the inscription and this formula, and the writing, we may probably assign these records to the East of Tigris to the period of the conquests of Sargon and his successors. The dated contracts of this monarch mention his conquest of Elam. These inscriptions, then, serve to restore to us a very early chapter in the history of Chaldea. But how much further must we look for the dawn of that civilization? Here in the fourth millennium before the Christian era we find art fully developed, statues and sculptured stelæ set up, the chariot used in war, drawn by asses, the metals silver and copper worked, weaving and the making of pottery in use, and an elaborate system of calculation extending into thousands evolved. Great as these discoveries are, they still leave us far from the dawn of this wonderful culture.

Passing now to the second series of inscriptions, we have again a mass of valuable historical matter recovered from the record chambers of a Chaldean temple. The inscriptions are beautifully written on clay tablets, some of them of considerable size, and contain the tithe lists and revenue returns of the Temple of Nin-Sugir and his consort the Goddess Bahu in the city of Sirpurra. The writing is evidently a priestly official hand; the characters are less archaic than those of the earlier inscriptions; being written on clay, they are cuneiform and not linear. The fineness and care taken in the writing may be imagined when some of the characters are found to contain as many as twelve and fifteen wedges. The historical value consists in the careful system of dating each list. The system in vogue at that period was to date the year by the most important event of the time—the capture of a city or the erection of some temple or public building. The inscriptions belong to the reigns of three Kings of the second dynasty of Ur, which commenced about B.C. 2500—namely, Ine-Sin, Bur-Sin, and Gamil-Sin. The names of the Kings are Semitic, but most of the tablets are written in the agglutinative Sumerian dialect. The inscriptions show that the power of this dynasty was not confined to Chaldea, but that raiding expeditions spread far and wide. Several tablets bear date in the year when Simuru was captured—that is, Simyra in Phœnicia—and, as in another inscription, it is associated with the important date "the daughter of the King the lordship of Markhasi held." Markhasi being identified with Marash, by Sayce and Hommel, it is evident that the rule extended over North Syria. Other dates are the conquest of Ansan—the pre-Elamite Kingdom on the plain of Mal Amir, and of Lulubu in Luristan. Most of the non-military dates refer to the building of temples, but one date is curious—"the year when the great stele was set up"—no doubt some special royal record. In the museum at Constantinople are lists of these dates arranged in chronological order so that each of these documents can be fairly well assigned its approximate date.

Students of ancient religions will find these inscriptions extremely valuable for the list of festivals and the offerings made, especially those of the deified King Dungi, who seems to have had an elaborate cultus under this dynasty. The calendar is a remarkable and interesting one, being partly agricultural commencing with a spring month called "the month when the corn raises its head," like the Hebrew Abib, and partly religious, containing months named after the festivals of the divinities Bau, and Dunsivor Tammuz, and the deified King Dungi. The tithe lists and catalogues of offerings are extremely difficult to decipher, but sufficient can be read to show the great wealth of the temples. We have here lists of cattle, sheep, goats, and asses brought to the temple, of dues of corn and wine, oil, dates, vegetables, of wool, wood, and even silver and copper, which convey a wonderful idea of the flourishing state of the country at this time. The publication of these inscriptions by the Museum will be of great benefit to students, and especial credit is due to them for placing so reasonable a price upon this scientific publication. A word of praise must be given to Mr. King for the painstaking and careful way in which he has reproduced the complicated and difficult characters in which the majority of the texts are written.

FICTION.

Well, After All— By F. Frankfort Moore. 7½ × 5¼ in., 362 pp. London, 1899. Hutchinson. 6/-

The title of Mr. Frankfort Moore's latest novel affords a curious example of the extravagance into which a persistent jester will sometimes allow himself to be led. With a grave face the author hands his book to the public, but there is a twinkle in his eye; he wishes them to notice the unconventionality of his choice—he had always a pleasant wit in nomenclature—and, perhaps, in the kindness of his heart, he hopes to afford the paragraphist material for a verbal joke or two. It is in the nature of an experiment. Mr. Moore knows the weakness of humanity as well as any man; it is possible that he wants to see how many will treat him seriously, how many will try to extract a witticism from so favourable an opening, and how many solemn fellows will display annoyance at his flippancy. In his next book, or in his next but one, the result of his observation will be crystallized in a sentence. It is these little sub-acid reflections that give their distinctive tone to his writings.

Mr. Frankfort Moore is a very capable novelist. The plot of his present story has all the elements necessary to a popular success. It is mixed very adroitly, as a cunning cook prepares a sauce, but the ingredient that gives the flavour is slyness. The redoubtable Major Bagstock was not more sly than is Mr. Frankfort Moore. It is really marvellous to notice how many of his paragraphs carry a half-concealed sting, not unduly venomous, but sufficient to arouse the reader's interest should it be inclined to flag. There are sly hits at many types of mankind—at the explorer, at the publisher and the interviewer who wishes to exploit him, and at the public who shower invitations upon him. Labourd satire is never much to the public taste, but the public can appreciate some, at least, of these shafts; and even the least observant of readers will leave this book with the agreeable conviction that he has been clever enough to catch the point of many smart strokes. The best writing in the world would not produce so happy an effect. And the book is quite sufficiently well written. The dialogue, like all Mr. Moore's dialogue, is bright and clever and plentiful—there is barely a line of unnecessary description or moralizing; the story is well constructed, and the solution more than commonly ingenious. Character-drawing is not the author's strong point, but the general reader can do without subtle psychology, and the characters are, at any rate, real enough to interest. The book is not one of Mr. Moore's best, but it will serve—for a single reading—as well as another.

A MILLIONAIRE'S DAUGHTER, by Percy White (Pearson, 6s.), is a delightful book, which even the most exacting may enjoy. For it is brisk, it is bright, it has no longeurs, and the characters are real, human, flesh and blood people. Every one in the story is a person whom you might easily have known, and in most cases a person whom you would like to know, and the dialogue is always amusing.

In COUSIN IVO, by Mrs. Andrew Dean (Black, 6s.), we have a veritable purple patch amidst the grey waste of minor novels.

The book can be warmly praised. Bright, light, witty in style, you are carried through its pages with unflagging zest from the first line to the last. The scene is laid in a German castle, and the conversations have a flavour of the "Dolly Dialogues."

A story whose chief ingredients are sugar and water, but which makes pleasant reading enough, is MARY UNWIN, by Alan St. Aubyn (Chatto and Windus, 6s.). Geoffrey Collet is the hero, and to avoid the shameful necessity of earning his own living, he becomes engaged to an heiress. Opportunely, however, the heiress changes her mind, and Geoffrey returns to Mollie Unwin, the poor rector's daughter, whom he has previously wooed unsuccessfully. At the right moment the usual rich relative dies, leaving his fortune to Mollie. There is about this book not a little naive immorality—of a perfectly conventional moral order—which is rather amusing. It is a simple, straightforward tale, with the love interest well sustained.

"Dolf Wyllarde" once wrote a story of child-life, "A Lonely Little Lady," which met with considerable success, and there is a touch of the same charm about THE GUARDIANS OF PANZY (Hutchinson, 6s.). Panzy herself is delightful; her conversation (and there is plenty of it) is always fresh and amusing; and if the book is a success it will be entirely owing to the efforts of this small lady. For it must be confessed that the plot is a very makeshift concern. The incident of Mrs. Hamilton's supposed suicide is as wild a bit of improbable coincidence as has ever been conceived, even by a lady novelist, and the latter half of the story by no means comes up to the introduction. Still it is worth reading, if not altogether so well done as its predecessor.

In Miss Anne D. Sedgwick's THE CONFOUNDING OF CAMILLA (Heinemann, 6s.) there is at least that indefinable virtue called distinction. It is the carefully conscientious work of a cultivated writer who knows her milieu and her characters. It is also composed in polished and melodious English, and cannot very well be skimmed because every sentence is in its particular place for a particular purpose. Yet, on the whole, it is a book more likely to be admired than enjoyed. There is a want of movement—a tendency to linger over the unessential—which leaves the impression that fiction is not the author's proper medium. She writes with rare and admirable restraint, and with an uncommon insight into the secret workings of the human heart; but she fails to be graphic, and, in a novel, to fail to be graphic is to fail in the one thing needful for popularity. If it were our province to advise, we should counsel Miss Sedgwick to try history, being careful to choose a theme that compelled her to be graphic, and supplied her with those dramatic situations which she does not easily invent. Then, as she has a nervous prose style rarely attained by women, she would, we are confident, do very good work indeed.

Those who care for Somersetshire and know Sedgemoor, the Mendips, and the Cheddar Cliffs will delight in Mr. Walter Raymond's latest book, TWO MEN O' MENDIP (Longmans, 6s.), for here they can, as it were, "put back the universe" and see life as it was in those parts at the beginning of the century. There were wild doings then; sheep-stealing was a capital offence and the "groovers," as the miners were called, lived lives that were often touched to pathetic issues. Mr. Raymond, who tells his story in the dialect of the neighbourhood, gives a vivid picture of the country folk, their struggles, sadness, victories, and regrets. Patty Winterhead, the heroine, and her lover, Giles Standerwick, are doomed to tragic courses. Giles' father has been hanged for sheep-stealing; the son takes vengeance—on the eye-for-an-eye principle—and murders the man who caused his father's death. Patty's father knows of this affair, but does not know that Patty is secretly married to Giles. Surprising the two at a meeting he decides that he must kill Giles, and thus the cycle of death is completed. Mr. Raymond betrays a fine feeling for the atmosphere of the country and for the indifference of nature to human tragedy. His last book will add to the already considerable reputation of the author of "Love and Quiet Life" and "Tryphena in Love."

It is common enough to find a novel in which the hero plays a comparatively unimportant part, but it is something rare to see a secondary character usurping the place of honour on the title-page. In DAVID HARUM (Pearson, 6s.) Mr. E. Noyes Westcott appears to have allowed the good-natured banker and horse-trader, with his no less eccentric sister Mrs. Bixbee, to monopolize most of the reader's interest without quite realizing what he was doing. Then, discovering that his hero was hopelessly outclassed, the author made the best of a bad business by handing over the title rôle to his favourite. Mr. Harum is worth this slight attention. He is one of those hard-headed, humorous Yankees whose quaint turns of conversation and racy dialect preserve so many second-rate American novels from total dullness. The book is curiously constructed. It is not until the twelfth chapter that John Lenox, the young man whose love-story gives, ostensibly, the motive of the novel, meets Harum, who is to become his employer and benefactor. From that point until nearly the end of the book the author occupies himself in narrating a series of anecdotes serving, in a desultory fashion, to illustrate the characters of the two men. The book reads somewhat jerkily at first; but it is bright and amusing throughout, and the characters are unmistakably alive. On the whole, an engaging specimen of current transatlantic fiction.

The extinction of the drones would be, no doubt, the sentence passed upon them by a severe Socialist. In THE DRONES MUST DIE, by Max Nordau (Heinemann, 6s.), however, there is no Socialism, and the so-called drones, though they die punctually enough by their own hands, lead the agitating and far from tranquil lives of financiers and speculators. A poverty-stricken old philosopher is contrasted with these wealthy sinners, but, as he dies in the middle of the book and is rather a drudge than a drone, one hardly knows what to make of him. In short, the sermon is so little relevant to the text that it is difficult to see what moral can be drawn from it. The scene is laid in Paris, and the story is chiefly concerned with the fortunes of a German family settled there. The very unheroic hero is Herr Koppel, a master in a French school, who supports his wife and son and daughter with considerable difficulty. Fired by the example of his friend and compatriot, Baron Henneburg, who has become a sort of mushroom millionaire by lucky speculations on the Bourse, Koppel is induced to speculate, unknown to his wife, and first wins and then loses a large sum of money. When the crash comes, on the failure of a corner in quicksilver, Henneburg and Agostini, the other eminent financier, are ruined and kill themselves. Koppel, on the other hand, merely loses his ill-gotten gains, and is compensated by his daughter's rich marriage to a German military attaché. The other chief personage is Baroness Agostini, a good-natured lady with a history, of course of her decline and fall. She does not die, but retires in the odour of sanctity to her country house in Brittany.

We must say that in all this there is no poetic justice. It may be quite right for financiers to commit suicide, though we should think twice before condemning the whole financial world to that fate; but it cannot be right for Koppel, who has no business to gamble or to encroach on his wife's fortune, to escape unscathed. He is only a poor little earthen pot, who ought never to have risked his place and his family's daily bread by adventuring among the pots of iron. Yet he neither dies nor is ruined, nor does his far too amiable wife even give him a piece of her mind. Whatever may be said of the drones, he at least does not get his deserts. On the whole, the story is interesting and well told, but without humour.

THE TRACKING OF THE CRIMINAL.

The large class of readers which dearly loves a sensational tale beginning with a murder and ending with the marriage of the wrongly-suspected and self-sacrificing hero is not over critical. Such readers will probably not resent the unnecessary pains which James Graham in Mr. McLaren Cobban's new story, PURSUED BY THE LAW (Long, 6s.), took in order to bring himself within reach of the law. For, once there, he and his friend Townshend, a mysterious burglarious Marquis of pleasing character, lead the law that pursues them a pretty dance until the confession and suicide of the real criminal clears the way for the marriage of the hero and his retirement into a more peaceful life.

For those who enjoy a murder mystery, with suspicion falling upon an innocent young man, verbatim reports of the coroner's inquest, and long extracts from the diary of the detective officer who finally brings justice about, Mr. B. L. Farjeon has catered magnificently in SAMUEL BOYD OF CATCHPOLE SQUARE (Hutchinson, 6s.). Nothing could be better of its kind; and those who like the kind will be well pleased to find it set forth in the style made familiar by Dickens.

FRANCOIS THE VALET (Pearson, 6s.), by Mr. G. W. Appleton, is an exciting story of mystery and crime written in a style fairly direct and simple. In the names of his places, such as Windwhistle Hall and Addlehead, Mr. Appleton shows a feeling for the idea of fun which flourished in the 'fifties.

FETTERED BY FATE, by G. W. Miller (Digby, Long, 6s.), is a tale of murderers and wrongly imprisoned victims with their hair-breadth escapes. The style is flabby to a degree. We give one typical extract, solely in order to show young novelists what to avoid.

For some time a disagreeable drizzling rain had been descending with a persistency which would, in all probability, have been accounted a virtue had it been exercised in the Sahara, but occurring as it did in the congested and crowded streets in the heart of the metropolis, added in no small degree to the annoyance of those who, through force of circumstances, were compelled to brave the elements, and pursue their way through the muddy streets and crooked bye-lanes, and, as if to accentuate the prevailing gloom, a thick, yellow fog, with the odorous flavour peculiar to this phenomena of Cockney extraction (sic), was beginning to settle with its grimy folds over the belated wayfarers, sprinkling them with sundry distributions of black particles stolen from sooty-laden wreaths emanating from the numerous chimneys above.

Why not say "The day was foggy, with steady rain?"

Mr. Hornung's books have always been readable from the time of "A Bride from the Bush" down to "Some Persons Unknown," and his newest novel, THE AMATEUR CRACKSMAN, (Methuen, 6s.), is like all his work in this respect, that it interests from the opening page to the last. Some readers may consider it something of a slander upon our national sport to make a famous English cricketer possess a taste for quiet burglaries like the hero, A. J. Raffles, one of the "Gentlemen of England," "who had the subtle power of making himself irresistible at will." And it says a good deal for the author's skill that he makes it appear a quite possible and indeed likely form of existence. Raffles drags an old schoolfellow of his into his schemes, and these two together indulge in every kind of adventure by which "swag" is to be gained. "The Gift of the Emperor," a pearl of great value, is their last temptation and it is in pursuit of it they are discovered and their wild careers closed, at least for a time. With the wise precaution which comes to the novelist who is already an old hand, Mr. Hornung leaves the reader in doubt as to the end of the hero. Raffles when at last "cornered" on board ship plunges into the sea and, should the demand for his adventures be very clamorous, we should not be surprised to find that he is saved and is good for another volume or two of equally exciting adventures.

MICHAEL DRED, DETECTIVE (Grant Richards, 3s. 6d.), is replete with murders, first clues, complications, misapprehensions, subtle Eastern poisons, and other weird paraphernalia familiar to the admirers of detective romance. But Michael Dred is no ordinary detective. True, he has the old grand manner and says to the hero who has returned from a voyage:—

"I see you came round by the Cape."

Paul Wingrove started.

"How could you know that?" he cried.

"By the ring on your finger," calmly answered the detective. "It is a new one, and those native-worked rings only come from the West Coast. You probably took in coal at Freetown, Sierra Leone."

"We stopped there by a mere chance," said Paul. "The ring was given me there."

He felt a sudden shrinking from the man whose insight gave him this power.

The reader will feel no such shrinking from an old friend. It is also true that where this hero is remarkable is in the fact that he is also the villain and makes a complete hash of his own life which he ends with the aid of an opal pin. The book has an excellent and striking cover, and the most melodramatic of the scenes are boldly illustrated; it is likely to be widely popular with those who care more for plot than for style.

Correspondence.

"THE OLD CURIOSITY SHOP."

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—In the recently published volume of "Letters of Walter Savage Landor," edited by Mr. Stephen Wheeler, I find the following passage from Lady Graves-Sawle's diary on p. 52:—

June, 1838.—We found Charles Dickens in the little enclosure at the back of his house, Tavistock-house, Tavistock-square. Lying flat on the grass, he gazed up for inspiration to the only tree in the little garden. He was then writing the "Curiosity Shop," and told us he had received letters from all parts of the world imploring him not to kill Nell.

This "diary" entry must surely have been written long after the incident it describes occurred. In June, 1838, Charles Dickens was living in Doughty-street; the first idea of little Nell, out of which the "Old Curiosity Shop" developed, occurred to the author when visiting Landor at Bath in February, 1840; Charles Dickens did not move into Tavistock-house until late in 1861, rather more than ten years after the perpetration of what he himself called the Nellicide of the "Old Curiosity Shop."

Perhaps Lady Graves-Sawle or Mr. Stephen Wheeler may be able to explain this passage?

Yours faithfully,

April 17.

WALTER JERROLD.

SHAKESPEARE'S "TEMPEST."

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—In answer to the wish expressed by Mr. W. G. Gosling in his very interesting article on the Tempest in your issues of April 8 and 15 to know the spelling of the word "scamels" in the Folio of 1623 I may say that the word there has only one l. The reading "seamews" is not altogether new, having been suggested by Theobald, but in the light thrown on the subject by the quotations adduced by Mr. Gosling, it appears to be by far the most reasonable emendation yet advanced. I think Caliban's speech, Act I., ii., 333,

"When thou camest first,
Thou strok'dest me, and mad'st much of me; would'st give me Water with berries in't;"

may be of use in fixing the date of the play. It is generally conceded that this is an allusion to the use of coffee, a beverage at that time unknown in Europe, and first mentioned, I believe, by George Sandys in his travels published in 1615. The exact date of Sandys' return is uncertain. Antony Wood says "1612 or after."

Strachey's account of the wreck was published in 1612, and if Sandys returned in that year, Shakespeare may have heard of coffee from some of the sailors who returned with him: according to Lord Mulgrave he must have been intimate with seafaring men. In the Introduction to the Clarendon Press Edition we read:—

The first scene in the Tempest is a very striking instance of the great accuracy of Shakespeare's knowledge in a professional science, the most difficult to attain without the help of experience. He must have acquired it by conversation with some of the most skilful seamen of that time.

That statement that this play was acted before "Prince Charles, the Lady Elizabeth, and the Prince Palatine" seems to rest on very insufficient evidence: but there can be little doubt that Jonson alludes to it in the introduction to his Bartholomew Fair (1614), though whether the play then acted was in all points the same as when first printed is doubtful, since Othello, first printed in 1622, is found considerably altered and amended in that mystery of mysteries, the Folio of 1623.

Authors and Publishers.

Cromwell literature is increasing in view of the centenary of the Protector's death on the 25th inst. Mr. Spenser Wilkinson's new book, "Cromwell to Wellington," of course, deals with him as a commander only. But Mr. Holden Pike and Sir Richard Tangye have just given us lives of him, and Mr. Allenson will depict him as the champion of the Independents in a book to be issued on "Cromwell Day," called "A Primer of Free Church History." The volume is intended as an introduction to the history of the Free Churches.

The centenary of the Church Missionary Society was not allowed to arrive before the history of the Society's hundred years was published. The London Missionary Society, on the other hand, had its hundredth birthday four years ago, yet its centenary record is only now on the eve of publication. This Society, which, though unsectarian, is maintained almost wholly by the Congregationalists, has had many great names on its roll—John Williams, Robert Moffat, David Livingstone, and Dr. Morrison, for example—and the doings of these and their colleagues in Africa, in Madagascar, in Samoa, and other South Sea Islands, in China and India, and in the West Indies certainly deserve to be gathered together from the scattered memoirs of individual missionaries and the unpublished archives at the Blomfield Street Mission House. The Rev. C. Silvester Horne, of Kensington, brought out a lively little book, summarizing the acts of the Society's apostles, a few years ago; but it was left for the Rev. Richard Lovett, one of the Religious Tract Society's literary managers, to compile the large two-volume history on which the Blomfield Street directors had resolved. The book is being printed at the Oxford University Press, and will be illustrated with numerous portraits and maps; and it will be issued by Mr. Henry Frowde about the 10th of May in two editions,—"ordinary," at 17s. 6d., and "de luxe," at 25s., with higher prices to non-subscribers.

Mr. Harold E. Gorst, son of Sir John Gorst, is at present engaged on a biography of Lord Beaconsfield for Blackie's "Victorian Era Series." Sir John Gorst was intimate with Disraeli from 1870 to his death. Some interesting information will be contained in this volume as to the defeat of the Conservatives in 1880.

Mr. Murray announces a biography of Henry Hart Milman, sometime Dean of St. Paul's, by his son, Mr. A. Milman. Though the Dean is best known for his history of Latin Christianity, his "History of St. Paul's" might well be consulted at the present moment by those anxious to learn more about the work of Wren. As a poet—in the main a forgotten one—Dean Milman will be remembered as the author of three of the most beautiful of our English hymns—"When our heads are bowed with woe," "Brother, thou art gone before us," and "Ride on, Ride on, in Majesty."

"Nelson's Friendships," by Mrs. Gamlin, authoress of "Emma, Lady Hamilton," and "George Romney," is announced by Messrs. Hutchinson. The subject is well chosen, for Nelson, though somewhat averse from general society, had all the qualifications of a sterling friend. His affectionate and grateful nature evinces itself in his letters to his family and to his early patrons, Captain Locker, Sir Peter Parker, Lord Hood, and the Duke of Clarence. He is the ideal comrade of his companions in battle, Earl St. Vincent, Troubridge, Ball, Berry, Hardy, Collingwood, and many others. His power of political friendships was equally remarkable. It is this which bound him so closely to Lord Minto, and produced his intimacy with Pitt, who gradually came to see in Nelson, beneath the rough exterior of the seaman, the subtle skill of the statesman in foreign affairs. The same communion of political ideas was at the bottom of the famous friendship between Nelson and the Hamiltons, and, however extraordinary the intercourse of these tria juncta in uno may now seem, what would one have given to have spent an unconventional hour in their company! As it is, we must now content ourselves with looking forward to the descriptions of Nelson's friendships in Mrs. Gamlin's book. We hope at the same time that she will have done justice to the deeply-wronged Lady Nelson, for whose memory, vindicated by her own letters, we may claim to have done something in our articles, published last year, on "New Nelson Manuscripts."

Shakespeare's Sonnets have always afforded excellent practice for the exponents of the "higher critics" of secular literature. Mr. Cuming Walters, quite in the spirit of the most advanced Old Testament commentators, undertakes to prove in "The Mystery of Shakespeare's Sonnets," which will shortly be republished in volume form by the New Century Press, that the "fair man" and the "dark lady" are allegorical and represent the "contending spirits" who influenced Shakespeare's career and reveal themselves in the dramas; and that the theory is wholly groundless which connects the Sonnets in any way with the Earl of Pembroke, Mary Fytton, or Lord Southampton. The articles which form the book have already appeared in the New Century Review.

The vogue for books about public schools still continues. Yet another book about Eton—"Memories of Eton and Etonians," by Mr. Alfred Lubbock—is announced by Mr. Murray. A part of the book will give reminiscences of the author's life at Eton, but special interest will be attached to the chapters on cricket, which are not confined to his schooldays, but carry us on from 1864 to 1874. Mr. Alfred Lubbock was, of course, one of the best-known gentlemen cricketers of his day. An interesting feature of the book will be a chapter on "Boys' Chances" at Eton, by the late Mr. Robin Lubbock, who, it will be remembered, met his death out hunting last year. Harrovians will find matter for study in the first part of a book to be issued by the same publisher, called "At School and at Sea." The author is anonymous, and describes himself as a naval officer, and his life after his schooldays gives scope for memoirs of sea life in the forties and fifties.

Books on Imperial affairs, the expansion of England, and the like, have been very numerous of late. We have had the Builders of the Empire Series, the Story of the Empire Series, and others. Now we are to have the Imperial Interest Series, published by Messrs. Sands, under the editorship of Mr. Hamish Hendry. The first volume will deal with China. Its author is Mr. Harold Gorst, whom we have just mentioned as engaged on a Life of Lord Beaconsfield. It deals comprehensively with the subject, not only from the point of view of British Imperialism, but taking into consideration the opinions of the Chinese—which have been hitherto somewhat overlooked. The book contains a sketch of China's resources, a short summary of her history, and a description of the political, commercial, and social aspects of the country. There are chapters on the Chinese army, on financial resources of the Empire, on Western progress in China, and on railways. That on West Africa will almost certainly be by Miss Kingsley. Mr. Gorst is very shortly going to China to explore a more or less unknown district, and intends to write a book on the commercial prospects of that part of the country, its trade and guilds, and the feeling of the official classes towards foreigners.

"Yule and Christmas, their place in the Germanic Year," is the title of a book announced by Mr. David Nutt. Its author is Dr. Alexander Tille, lecturer in German language and literature in the University of Glasgow, and it treats of the problems connected with the Germanic year—the three-score-day tide of Yule, the Germanic adoption of the Roman calendar, and the introduction of the festival of Christ's Nativity into a part of the Germanic year, which previously apparently had been without a festivity. In fifteen chapters it traces the revolution brought about by these events, as regards custom, belief, and legend, up to the fourteenth century. By that time, the author believes, most of the fundamental features which go towards the making of modern Christmas had already come to have their centre on the twenty-fifth day of December.

Two collections of academic sermons representing Oxford and Cambridge thought respectively will shortly be forthcoming. The third volume of Mr. Jowett's sermons, those dealing with doctrinal matters, will shortly be published by Mr. Murray, who is also issuing a volume of letters by the late Master of Balliol. This collection, which is being edited by Professor Lewis Campbell and Mr. Evelyn Abbott, will contain a portrait of the Master. About the same time we shall see Dr. Montagu Butler's new volume of sermons, which will contain those delivered by him at Eton, Harrow, Marlborough, Rugby, and other public schools. The Master of Trinity's volume will be published by Messrs. Isbister under the title "Public School Sermons."

We understand that Dr. Moritz Busch's recollections of Prince Bismarck has now found a publisher in Germany, and that the three volumes of the work will appear during the coming summer under the title "Tagebuchblätter von Moriz Busch." This will not be a retranslation of the English work, but the original work from which the English translation was made, and will, it is said, include certain matter not included in the published book. Another Bismarck book, shortly to be published in six parts, is a collection of the Prince's sayings arranged in dictionary form, with short explanations stating whence they are taken and so forth. The volume will be called "Bismarck-Lexicon."

Mr. Murray's spring list of forthcoming books contains some announcements worth noticing, besides those we have already mentioned. In the new edition of Byron, Volume II. in the collection of Poetry under the charge of Mr. Ernest Hartley Coleridge, will contain "Childe Harold." Mr. R. E. Prothero, who has the Letters in charge, will issue Volume III., including the correspondence from 1814 to 1816. In the question of our relations with the wild tribes on the North-West Frontier of India it would be difficult to find a better guide than Colonel Sir Robert Warburton, who is issuing his personal reminiscences of "Eighteen Years in the Khyber." "The Place of Miracles in Religion" is by the Bishop of Southampton, who was a contributor to "Lux Mundi," and was tutor at Keble College, Oxford, and afterwards Master of Selwyn College before he became a Bishop. "Authority and Archæology, Sacred and Profane," under Mr. Hogarth's editorship, a book to which we have already referred, is also nearly ready.

"The Forest Chapel and Other Poems" is to be the title of a new volume of poems by "Maxwell Gray" (Miss Tuttielt) which Mr. Heinemann has ready. The author of "The Silence of Dean Maitland" has already published some volumes of verse, including "Westminster Chimes and Other Poems" and "Lays of the Dragon Slayer."

Mr. W. B. Yeats, Mr. John Eglington, and other writers on Celtic matters are furnishing forth a volume called "The Literary Ideal in Ireland," which Mr. Fisher Unwin will publish. This, we may hope, will be to some extent complementary to Dr. Douglas Hyde's new "History of Irish Literature" which we review on another page.

Mr. Arthur H. Lawrence has written a volume dealing with Sir Arthur Sullivan's recollections of musical matters. The composer of the Gilbert-Sullivan operas has known all the interesting people of the musical world, and the book will give a picture of our period such as few other public men could suggest. Mr. James Bowden will publish the book this summer.

The second volume of Messrs. T. and T. Clark's new Bible Dictionary, edited by Dr. Hastings, is to be published next week. It extends from "Feign" to "Kinsman," and includes the three most important subjects—"God," by Prof. A. B. Davidson and Prof. Sanday; "Jesus Christ," by Prof. Sanday; "The Holy Spirit," by Prof. Swete.

Mr. Fisher Unwin publishes next Monday a work in two volumes by Dr. J. C. Voigt, called "Fifty Years of the History of the Republic in South Africa." The author has had great experience in the Cape Colony Volunteer Ambulance Service in the Transvaal in 1881.

Among forthcoming works of fiction, we understand that Mrs. E. M. Davy, the author of "A Prince of Como," "A Daughter of the Earth," and other novels, is about to publish a new book through Messrs. Pearson entitled "Calumnies." "Frivolities" is the title of Mr. Richard Marsh's new volume of humorous stories which Mr. James Bowden is about to publish. Mr. William Westall's new book, which is to be published by Messrs. Chatto, called "Strange Crimes," will contain a collection of short stories. The author of "Beggars All," "A Dozen Ways of Love," and other successful novels, Miss Lily Dougall, is at work upon a novel the scene of which is laid in the North Carolina Mountains. Miss Dougall, who lives in Montreal, is about to visit England for six months, and will spend most of the summer term in Oxford.

Mr. Percy Fitzgerald promises a volume called "Pickwickian Studies," which will be published by the New Century Press.

Mr. Max Beerbohm's new collection of papers is to be entitled "More." His last volume was called "The Works of Max Beerbohm." Mr. Lane is the publisher.

Messrs. Newnes are publishing "The British Empire Dictionary," for which they claim that it is handy in size and comprises many new words which have recently gained currency but do not appear in existing dictionaries. It is to be published at 3s. 6d.

A further biographical sketch of the late Empress of Austria is being got ready for the press; it is to be entitled "The Martyrdom of an Empress," and is said to be written by a lady who was at one time an intimate friend of the Empress.

The May number of the Art Journal will contain an article on the Turner Exhibition, with reproductions of some of the works now being shown there.

Dr. W. G. Grace's "Reminiscences of Cricket and other Sports" will be published by Mr. James Bowden.

The popular edition of the works of Dr. Georg Brandes, which we referred to last week, will be issued in England by Messrs. Williams and Norgate.

A work on Mr. Joseph Chamberlain will shortly be published in Paris; it is written by M. A. Viallate.

"Impressions of America," by the Rev. T. C. Porter, one of the masters of Eton, is about to be published, with many illustrations, by Messrs. Pearson.

Colonel Claude Reignier Conder's new work, "The Hebrew Tragedy," is about to be published by Messrs. Blackwood.

Next month Mr. Rowland Ward will publish Mr. F. Vaughan Kirley's volume on sport and travel in Portuguese East Africa.

A work on "Church and State in England and Normandy in the Eleventh and Twelfth Centuries," by Dr. H. Böhmer, tutor in the University of Leipzig, is in the press.

Mr. J. Dyneley-Prinsep's volume, "A Critical Commentary on the Book of Daniel," will be published in England by Messrs. Williams and Norgate. The author is Professor of Semitic Languages in the New York University.

Messrs. Newnes have included the pulpit stories by Mr. Charles M. Sheldon in "The Penny Library of Famous Books." Other publications by this firm include Mr. J. G. Bartholomew's "The Hub Cyling Map of England and Wales" and Mr. Milton Smith's "The Coast Trips of Great Britain," which is said to be the only guide to the sea trips of the British coast.

RARITIES OF LITERATURE.

It sounds like a paradox to say that there are several kinds of books that are really and truly rare, although innumerable copies of them are extant. They do not figure at Mr. Sotheby's auction rooms, or among Mr. Quaritch's treasures. Any of them may be bought for a few shillings; they are rare only from the unimportant point of view of the reader. The more one reads, the more one is impressed with the sense of their rarity, that is, with their exceptional qualities. The first edition of "Alice in Wonderland," which was sold for £8 at a recent auction of books, is rare. But, in another sense, the latest edition, which has been selling at the bookstalls for sixpence, is equally rare. For in the literary, as in the physical, world there is a general average, as even an uncritical reader can hardly fail to notice. Whether this general average results from the public taste, or is maintained by the notorious hardness of heart of the publishers, we need not inquire. It exists, and books that are conspicuously above or below the average standard of merit are rare.

Among rare books, then, may be reckoned those which so far exceed the standard as to be readable throughout; not such works as the reviewer cautiously pronounces to be "fairly readable," but books that can be read with pleasure from beginning to end. It is very much a matter of taste, but most people will admit that there are few books of this kind. One thinks at once of one's favourite novels, but it will often be found that we remember only the super-excellent scenes of which we are never tired, and forget the duller parts, or endure them only for the sake of the rest. For instance, Dickens' worst novels always contain something memorable, while his best always include passages that one instinctively skips. Even in "Pickwick" there is the old clergyman's manuscript, which, for purposes either of pleasure or examination, may be disregarded—like certain satires of Juvenal, though not for the same reason. In the case of Thackeray, again, are not some of his later works justly considered a little long? And Scott—Scott has been said to have more longueurs than all the other immortals. If we mention these writers, it is only to show that even the greatest men are not exempt from the common failing. Yet, if we wish to find a work that is enjoyable throughout, it is among the books of great writers that we shall find it, if at all. The crowd of new novels, several of which seem to be published every day, will yield no prizes, except now and then, when some new genius, who may or may not be completely readable, makes his first bow to the world.

But, if we confine ourselves to the immortals, we may suggest, with a liberal allowance for difference of taste and opinion, that there are three novels of English life and manners that would be generally thought readable from cover to cover. Thackeray's "Esmond" is one of them, a book only half the length of his other novels, and consequently—seeing that Thackeray was a great artist—a complete and polished literary gem. Another, though Scott in these days has lost his wizardry, is "Waverley." It may be admitted at once that in "Waverley" the young may skip whole pages without much injury to the story. Every one has probably done so as a boy. The opening chapters in particular, and the full descriptions of Tully Veolan and of Scotch scenery, lend themselves easily to such treatment. But in after life, if one cares at all for the past, is there anything better than Scott's accurate drawings of Waverley Honour and the Scottish Manor House? Even the Notes are worth reading. There is hardly a dull line in any of them. Our third instance is Miss Austen's "Mansfield Park," the whole of which every schoolboy will skip and every grown man will admire. If we do not name a fourth, it is not because we have never heard of "Adam Bede," but because it is impossible to distinguish between "the nicely calculated less or more" in our literary pleasures. In any case, our collection of these particular rarities cannot occupy more than one shelf of the book-case.

Another class of rare books consists of those that are not readable at all. Whether a long course of miscellaneous reading produces in the mind what is known in medicine as the tolerance of a drug, we do not know; it depends too much on temperament and idiosyncrasy. All the same, it is a fact that there are few books indeed, no matter how dull or how foolish, which contain absolutely nothing readable. The dullest novel may be illuminated by one good story or one happy thought. The most foolish work of any kind may be rendered momentarily amusing by some odd revelation of the author's character. A year or two ago there was published a book which, except among the author's personal friends, must have already become exceedingly scarce. It is the nucleus of this part of our collection, and it truly fulfils the condition required of being quite unreadable from first to last. It is enough to describe it as a poem of many thousand lines about nothing in particular, and in no particular metre. But even this enormous work possesses a certain morbid interest. One wonders as to the author. Did he write under his own name or under a pseudonym? How many years did he waste over his book? How did he find a publisher? And, to parody Captain John Bliffl's epitaph, had Colney Hatch the honour of his birth and Hanwell of his education? One is evidently face to face with a person of mysterious intellectual qualities, and with one of the strangest and rarest books imaginable. Nor does this curious work stand alone. A bad novel, as we have admitted, may possess some slight redeeming feature, but one sometimes comes across novels for which not even that can be said. They are productions of the present day, of course; for the feeblest old-fashioned novel, if only in virtue of its antiquity, is worth looking at. Two or three of these moderns may be added to our collection of rare books, and there are more to come, seeing that the writers are still comparatively young men, with what they would call a future before them. They have ascertained exactly "what Dulness and her sons admire," and have written accordingly.

But there are certain other rare books that are not comprised in either of these two divisions. Successful sequels are rare, and so are successful imitations. The second part of "Pilgrim's Progress" is inferior to the first; it would have been better for Bunyan if Christian had been a bachelor. "The Virginians" is only in a sense the sequel to "Esmond," but it will hardly be thought so perfect. "Tom Brown at Oxford," to take instances at random, does not worthily continue "Tom Brown's Schooldays." Trollope was more fortunate with "Barchester Towers," the sequel to "The Warden," and, in some respects, superior to it. But perhaps the most surprising example is afforded by Lewis Carroll, whose humour, so far from being exhausted by his first famous work, was capable of an equally charming, and an equally popular, sequel. The successful imitations of great books—for almost every great book has been imitated—are fewer still; so few, in fact, that, while we would not deny the existence of these rarest of rare books, we must leave it to others to discover them. Meanwhile, Addison and Steele may rest undisturbed by their so-called successors; Cervantes may ignore both the Female and the Spiritual Quixote; Defoe may disown his illegitimate Swiss Family. Genius is not easily imitated.

Finally, there is a class of rare books that ought not to be rare at all—namely, books that are well illustrated. We are not speaking of sumptuous volumes in which a lavish display of art extinguishes the subordinate letter-press, but of well known English books which some of our best artists have failed, in any real sense of the word, to illustrate. There are exceptions, no doubt, but as a rule the artist does not do justice either to his subject or to himself. What is wanted, but is too seldom met with, is an artist who will help the reader to realize the characters, and will carefully refrain from giving his own version of incidents which the writer, as likely as not, has described differently. But unless the artist understands and sympathizes with the author, well illustrated cheap books will be rare. Best of all may be the illustrations of the author himself, but the successful examples of this supremely rare combination of author and artist may be counted on the fingers of one hand.

"It is time for us to regard him as in the world of action, what Shakespeare was in the world of thought, the greatest, because the most typical, Englishman of all time." That is the judgment of Dr. S. R. Gardiner on the two men whose fame has been commemorated during the past week. Cromwell has certainly been rehabilitated since Carlyle, with all his exaggerations, helped to put his character for the first time in its true light. No dispassionate person can overlook the defects of his qualities. He himself would not allow the painter to omit the wart on his face; and if he had a "big red nose" we all recognize that, as the schoolboy rather crudely put it, "there were deep religious feelings behind it." The panegyrists of the last few days have certainly made too light of some of his more questionable actions; but his good qualities have waited two hundred years for their adequate recognition.

The most typical English writer stands in a different category. It is not the character of the "gentle Shakespeare" that is in dispute, but his achievements. No one doubts that Cromwell chopped off King Charles' head, but a great many people, unfortunately, and far more, we suspect, than even Mr. Sidney Lee is aware of, doubt whether Shakespeare wrote Hamlet. For those afflicted with the "Baconian bacillus" we cannot do better than quote from Mr. Lee's speech delivered last Monday at the Birmingham Literary and Dramatic Club.

There was no law of evidence which, when applied to Shakespeare's biography, justified in the brain of any man of ordinary capacity the smallest doubt that the inhabitant of Stratford-on-Avon, William Shakespeare, whose tomb in Stratford Church bore the contemporary attestation that he and no other was the greatest man of letters of his day—there was no reasonable room for doubt that Shakespeare of Stratford wrote the plays which were published under his full name, and were commended to the reading public just after his death by his friend, Ben Jonson, as the outpourings of the voice of his "beloved" Shakespeare, "sweet swan of Avon."

The resignation by Dr. S. R. Gardiner of his Lectureship at Toynbee Hall is not perhaps a striking event in itself. But this cannot be said of the ceremony which took place last Saturday, when a presentation was made to Dr. Gardiner by the Toynbee Hall students and when two of the greatest living historians expounded their views of history. The Bishop of London took occasion to point out to a world which forms very irregular judgments as to greatness in literature that it has a really great historian in Dr. Gardiner. He refused, we believe, the dignity of an Oxford Professorship in order to devote his life to the study of one century of English history, and meanwhile for twenty years he kept himself in touch with life by lecturing to artisans in East London.

England [said the Bishop] did not generally know what a great man Dr. Gardiner was, but that discovery would be made some day or other. His was the life of the simple, whole-hearted student, who devoted himself absolutely and entirely to his work, who asked for no popularity, and required no recognition. It was a life which very often for the time was overlooked, but which in the long run would shine out brightly in the annals of mankind.

But what was equally interesting was the painfully heretical attitude taken up by both the Bishop and Dr. Gardiner towards recent theories of history. The Bishop was bad enough in his protest against dull narratives, and his advice to the historian to quicken his sympathies by daily contact with his fellowmen—a process not likely to promote that “analytical, distrustful, disrespectful attitude of mind” affected by the scientific historians of the Sorbonne and their English exponent, Professor York Powell. But Dr. Gardiner went further and expressed the benighted view that history had an ethical purpose.

The teaching of history seemed to him to be vapid and poor unless it had some action upon the great deeds and good lives of the world.

He is not content to ascertain facts, state them clearly, and, in the words of the Oxford Professor, “ascertain what scientific use can be made” of them. The question is, Does this make him a worse historian?

It is announced that an American preacher has caused a sensation by delivering in the pulpit discourses on popular novels. The “sensation” must depend upon the character of the romances selected for pulpit criticism. On “Quo Vadis” or “The Wide, Wide World” as conventional and improving an address might be given as any one need desire, while a sermon on “Mr. Dooley” might make for entertainment rather than for edification. The objection locally taken, however, seems to be founded on what is known, or supposed to be known, of the private lives of some of the novelists whose works are dealt with—an argument which might deal hardly with the Psalms of David and the Proverbs of Solomon. A sounder objection would be that a pulpit is seldom occupied by a competent literary critic, and that it is just the least competent who are most likely to talk belles lettres in place of theology.

From Cromwell to Wellington: Twelve Soldiers. Edited by Spenser Wilkinson. With Introduction by Lord Roberts. 9×6in., xii.+508 pp. London, 1899.

Lawrence & Bullen. 10/6

It ought not to be a difficult task to produce, by means of a dozen biographical sketches averaging forty pages each, “a picture of the British Army at work during the century and a half in which the Army helped the Navy to make Great and Greater Britain what they have been since men now living can remember.” But Mr. Spenser Wilkinson has committed a cardinal mistake in allowing nearly the same measure of space to all his contributors. In any composite work of this sort, uneven-ness of method is inevitable, but it need not be accentuated by lack of proportion. To give a bare forty pages to Marlborough and thirty-five to Peterborough—whose total omission would not have been resented by anyone—is a radical error. The diffuse account of Heathfield, again, with its details as to the price of turkeys during the siege of Gibraltar, is in much too sharp contrast with General Maurice’s highly condensed but otherwise admirable sketch of Wellington. With this drawback the book is a well-made one, and its attractiveness is enhanced by a fine series of portraits, and a sufficiency of useful sketches and plans.

We have heard much in the last week of Cromwell as Protector and Puritan, and it is interesting to have one’s attention focussed upon him when regarded purely as a soldier. His military career is very satisfactorily dealt with by Mr. Spenser Wilkinson in collaboration with the late Colonel Cooper King. Cromwell’s strategical methods are particularly well illustrated in the lucid description of the operations in Scotland which terminated in the battle of Dunbar. A bright and vigorous narrative this, in which full justice is done to the many sides of Cromwell’s military genius, his perfect use of cavalry, his skill in combined naval and military operations, his comprehensive grasp of the tactics of the three arms in co-operation, his systematic thoroughness in following up a victory. The Hon. J. W. Fortescue has caught the spirit of both the Marlburian strategy and tactics, and sensibly avoids obscuring his present purpose by discussing Corporal John’s moral backslidings. He should have had an addition of at least half the space assigned to Peterborough’s insignificant movements in Spain, to enable him to elaborate his battle pictures, more especially of Blenheim and Ramillies. Sir Archibald Alison deals pleasantly with Wolfe’s presence at Falkirk and Culloden, as well as with his North American campaigning. The editorial predilection would have led us to expect a somewhat minuter appreciation than is here indicated of the naval co-operation in the capture of Quebec. Colonel Adam’s “Clive” is said to have been largely modified by the editor. The result is a readable and concise narrative, but no picture is created, and the description of the battle of Plassey is very unsatisfying. Colonel Sisson Pratt’s “Coote” is a much brisker production, and his account of the defeat of Hyder Ali at Porto Novo is an able and luminous little contribution to military history. Abercromby’s life is, of course, mainly interesting by reason of its connexion with Egypt, and the landing at Aboukir Bay is given due prominence. But this fine soldier’s previous work in the West Indies and North Holland, and the singular beauty of his character, are also fairly noticed. The paragraph on page 323 beginning, “No other general in modern times has been so closely, so intimately, and so often engaged in combined operations with the navy of his country” conflicts with the statement on page 35 that, since Cromwell, no other general has “so perfectly illustrated the combined working of an army and a fleet.” Major May’s sketch of Lord Lake is quite one of the best in the book. If the hero of Laswari, to whom India owed its light infantry and galloper guns, cannot be judged by the highest standard, and committed, moreover, at least one serious military error, in attempting to capture the great mud stronghold of Bhurtpore with an absurdly inadequate artillery, he was a born leader of men, to whose prompt decisions and rapid movements we owe in no inconsiderable degree the consolidation of our Indian Empire. Count Gleichen, of the Grenadier Guards, is responsible for a very readable essay on Baird, the sultry-tempered Scot of whom his mother said, on hearing that he had been captured by Hyder Ali and was in prison and chained to another man, "De'il help the chiel that's chained to oor Davie!" It is, perhaps, a little to the prejudice of this worthy soldier, whose splendid services ranged over India, Egypt, the Cape of Good Hope, and the Peninsula, that at points his career should have come into such close association with the careers of Wellington and Moore. In "Twelve Soldiers" the latter's life is entrusted to Major C. B. Mayne, R.E., a competent writer who, however, fails to convey such a clear idea of the retreat to Corunna as is given in a few sentences of General Maurice's monograph on Wellington. This last is a model composition of its kind, well worthy of the literary and military reputation of the writer. Starting from the fateful conversation which led to the abandonment of that important clerkship, worth £80 a year, in the Irish Excise, General Maurice paints the panorama of the Great Duke's career with a strong, capable hand and a perfect sense of military perspective. The compression of so much into fifty short pages is a noteworthy performance, having regard to the completeness and the soundness as well as to the literary quality of the result. Nothing essential seems to be missed, even the mistake before Seringapatam in 1799, and the question of the problematical ride to Wavre, coming under careful review.

Of Lord Roberts' introduction it is sufficient to say that it is an interesting and useful memorandum, chiefly remarkable for a neat characterization of the part which fortresses have played and railways are now playing in military history. In expatiating upon the qualities of a successful general Lord Roberts is happily didactic, even to the extent of a felicitous quotation from Lucan. But he hardly gives due weight to the possession of that personal galvanic influence which was so strongly exemplified in the cases of Marlborough, Wolfe, Abercromby, Lake, and Moore, and which is not unconnected with the complete devotion of nine-tenths of the British Army of to-day to its gallant and beloved "Bobs."

TWO MODERN YOUNG MEN.

More. By Max Beerbohm. 6½ × 5½ in., 201 pp. London, 1899. Lane. 4/6

Essays in Modernity. Criticisms and Dialogues by Francis Adams. 7½ × 6 in., 253 pp. Lane. 5/-

There are some forms of art which are within the reach of so many people that we are apt to underrate their possibilities. Fair proficiency in them is so common and is displayed by such a multitude of average performers that we do not realize the perfection to which they can be carried until the Master appears. Even thus it is with the art of being amusingly impertinent. Amusing impertinence, whether with tongue or pen, is, generally speaking, at the command of any one who to youth and high spirits adds a reasonable amount of the not uncommon quality of cleverness. On that account we are most of us only mildly diverted by it and regard it with but a moderate measure of admiration. We know, or we have known, so many lively undergraduates who could do the trick passably well, that we come to the conclusion that the trick itself is incapable of any very high artistic development. It is here that Mr. Max Beerbohm comes in to undeceive us. By him we are reminded that the thing can be done not merely passably—nay, not even merely excellently—but ideally, supremely, transcendently well. In his hands the knack of graceful impertinence is raised by dint of sheer mastery to the dignity of a serious art; there are moments, indeed, when he brings it within measurable distance of the sublime. There has been no literary phenomenon quite like him—none has flourished simile aut secundum since the "curly youth" of the author of "Vivian Grey." He is at his best in the little fasciculus of short, satirical essays which he has just published under the brief but significant title of "More"—a title suggestive, as has been well said, of a kindly attempt to appease the ever-renewed appetite of a hungry universe. The reason why Mr. Beerbohm does supremely well what his competitors only achieve with varying degrees of success is, of course, not far to seek. His pre-eminence is due, in large measure, to the fact that he is something more than a "curious impertinent" with a singularly ample gift of supercilious raillery—that he happens also to possess a pretty wit and a most fantastic humour, a keen critical intelligence, no little originality of thought, and, as he shows whenever it pleases him to do so, a brilliant style. The pretty wit never fails him, and if the fantastic humour is occasionally a little strained, as in the tirade against Fire Brigades, it is much more often as easy and spontaneous as in "The Case of Prometheus"—a truly delightful piece of fooling. His appreciation of Ouida abounds in just and generous criticism under its airy persiflage; and in the opening essay, "Some Words on Royalty," Mr. Beerbohm has apparently laid himself out to show us how much thought, imagination, and eloquence he can compress into an unexpectedly serious page of a satirical essay—though it is true that at the end of the passage he reverts abruptly to his more characteristic manner in the remark that "despite certain faults of exaggeration" it is "a piece of quite admirable prose."

It is the highest possible testimony to Mr. Beerbohm's winning charm that we can allow him to nudge us in this free and easy fashion without resenting it. But in truth he can use his "terrible gift of familiarity" with a success and acceptance which few can command, and even in his pertest moments of self-assertion he is never offensive. It is, of course, the saving grace of self-critical humour—the obviousness of the fact that he takes himself no more seriously than he takes other people—which prevents him from offending any but a humourless reader. And nothing could more pointedly differentiate him from another type of self-assertive young man here represented by the late Mr. Francis Adams. Mr. Adams does not tread upon half so many men's toes as Mr. Beerbohm, but the pressure of his foot is almost always felt as an intolerable provocation. Does he wish to convey to us that he attaches no value to Tennyson's "Poems, Chiefly Lyrical" (1832), in which other critics—survivors, it is true, of the infallibility of their youth—have found a certain amount of promise? Here is his way of putting it:—

Nothing could show us more clearly the dearth of all excellence than that the first literary critic of his epoch . . . could treat with anything like seriousness such a book as the "Poems, Chiefly Lyrical." "The misfortune is," says Coleridge, "that he has begun to write verses without very well understanding what metre is," and he gives him quite a nice little pedagogic lecture on the way to attain a "sense of metre." . . . It never occurred to Coleridge that the whole performance was effeminate and factitious. Virility had passed out of his own lines too long ago for him to notify (sic) the fact that it was wanting in any one else's. Opinion had helped his facile temperament to relegate reality to the pleasant distance of a dream, &c.

That is how the other sort of modern young man disports himself in his "Essays on Modernity." Or, for another instance of the kind of youthful cocksureness which merely irritates without amusing:—

"The Lotus Eaters," as we have it now, is almost a new poem, and it is praised for its lovely landscape.

A land of streams! Some like a downward smoke,
Slow-dropping veils of thinnest lawn, did go

Do you call that natural magic? Clearly it is nothing of the kind. It is the daintily but ever superficially picturesque—the sort of thing that satisfies the sensitive book reader who sees this for the first time and wants to become familiar with it. In fact, if we want to know how much of Tennyson will survive, Mr. Adams will tell us:—

Matthew Arnold performed a duty of pious praise when, in his book of selections from the poetry of Wordsworth, . .

he showed us just how much material really went to the production of a lasting poetic name. Thirty or forty years hence, the Mr. Matthew Arnold of the day will present to the public a similar volume of Tennyson, but it will be a slim one. At one fell swoop he, too, will have cut out nine-tenths of that portion of the poet's work in which, perchance, he most prided himself when alive.

Of course, we ought to make, and the humane critic does make, all due allowances for Mr. Adams. He was a young Australian of violently democratic opinions, of considerable but undisciplined talent, unfortunate in his health and in other ways, who crowned a rather tragic life by an extremely tragic death. Thus we can afford to smile at such boyish extravagances as his account of the anti-revolutionary reaction of the Lake poets "Wordsworth was hopelessly doomed to respectability from the start, and Coleridge was too cowardly and faithless to accept deeds of blood"; or at the colonial provincialism of the remark that "Adam Lindsay Gordon was a poet of an altogether larger and broader calibre than Mr. Kipling"; or at the artless disclosure of immaturity in the exclamation, à propos of Mr. J. M. Barrie—"Ah, if only he could be forbidden to write anything more for several years and set upon a course of study of the best modern French fiction!" But the trouble is that even when Mr. Adams has something to advance which is not a paradox—when, as in much that he has to say of Mr. Kipling, of Mr. Hardy, of Mr. Swinburne, and, here and there, of Tennyson himself, the matter of his criticism is sound and commands assent—the manner of it is a continual provocation. The effect, indeed, is such as to add a fresh element of pathos to Mr. Adams' early death. We cannot help regretting that he did not live to acquire the tact, the urbanity, the mellow wisdom of Mr. Max Beerbohm.

A PHILOSOPHER IN DIFFICULTIES.

Lettres Inédites de J. S. Mill à Auguste Comte. Publiées avec les réponses de Comte et une Introduction par L. Lévy-Bruhl. 1 vol. de la Bibliothèque de Philosophie Contemporaine. 9x5½ in., 560 pp. Paris, 1899. Alcan. Fr.10

The distinguished Maître de conférences de philosophie at the University of Paris, M. Lévy-Bruhl, author of one of the most abundantly pilfered books in French—the history of the development of German national consciousness, entitled "L'Allemagne depuis Leibniz" (Hachette)—deserves the gratitude of all students of philosophy in France and England for giving at last complete publicity to the entire series of letters which passed between John Stuart Mill and the author of the "Positivist Philosophy." Comte's letters to Mill were published in 1877 by Leroux under the auspices of the Positivist Society. Mill's to Comte were to appear at the same time, but for unexplained reasons the project was abandoned. They, or rather copies of them, have remained ever since at the offices of the Positivist Society, almost unutilized, even by the very few who had access to them. M. Lévy-Bruhl has now drawn these precious documents from oblivion and published them with the authorization of Miss Taylor, Mill's heir, in their proper place in the correspondence of Comte. The volume presents a record of what may be called a spiritual duel between two of the most original minds of the century.

The editor has, with much skill, indicated for us, in advance, the main drift of these letters, the dramatic vicissitude of this duel. Readers of the "Autobiography" will recall the somewhat enigmatic passage in which Mill notes how his fervent admiration for Comte was reflected for several years in the letters that passed between them—letters which degenerated, however, later on into bitter controversy, and finally stopped altogether. "I found," said Mill, "and he probably found, too, that I could do no good to his mind, and that all the good he could do to mine he was doing by his books." This volume is the belated but indispensable appendix needed for the elucidation of this vague sentence. The letters published in 1877 brought only partial light. Bain utilized them in his "Recollections" of Mill. He had been, moreover, an eye-witness of the first stages of the curious episode which is here chronicled.

But there is no evidence, says M. Lévy-Bruhl, that he knew the text of Mill's replies to Comte, save of those on feminist questions, copies of which Mill had kept by him. Yet Bain, in affirming that Mill was "unusually open" in his letters, was certainly right. Mill's natural reserve vanishes surprisingly in these outspoken confidences. The floodgates had been opened under the influence of his enthusiasm for the first volumes of the "Cours de Philosophie Positive," and the tone of his first letter is that of deferential admiration. He speaks to Comte as to his "elder brother in philosophy, not to say more." True he clings to his pet opinions, but the striking thing is the note of spontaneous impulse which has nerved his initiative in proposing to Comte this "commerce of ideas."

Comte was flattered. He accepted, quite naturally, this foreign adulation. He talked even of his domestic affairs almost garrulously, but, enamoured of his own system, he failed to note the cautious shadings in Mill's appreciation of important portions of it, and, simply because Mill accepted Comte's method, the latter concluded that he accepted the whole positivist philosophy and its consequences. In fact, to "put the points on the i's," as the French say, a certain fatuousness in Comte prevented him not merely from reciprocation in kind, but from the exercise of that perspicacity which an ordinary disinterested reader of the letters would naturally have displayed. For the time being—for the first year, that is—the two philosophers form a charming pair, a mutual admiration society, congratulating each other on the fact that, working apart and under different skies, they have met at last on common ground. But the joy was short lived. Comte maintained inflexibly his cher maître pride, and Mill, apparently, began to become convinced that, if laudari a laudato viro is one of the keenest pleasures known to man, this particular pleasure was one which Comte was constitutionally incapacitated to confer. Blinded by an inordinate self-esteem, Comte had failed to note the growing differences between himself and his soi-disant disciple. When at last the truth dawned upon him that Mill, too, was quelqu'un, he saw in him a dissident, not to say an heretic, and nearly pronounces anathema, in the name of his own quasi-papal infallibility. The psychology of this moment becomes more lucid if we bear in mind that Comte, while refusing to admit that he was in the smallest degree Mill's spiritual debtor, had to own that he was pecuniarily so.

Nothing is more to Mill's credit than his conduct in this unpleasant business. Comte had lost his situation at the Polytechnic School and wrote to tell Mill so. Mill, assisted by Grote, Sir William Molesworth, and Raikes Currie, the banker, came to his rescue with the 6,000 francs of which he had suddenly been deprived. When the money ran out with the year Comte expected a continuation of the "English subsidy." Mill, with infinite delicacy, had to explain that he and the friends who had agreed to this sacrifice had supposed it to be purely a temporary one. But Comte saw only the intolerable fact that Peter's pence had ceased to come in. The occasion demanded an encyclical, and the head of the Positivist Church rose to the occasion. The document from which the following characteristic passages are taken is certainly one of the most painful, as it is one of the most instructive, revelations of how far doctrinaire consistency can go, and of how largely temperamental all philosophical systems are. This is how Comte speaks with delightfully bombastic tartuferie of his "embarrassments":—

"I am convinced" [he writes to Mill on June 27, 1845] "that society generally owes protection and assistance to philosophical studies. This is one of the essential conditions of the elementary play between the temporal influence and the spiritual influence, whose antagonism directs the daily course of human affairs. Governments properly so called, as being the special organs of public necessities, are, no doubt, especially entrusted, by their very nature, with this mission, but their responsibility does not entirely discharge of this duty those forces known as private. When an imperfect sentiment of their duties, or a constant concern for their own material preservation, makes them for the moment faithless to this unquestionable duty, morality prescribes that the duty be fulfilled by the efforts, more or less individual, of all the temporal powers that be. Benefiting amply as they do by the daily advantages inherent in the social order, they are obliged to support all those studies which they have admitted to tend really to the consolidation and perfecting of such a régime."

At present, however, continues Comte, he cannot expect the French Government to understand its duty. And he goes on thus :—

"A noble private intervention, determined particularly by your active solicitude, has happily averted thus far the disturbing action of injustice and irresolution, but this tutelary influence is about to expire. I am bound to confess to you, with my fraternal frankness, that I had taken it for granted that this tutelary influence would be continued so long as the danger itself lasted. . . . As this aid was the result of a sincere conviction of the philosophic worth and the social importance of the ensemble of my work, I should have had no repugnance in accepting the prolongation for a new year of this kind of voluntary subsidy generously accorded by the spontaneous elements of the new temporal power to those of the new spiritual power. The same motives which inspired the initial decision appeared to me to suggest naturally its continuation on the part of persons—whom, moreover, the act did not pecuniarily embarrass—until I should obtain the speedy public reparation which the constant moderation of my conduct now makes the wish of all honourable men. . . . In the age that I am of philosophic plenitude, I could, during the twelve or fifteen years of lofty mental activity which still remain to me, suitably produce, in these material conditions, the four essential works announced at the end of my foundation-book. . . . Instead of that, the temporal influences, public or private, which will have let me consume inactive this irreparable time in fighting against poverty can be justly accused by posterity of having permitted me to produce only the most considerable of these four elaborations. I was in hopes, I confess, that choice spirits would feel the necessity of not allowing in the only favourable centre the sole foyer of real philosophic energy which exists nowadays to be extinguished or slackened."

And Comte goes on to express his hope that, in the continuation of the generosity of Mill and his friends, he will have himself contributed, by the sole fact of having deigned to be the object of this generosity, to the "establishment of a sort of spontaneous precedent, which might be systematically invoked henceforth both by philosophers and their oppressors." Mill seems to have sent this curious letter to one or more of the three "spontaneous elements of the new temporal power" in question. As to Sir William Molesworth, however, he refused to appeal again to him for money for a number of very good reasons which he loyally states. When all hope of the subsidy is over, Comte writes to Mill another long letter, a new encyclical, full of words, words, words, reiterating in the same sham philosophic phraseology the same old grounds why Comte thought that, if France refused to give him the living which it owed him, the honour and responsibility devolved on Grote and Sir William Molesworth and the banker, Raikes Currie. What it all comes to is this, that he proposes to write a book, the apex of his entire work, which, under the form of a philosophical apologue, shall be a réclame for his British benefactors, provided only Mill can induce them to think better of their refusal. And if they persist he menaces them with his anathema in the same book to be then conceived on different lines and worked out to demonstrate an exactly contrary thesis. Roma locuta est!

In presence of this philosophic chantage—it was nothing else—what was Mill's attitude? He tells Comte the bitter truth, gently, politely, yet resolutely. He denies that Comte's English friends had any "moral position" towards him; tells him that they had never accepted him as a "spiritual head, the representative of their convictions," and that, even if they had done so, it would not have followed that they would have felt bound to continue their subsidies; that, in fact, Comte has been cherishing an illusion, and that their act is "nothing but a feeling of philanthropy towards an eminent philosopher placed in straitened circumstances by an unexpected persecution." All of them, especially Grote, had certainly learned much from Comte, accepting fully the fundamental idea of his work—to wit, the substitution of the scientific for the religious point of view, and the application to social studies of the philosophic method, but they differed from Comte completely in their conceptions of dogmatic sociology, many of his views on these matters appearing to them "neither true nor worth propagating." He sets Comte right, moreover, in an extremely interesting passage in correction of Comte's belief that the disagreement between him and his English friends was due to the "narrow sentiment of nationality peculiar to the English." He says :—

"Contrary to the general opinion of the Continent I think that there is less nationality among the English than in any other civilized people. They have to-day far less national prejudice and bias than the Continental peoples. . . . They pay little attention to other people and are in general ignorant as to what goes on elsewhere. But those of them who do not share this ignorance, those who know the Continent well enough to judge it, either by travel or study, such persons are more cosmopolitan than you can possibly conceive; and, if there are any men of whom this is particularly true, it is exactly those with whom you have been dealing."

On the scheme of founding a Positivist organ in England, as a device for indirectly bringing Comte some money, Mill is equally candid, confessing that he has come to the conclusion that, after all, he and Comte do not sufficiently agree as to their opinions of the best way of sociologic propaganda; and he suggests that such dissidences between two thinkers so conscientious must be due to the fact that either the one or the other does not sufficiently understand the laws of human nature.

Comte, on receiving this, read over the letter to which it was a reply, and of which he had kept a copy. In answering Mill he declares, in the same grandiloquent way, that his English friends seem to him to be, after all, sufficiently his admirers to justify the continuation of their subsidy. Mill's suggestion that he had little knowledge of human nature almost angers him, and he frankly assures Mill that he had not sufficiently studied biology to be able to appreciate his (Comte's) thought. He had been of Mill's opinion "before he had completed his philosophic education!" Evidently Comte was becoming rude. With this note of causticity the correspondence could not long continue. It languished, and came to an abrupt end with a long letter of Mill on Ireland, and not a word of philosophy. Comte did not reply. Such was the pitiful result of Mill's spontaneous appeal. The contemplated "commerce of ideas" had degenerated into a miserable haggling over matters which, if important, are certainly capable of steadier philosophic treatment than Comte gave to them. The spectacle offered by him throughout the latter third of this volume is, in fact, a very painful one.

But there had been, happily, before the crisis occurred, a real interchange of ideas, which gives to these documents an interest of another order. Mill seems to have had no appreciable influence on Comte's ideas, whereas Comte's thought had certainly entered into the woof of Mill's thinking, and may be traced in its texture. This difference is one of the most important facts revealed by this book. As a matter of fact Comte had no "opinions" in Mill's sense of the word, but is the creator of a co-ordinated intangible body of doctrine—modifiable only by ukase or bull—conceived for the very purpose of setting bounds to the flux and reflux of modern "opinion." How could Mill hope to change any ideas in a system in which everything hangs together? Mill, endowed with a truly scientific open-mindedness, penetrated with a truly religious love for truth which, as he had learned, had many forms, was far removed from Comte's ideal of a completed body of doctrine, constructed with mathematical precision, and following that impulse for harmony and crystallization which is at once the glory and the limitation of the "Latin" mind. Mill was always ready to learn. Comte had put the finishing touches to his system at the moment when this correspondence opens. Even, therefore, if Comte had not acted as he did, this hopeless contrast of temperaments and of methods was bound, sooner or later, and sooner rather than later, to cause a rupture. This rupture when it came was irreparable, and its causes constitute the dramatic and instructive interest of this volume.

THE GAELIC MELANCHOLY.

The Wind Among the Reeds. By W. B. Yeats. 7½ x 5 in., 108 pp. London, 1899. Elkin Mathews. 3/6

This book has the remoteness, the melancholy, of all poetry inspired by spiritual passion. It has, too, that other melancholy of which one of the greatest of modern poets wrote in a forgotten early tale :—"Les rêves du poète et de l'amant—rêves qui, par une loi inexplicable de notre nature, ont toujours une teinte de mélancolie, même dans leurs plus splendides rayonnements, et qui ne sont les plus délicieux des rêves que grâce à cette même mélancolie." Here we are aware of the stillness of things that are past or are not again to be :—

I bring you with reverent hands
The book of my numberless dreams ;
White woman that passion has worn
As the tide wears the dove-gray sands,
And with heart more old than the horn
That is brimmed from the pale fire of time,
White woman with numberless dreams,
I bring you my passionate rhyme.

This note of loss, of regret, finds constant expression. Perhaps the most complex expression of it is in a wonderful little poem of six lines :—

O Curlew, cry no more in the air,
Or only to waters in the West ;
Because your crying brings to my mind
Passion-dimmed eyes and long heavy hair
That was shaken out over my breast ;
There is enough evil in the crying of wind.

Probably Mr. Yeats' readers will recognize most of the poems which are included in the "Wind Among the Reeds." Some are from his plays, some from "The Celtic Twilight," some from "The Secret Rose"; others have appeared in magazines or Irish periodicals. In one or two instances they lose by severance from the context, where they appeared with a vivid and strange beauty. This is almost inevitable where the poem has been an organic part of the prose narrative; that is, where it has not been interpolated, but has, as it were, suddenly blossomed on the green bough, through the emotion having become rhythmic on the dominant note. Perhaps one that will be new to Mr. Yeats' readers is the beautiful cry of one of his imaginary personages, Michael Robartes—who will be familiar to those who have read "Rosa Alchemica," and the two privately-printed tales, "The Tables of the Law" and "The Adoration of the Magi," and of whom Mr. Yeats mystically says in his notes to the present volume that he is fire reflected in water, while Hanrahan (the chief personage in "The Secret Rose") is fire blown by the wind, and Aedh, the poet, is fire burning by itself.

I hear the shadowy Horses, their long manes a-shake,
Their hoofs heavy with tumult, their eyes glimmering white ;
The North unfolds above them clinging, creeping night,
The East her hidden joy before the morning break,
The West weeps in pale dew, and sighs passing away,
The South is pouring down roses of crimson fire.
O vanity of Sleep, Hope, Dream, endless Desire,
The Horses of Disaster plunge in the heavy clay.
Beloved, let your eyes half close, and your heart beat
Over my heart, and your hair fall over my breast
Drowning love's lonely hour in deep twilight of rest,
And hiding their tossing manes and their tumultuous feet.

Beautiful as they are, the solemn lines of "The Secret Rose" and that lovely "Song of Aedh," in the story called "The Binding of the Hair," do not stand here with the same distinction as they do in their original settings. Not that Aedh's song is organic in the story in question, for its inclusion there is arbitrary, literary; but it is in itself a song for a setting. With the cry of Hanrahan to the Curlew, the most satisfying things in this book are those which are attributed to Aedh—"Aedh tells of the valley of lovers," of "the Perfect Beauty," of "the cry of the Sedge," of "those who have spoken evil of his Beloved," of "the Cloths of Heaven." In some others, as in "The Lament of Mongan," perhaps in "The Valley of the Black Pig," in "Aedh and the Elemental Powers," Mr. Yeats has an over-use of symbol. In poetry any over-use is antipathetic. Here his "Cloths of Heaven" are too much "embroidered" with, to mundane eyes, inscrutable insignia. His obvious danger is a confusion of the spiritual beauty behind the symbol with the arbitrary verbal expression of it. To some there is no need to explain "the white deer with no horn," "the hound with one red ear," "the boar without bristles, out of the West," even "the Polar Dragon" and "the Immortal Rose"; but of necessity these must be few, and though in a sense all rare poetry is mysticism, and can only be understood aright of mystics, in the wider and not less true sense it should be as limpid as water, intimate as air, attainable as light.

That Mr. Yeats has himself recognized this is obvious from the fact that he has added over forty pages of notes to explain intent or allusion in his fewer than forty poems. It would, however, be ungracious not to say that these appended pages have a charm and distinction as appreciable in kind as that of the pages of verse which precede them. Incidentally, it would be interesting to know how Mr. Yeats arrives at Sidhe being also Gaelic for wind, and Aodh or Aedh (Hugh) being the same as Aed, fire. Probably the root in Sidhe is identical with the Scotch-Gaelic sìd (which does not mean wind, but weather, peaceful weather after storm), or the Irish sìde (from séid), or the S.G. stan or I.G. ston or O.G. stn; but surely the word Sidhe, which has a use quite distinct from sìde, is never used for "wind"? Aodh and Aoidh have different derivations. Aodh is a variation of the common Gaelic for Hugh, Eòghan, from the Teutonic root-word, hug, thought. Aoidh is from Adamnan's Aido, a corruption of the old Gaelic Aed, fire—its own derivation from the Latin Aedes (house=hearth), from the Greek αἶθρ. The Gaelic names, Mackay, Maquay, and perhaps one or two variations, are more probably McAoidh than McAodh (of the race of Hugh). However, this is perhaps beside the mark in the criticism of a volume which is not the work of a student of Gaelic, but of a poet who interprets the Gaelic spirit—Gaelic charm, dream, and mystery.

A word should be added as to the apposite and comely get-up of this little book within and without. The broad sweeping gold lines across the dark blue cloth make a singularly effective design.

THE WHY AND THE WHEREFORE OF PLANT GROWTH.

On Buds and Stipules. International Scientific Series. 7½ x 5 in., xix. + 239 pp. London, 1899. Kegan Paul. 5/-

It is no small pleasure to see the generalizations of yesterday explained to-day and traced to their causes. There is probably no science in which so many curious rules have been noted as in botany, and in which so little was done till lately to explain the reasons of them. That this set of plants have a square stem, while that is always round in section; that one had pale and another vivid blossoms—such things have long been known and used for purposes of classification. But the why remained in obscurity. In recent years, however, many explanations have been advanced, and a large proportion seems likely to stand the test of time. Among the explorers of this region Sir John Lubbock holds an honoured place. He has looked into a good many vegetable problems, and not in vain. This time he has taken up an old challenge and reprints from his communications to the Linnean Society the most generally interesting parts of his answer. Vaucher asked why the Rock Roses (Helianthemum) are so curiously inconstant in one particular; why have some of its species stipules while others have none? A stipule is an organ or pair of organs frequently found at the base of a leaf-stalk in dicotyledonous plants. It is not often large or conspicuous (though Lathyrus Aphaca, a British plant, shows that it can be both), and it may be leafy or leathery or even dry and chaffy. Of course when these organs were first noticed their use was not known. Time revealed that stipules sometimes, like leaves, perform a great deal of assimilation, and sometimes help to protect buds from injury. But still it could not be said why they occur here and not there, why Helianthemum vulgare, the common Rock Rose, has two for each leaf, while H. oelandicum has none. Sir John Lubbock refers the difference to the need or non-need of extra protection for the lateral buds of the respective plants, for those buds which stand ready to grow in the inner angle of each leaf. The bud is delicate; it may be hurt by sun or wind, by frost or rain, or insect enemies. If these dangers are adequately guarded against otherwise, then, he argues, stipules can be dispensed with. H. oelandicum has leaves which sit close to the stem and are not held out from it by leaf-stalks. They are broad-based and ciliate—i.e., hairy about the edges. The young bud in the corner, therefore, gets shelter and, what is more, the base of the leaf actually sheathes the bud. Here then there is sufficient protection. But the other species mentioned has its leaves standing out on stalks; they are narrow and comparatively hairless. The bud would be dangerously exposed but for two stipules which shelter it. That this astonishingly simple explanation is no mere imagination appears from the fact that other species of Helianthemum, which have no stipules, have broad-bases to the leaves, while species with stipules have narrow leaf-stalks. In H. guttatum the upper leaves are narrowed and have stipules, the lower leaves have no stipules, but broad leaf-bases. Further, an examination of other families of plants confirms the conclusion suggested by the Rock Roses. Such, then, is the central point of Sir John Lubbock's new investigations; but it leads him on to interesting matter about the construction of buds and the other functions of stipules. He hardly brings forward sufficient reason for maintaining against many botanists that stipules may be found in certain Monocotyledons. Why the terminal bud of the shoot should regularly perish in some shrubs and trees, and why the inside of buds is green before they open to the light—these are questions which we hope he will answer some other day. The numerous illustrations, some of which are unnecessarily repeated, bring out his points well; they make the contrasted build of the two types of Rock Roses very clear.

A STORY OF AMERICAN EXPANSION.

The Great Salt Lake Trail. By Colonel Henry Inman and Colonel William F. Cody. With Maps and Illustrations. 9×6 in., xiii. + 520 pp. London, 1899. Macmillan. 14/- n.

We have here a real whiff of that wild life of the prairies from which Fenimore Cooper and Mayne Reid drew their inspiration, given us by our old friend "Buffalo Bill" and his collaborator, Colonel Henry Inman. There are chapters in it that are worth all the "Leatherstocking" series put together, not, perhaps, as examples of literary skill, but as brilliant sketches of personal experience. Of the extraordinary society which Brigham Young led out into the wildernesses of the West several writers have given us vivid pictures. Both R. L. Stevenson and Conan Doyle have told of the lawless obedience to a secret sect, of the pitiless vengeance of that lonely yet strong community. In Colonel Cody's chapters you may follow the band of visionary enthusiasts in their passage across deserts populated only by the wandering buffalo or by the nomad hordes of Indians. You may watch with a new amazement that astonishingly foolish effort of the United States Government to crush out the emigrants by force of arms. You may see the final completion of their ideal in the mighty streets and palaces of Salt Lake City; and the gradual connexion of that city with the East and West on either side of it provides some of the most striking passages in the book.

It was a very pleasant surprise to come upon that extraordinary personage Jim Beckwourth again. Some years ago a volume appeared purporting to be his "memoirs," from which the public realized for the first time that Mandeville and Munchausen had at last been fairly beaten in their own line. Many of Beckwourth's yarns, of course, were founded upon actual fact, for no one can be chief of a Crow Tribe on the warpath without occasional strange experiences. He makes his bow on page 64, as a mere youth, with a sentence that promises well. "About three hundred yards from the camp I saw two teal ducks; I levelled my rifle and handsomely decapitated one." But the truth of those strange times really needs no exaggeration. The Massacre of Mountain Meadows, for instance, is as terrible a true tale of cold-blooded ferocity as was ever written. A band of one hundred and thirty six white emigrants were on their way from Missouri to Southern California, about the time when relations between the Mormons and the United States Government had become strained. They had just reached the divide between the waters of the Great Basin and those which flow into the Colorado, when they were attacked by Indians. They hurriedly corralled their wagons, and were besieged behind these temporary ramparts for four days. The emigrants were at last enticed by a flag of truce to leave their wagons and marched out in single file. At a given signal the ambushed Indians sprang out and massacred every man, woman, and child in the party. This was in September 1857, and twenty years later Lee, who was responsible for the bloodshed, was condemned to death and shot upon the very place in Mountain Meadows which seemed to have been blasted by nature as a memorial of the hideous crime committed there.

The Americans have certainly paid dearly both in blood and treasure for that great expanse of territory known as the United States. One of the few massacres even more revolting than anything recorded in this volume occurred in the great Mexican War, and was made the occasion of a particularly fine epitaph when a monument was raised over the remains of the heroic men and women who were butchered by Mexican troops at the Alamo. "Thermopylae sent its messenger of defeat, but the Alamo had none" was, if memory serves us, the line that recorded the loss of the entire American outpost. Two more examples recorded by our authors may be mentioned.

Four men (of whom Buffalo Bill was one) went out as scouts from a big wagon train that was on its way from Fort Lorraine to the South Platte. When the riders had just passed Cedar Bluffs they were suddenly surrounded by Indians.

Simpson, however, was equal to the occasion, for with wonderful promptness he jumped from his jaded mule, and in a trice shot his own animal and ours also, and ordered us to assist him to jerk their bodies into a triangle. This being quickly done we got inside the barricade of mule flesh and prepared to receive the Indians.

The first charge was repulsed, but Woods was shot in the shoulder by an arrow. Simpson pulled it out, clapped a plug of tobacco on the wound, and all were soon ready for business again. The Indians held off long enough to enable the dauntless four to dig away the ground inside their barricade with their knives and made their position a little safer. After several more attempts to close up with the repeating rifles, the Indians sat down to starve them out; but luckily the wagons came up with the scouts after nearly thirty hours of suspense, and the danger passed. The famous Custer Massacre is the last bit of Indian fighting to which we need draw special attention. At the head of his cavalry, the General charged an Indian village confidently expecting support; none came, and nearly five thousand savages surrounded the devoted band of American soldiers who fought round their leader till every man was shot. The whole thing reads strangely like a larger edition of the story of the ill-fated Wilson Patrol on the Shangani river; and in each case the victorious savages seem to have recognized and even revered the splendid gallantry of the foes they slew.

Among the best things in these stirring chapters is the short record of the famous "Pony Express," which was the sole means of communication between East and West until the telegraph and railway had been built.

One of the most important transactions of the Pony Express was the transmittal of President Buchanan's last message in December, 1860, from the Missouri river to Sacramento, over two thousand miles, in eight days and a few hours; and the next in importance was the carrying of President Lincoln's message, his inaugural of March 4, 1861, over the same route in seven days and seventeen hours. This was the quickest time for horseback riding, considering the distance made, ever accomplished in this or any other country.

The feat implied not only speed and endurance in both man and horse, but courage and resource in outwitting or defeating the attacks of murderous Indians nearly all along the route. After this, the most fascinating story is "The Lost Children," which is transcribed from the folklore of the Blackfeet. It is far too long to be reproduced here, and we can only recommend the lover of such fairy tales to read one of the best examples we have ever met in Chapter XIV. After this the somewhat coarse and vulgar revelations in the eighteenth chapter come as rather a shock, but no doubt they complete a picture that must naturally be full of shadows, and they scarcely mar the excellent impression of open-air freedom and vast distances left by the volume as a whole. The index is good, and the illustrations illustrate.

OTHER NEW BOOKS.

It is difficult to realize that Abraham Hayward died only fifteen years ago. As an Essayist he brought to perfection a peculiar vogue in which no one nowadays can, and few attempt to, approach him. The immense store of information and anecdote poured out in a style perfectly lucid, sober, and well-bred reveals the literary manners of an older school, and even those of his publications which were not of temporary interest only, such as his "Faust," his "Lord Chesterfield," and his "Mrs. Piozzi" do not find many readers nowadays. It is perhaps a reflection upon our own day that his ART OF DINING, founded on two articles in the Quarterly Review, should require annotation before their wealth of learning and allusion is presented anew to the public. Still we are glad to see him treated as a classic and we are grateful to Mr. Charles Sayle for his new edition of this delightful book (Murray, 5s.). On dining, as on whist and on Junius, Hayward was a recognized authority, though he confessed he got up his subject as a lawyer prepares a brief, and "would not eat half the things mentioned in it if they paid me for it." Besides his notes, Mr. Sayle adds one or two typical and historical recent menus and a short appendix on Latin Graces.

A new series—"The Over-Seas Library"—is begun by Mr. Fisher Unwin. Its purpose, according to the preface, is "to print literature from any quarter that deals with the actual life of the English outside England"; and an excellent start is made with IPANÉ (2s.), by Mr. Cunningham Graham. The ingredients of this composite volume are very miscellaneous. We begin with short stories—vivid, brutal, direct, absolutely devoid of the particular kind of sentiment on which the clients of the circulating libraries are understood to set most store; they are of the genre Morley Roberts, and admirable of their kind. Then we have graphic thumbnail sketches of life in South America—an account of the uses of the lazo, and of those still more fiendishly ingenious weapons, the bolos. Finally, we have a few papers which, having nothing to do with life over-sea, appear to have been thrown in as ballast to fill up. One of these is a description of the funeral of Mr. William Morris. The book is just long enough to last the average reader from London to Brighton, and is calculated to entertain the intelligent male reader better than most of the fiction provided for this purpose on the bookstalls. It has a portrait by way of frontispiece; but whether this is a portrait of Mr. Cunningham Graham trying to look like Don Quixote or of Don Quixote trying to look like Mr. Cunningham Graham is a problem which we do not feel competent to solve.

The latest volume of the Angler's Library is Mr. G. A. B. Dewar's SOUTH COUNTRY TROUT STREAMS (Lawrence and Bullen, 5s.). Mr. Dewar always writes sensibly and pleasantly, and though some may, perhaps, find his information as to expenses a little meagre, he will be found in every other respect to provide the angler with all he needs to know as to the rivers of the Southern counties, and we hope that his many warning words as to unnecessary pollution will reach the ears of the private individuals or public bodies responsible for it. "I doubt," he says, "if even Mr. Ruskin could exaggerate the heinous character of their misdeeds. It might well be said, 'Oh, their offence is rank; it smells to Heaven.'"

In SELECTIONS FROM THE SOURCES OF ENGLISH HISTORY (Longmans, 6s.) Professor Colby, of McGill University, has followed the admirable example of Professor Hart, the second volume of whose "American History as told by Contemporaries" we noticed last autumn. In this volume of 325 pages, which travels over English history from Julius Cæsar to the first Reform Bill, it would be easy, of course, to point to important omissions. The period of the Brunswicks in particular is sketchily treated, and we cannot help thinking that the pages devoted to a rather prolix preface might have been better utilized for the purpose of including more "sources." But, on the whole, the selection is judicious, and Professor Hart has done well not to confine himself to the "sources" for facts only. He goes so far even, in his desire to illustrate social life, as to include as a "source" an extract from Lyly's "Euphues." We cordially welcome this first attempt to put into the hands of the historical student, already overburdened with the secondhand history of textbooks, the means of realizing, in some small degree, the foundation on which his knowledge really rests.

THE TEMPERANCE PROBLEM AND SOCIAL REFORM, by Mr. Joseph Rowntree and Mr. Arthur Sherwell (Hodder and Stoughton, 6s.), is an important book both for the extreme lucidity with which the facts are presented and for its width of view. A close examination has been made of the position of the question in other countries, especially in Scandinavia, and we do not remember seeing any statement so intelligently put of the bearing of the drink question on general social conditions. The elimination of private profit is, broadly speaking, the object which the authors have in view, and their facts and suggestions should certainly be in the hands not only of social reformers but of all electors who wish to form a judgment on the subject.

Mr. Hector C. Macpherson's ADAM SMITH (Oliphant, 1s. 6d.) is the best volume in the Famous Scots Series that we have seen. Mr. Herbert Spencer, we notice, has already welcomed it for its insistence "in these days of rampant Socialism" on the individualistic character of Smith's teaching. The author is not only competent in the necessary matters of metaphysics and economics, but has the special gifts appropriate to the biographer, and has successfully drawn the author of "The Wealth of Nations" in his habit as he lived. Even those who are bored by the Political Economy will be amused by the anecdotes of the absent-mindedness of the political economist who "went out in his dressing-gown to walk in the garden, but happening to step out to the road walked on till he found himself in Dunfermline, just as the people were going to church." We are of opinion, however, that no one but a Scotsman would have called Balliol College, Oxford, "a harsh stepmother to her Scottish sons" on the strength of the story that:—

The first day Smith dined in the Hall at Balliol he fell into a reverie at table, and forgot his meal, whereupon the servitor roused him to attention, telling him he had better fall to, because he had never seen such a piece of beef in Scotland as the joint then before him.

Mr. Ambrose N. Blatchford's IDYLS OF OLD GREECE (Arrowsmith, 2s. 6d.) are evidently suggested by Macaulay's "Lays of Ancient Rome." The book consists of three prose essays leading up to three ballads on three notable Hellenic episodes—to wit, the Battle of Marathon, the Treachery of Pausanias, and the carrying of the good news from Athens to Mitylene. It is, perhaps, unfair to complain that the prose is platitudinous; platitudes are truths that need to be very diligently hammered into the heads of schoolboys. The verse, at any rate, is spirited—not comparable, indeed, with Macaulay's, but quite good enough to give pleasure to the youthful public for which it is intended.

The interest awakened by the publication of Mr. Rolf Boldrewood's reminiscences of the early days of Melbourne in the columns of the Australasian is not surprising. But we doubt whether these reminiscences now published under the title OLD MELBOURNE MEMORIES (Macmillan, 3s. 6d.) will be so successful in England. We must except the few chapters in which Mr. Boldrewood describes his troubles, as a stockman, with the bordering natives, where we catch something of the spirit of adventure and of the romance of the bush, so conspicuous in "Robbery Under Arms." The description of the Melbourne of 1840, which his family helped to found, is also of interest as showing the miraculous changes worked by forty years. But the main part of the book is little more than squatter's "shop," full of somewhat dry dissertations on the merits of different stations.

In IVORY, APES, AND PEACOCKS, by Israfel (Unicorn Press, 5s. n.), we have a chronicle of the travels, mainly in India, of a superior person of the modern style. Our impression of the author is of a man who was, as the Americans say, "born tired." He drags himself wearily across the peninsula, finding fault with every one he meets, and with almost everything that he sees. A single extract will show the tone:—

Anglo-Indians are too palpably men and women. They lack those delicate nuances of sex which distinguish the minor poet and the gentlemanly woman. Like the primary colours, they weary the senses. They are far too definitely sexed to be ever very attractive. For men and women are, without doubt, the most wearying things in the world.

People who like this pose will like Israfel's book, which is not badly written; but we do not imagine that it is a pose that is likely to be popular.

ITALIAN STUDIES.

The Roman forum was for many centuries the centre of the world. Thanks to the explorations of the last hundred years we now know most of its history. The ravages of ignorant rulers, who allowed Papal Rome to be built with the spoils of the past, and of the Renaissance, which removed artistic treasures to decorate its mansions, are irreparable; but the wonder is that so much should have been left above-ground to admire and so much underground to repay researches never more actively prosecuted than since Rome has again become a great capital.

An erudite French Oratorian, Henry Thédénat, has written in LE FORUM ROMAIN ET LES FORUMS IMPÉRIAUX (Hachette, 3f. 50c.) an excellent compendium of all that is now known, and nearly all that is ever likely to be known, of this fascinating spot. He has collated and meditated on the conflicting views of his predecessors, and has probably, in some cases, arrived at what will be a definitive verdict. One third of the book, moreover, entitled "Une Visite au Forum," is designed as a guide to visitors. English readers will note the curious discovery made in 1884 of Anglo-Saxon coins, Peter's pence of the tenth century, secreted, apparently, during some political upheaval, in a house built on the site of the Atrium Vestæ. This singular treasure-trove is overlooked in M. Thédénat's index.

The distinguished Polish scholar, Julian Klaczko, whose "Causeries Florentines" was crowned in 1880 by the French Academy, has written an even more attractive volume, published by Plon—ROME ET LA RENAISSANCE: JULES II. (10fr.). The theme is a splendid one—the moment dominated by the grand figure of Michel Angelo, and rendered memorable, like the age of Pericles, by an equally sudden outburst of genius in the whole range of the arts. M. Klaczko's monograph is a luminous interpretation of the reign of the pontefice terribile. It was not, by the way, Jules II. who called Michel Angelo un uomo terribile, as most modern writers affirm, but Leo X. M. Klaczko defines this word admirably: "by terribile," says he, "the Italians of the sixteenth century meant a certain fougue of character, combined with a great elevation of ideas." The word stands, in fact, as the keynote of the Italian renaissance; and this is more than ever apparent in these studies of the period. The book is illustrated with ten full-page engravings.

The whole problem of archaeological excavations in Italy, which is periodically raised in London and Paris and Berlin, and which has lately been discussed in England in connexion with the transformations of Florence, is the subject of the second volume of ÉTUDES ITALIENNES (Colin, 4f.), a collection of posthumous essays, by M. Aug. Geffroy, formerly director of the French School at Rome. It is the product of the life-long studies of one of the noblest of French scholars. M. Geffroy had become almost inseparable from the "École de Rome." He had educated a whole generation of young Frenchmen, among them M. Georges Goyau, whose memoir of his master in this volume supplements the notices of Ollé-Laprune, the Abbé Duchesne, M. Luchaire, and M. Philippe Berger. As far back as 1848 the future head of the French School in Rome had written an étude on Milton's political and religious pamphlets, and later on he became the great authority in France on the Scandinavian States. His critical studies on Mme. de Maintenon and Marie Antoinette abound in minute discoveries, which have rendered great services to history. In this posthumous volume the quality of the workmanship is still that of the trained scientific critic, but the style is in a high degree alert and engaging. The essay on Savonarola here would of itself suffice to give distinction to a book which contains also an important study on "Les Grandes Médicis," a fresh appreciation of Guicciardini, a not less suggestive essay on "Rome Monumentale," and briefer articles on the "Cenci Legend," and Italian Collectors at the end of the eighteenth century, notably the Piranesi.

Mrs. Arthur Bell is well qualified to introduce to English readers Dr. Reinhold Schoener's work on ROME (Sampson Low, 42s.). She has supplemented her translation with material gathered from various English sources, and produced a sumptuous and very readable volume. The copious illustrations (in wash) have great artistic merit, and we know of no work containing so complete a pictorial representation of the art treasures, the scenery, and the daily life of Rome. This English edition also supplies in its Index an unaccountable omission in Dr. Schoener's work.

A few new features are found in the 1899 edition of that admirable work of reference the STATESMAN'S YEAR BOOK (Macmillan, 10s. 6d.). Among them are some new maps, including one of Newfoundland to illustrate the French Shore question, and some useful tables showing the revenue, expenditure, debt, and debt charge of the principal countries of the world, in absolute figures and per head of population, and other tables showing the gold and silver production of the world. The editor, as heretofore, is Dr. Scott Keltie.

We have just received the MEMOIRS OF SERGEANT BOURGOGNE (6s.) from Mr. Heinemann, an authorized English translation from Paul Cottin's and Maurice Hénault's edition of the French original, which we reviewed last October. The translator, who is anonymous, has well preserved the effect, half weird and half pathetic, of this grim story of the retreat from Moscow, in which the gaiety of the soldiers and their confidence in the Emperor appear in such dramatic contrast to their fate.

THE SHORTER POEMS OF ROBERT BRIDGES, reprinted by Messrs. Bell in 1896 with some additions at 5s. n., are now published by the same firm in a neatly prepared paper edition, price 1s.

We are glad to see a new edition of Mrs. Haweis' invaluable CHAUCER FOR SCHOOLS (Chatto and Windus, 2s. 6d.), which she lived to complete, but not, unhappily, to see published.

In NOTES ON COLOUR, by Professor Clifton (Grant Richards, 2s.), a book in shape like a small sketch-book, and containing about thirty pages of print, will be found some very useful maxims, tersely put, for the guidance of amateur landscape-sketchers.

ENGLISH CATHEDRALS ILLUSTRATED, by Mr. Francis Bond (Newnes), traces in a concise and intelligent way the history of the various Cathedrals and is fully illustrated with photographs on a reduced scale.

CHILD CULTURE IN THE HOME: A Book for Mothers, by Martha B. Mosher (Sampson Low, 3s. 6d.), is one of a large number of treatises recently published on the training of children. It contains, on the whole, sensible though not very profound advice, and the chapters on Punishment and Reward, as well as that on Habits of Childhood, are well worth attention by the mothers to whom the book is addressed.

RECESSIONAL.

God of our fathers, known of old—
Lord of our far-flung battle-line—
Beneath Whose awful Hand we hold
Dominion over palm and pine—
Lord God of Hosts, be with us yet,
Lest we forget—lest we forget!

The tumult and the shouting dies—
The captains and the kings depart—
Still stands Thine ancient Sacrifice,
An humble and a contrite heart.
Lord God of Hosts, be with us yet,
Lest we forget—lest we forget!

Far-called our navies melt away—
On dune and headland sinks the fire—
Lo, all our pomp of yesterday
Is one with Nineveh and Tyre!
Judge of the Nations, spare us yet,
Lest we forget—lest we forget!

If, drunk with sight of power, we loose
Wild tongues that have not Thee in awe—
Such boasting as the Gentiles use
Or lesser breeds without the Law—
Lord God of Hosts, be with us yet,
Lest we forget—lest we forget!

For heathen heart that puts her trust
In reeking tube and iron shard—
All valiant dust that builds on dust,
And guarding calls not Thee to guard—
For frantic boast and foolish word,
Thy Mercy on Thy People Lord! Amen.

THE MIDDLE PLACE.

... "brute beasts that have no understanding."

I.

These beasts that "understand" not, that exist,
Draw breath, enjoy warm sunshine and cool breeze—
That might be free to wander at their ease
And mate, feed, fight, and slumber as they list;
What was the joy in living that they miss'd
Ere man imposed his pitiless decrees
On all poor sentient creatures, and of these
Made slaves and subjects even ere they wist?

Nay, without hope of heav'n or fear of hell,
Knew they not all the fleeting joys we know,
These poor "brute beasts," that mourn'd no overthrow
Of Hope or Love, nor felt Ambition swell
To die in dreams, or Faith, fantastic, glow,
And raised no gods of clay that broke or fell?

II.

We that have made us lords, alike, of brute,
And fish, and fowl, and ev'ry creeping thing:—
That make their necks to bow, and set a ring
Within their nostrils, and by hot pursuit
And torture of them, prove our absolute
And proud dominion; doth such empire bring Release from one dark hour of suffering,
Or sweeten for us Wisdom's bitter fruit?
Lo, we are not as beasts; we "understand"! . . .
Yet we, too, bow the neck beneath the rod
Wielded in silence by the chast'ning hand
Of One we, understanding not, call "God";
Whilst blinder than the beasts in this our night,
We cannot even see the thongs that smite!

III.

To be as fabled gods; to bless and curse,
Reward and punish, fitly make or mar;
Direct the course of ev'ry wandering star,
Command the storm to gather or disperse,
And, unperturbed, to rule the universe;—
Or else, to be as happy creatures are
That roam at large, unpenned by latch or bar,
And grieve for nothing evil or perverse;—
This had been well, but lo, betwixt the two,
Half god, half brute, man takes the middle path
With faltering footsteps and appealing hands;—
Ignorant, vain, yet strong to dare and do—
Oh Lord, be merciful, nor shed Thy wrath,
On one who so obscurely "understands"!

"VIOLET FANE."

Among my Books.

JAMES HOWELL.

There are certain books for which one has a comfortable, easy regard that commits to nothing more than a pleasant acquaintanceship. I do not think that I could really be friends with any one who did not love Charles Lamb; and it is a sore trial, but one which in this generation has to be endured, when people that you care for cannot or will not read the Waverley novels. But it is a matter of complete indifference to me whether my friends do or do not find anything to like in Howell's "Instructions for Forraine Travell." The day when I first read it, in one of Professor Arber's musty but scholarly reprints, is not marked with a white stone; I have forgotten who told me to read it; but I am still grateful for the advice, and I have dipped into the respectable old Welshman a good many times since the first, and never without pleasure. I like the quaint sententiousness and the fine comprehensive spirit of this first handbook to the Continent. Howell tells you what you should do to improve your mind, how you should preserve your religion, what sort of clothes you should wear in each country, and where your morals will be in special danger; he does not pin you down to stupid details about a particular inn, or times and distances of a journey. But those were the days—he published in 1642—when Englishmen "travelled on the Continent"; now they "go abroad." Half one's acquaintance winter every year in Italy, by the Pyrenees, or among the Alps, and never have occasion to speak a word of any tongue but their own; they eat the same dinner in hotels of the same pattern, waited on by the same Swiss or German waiters; but, to do them justice, they do not call it travelling. Travelling nowadays means picnicing uncomfortably among black, brown, or yellow savages; and the successful traveller is he—or she—who gets to a place where no one has ever been before, and where no reasonable person would ever want to be again.

Howell's traveller was a person who wanted to see the cities of civilized men, to know their minds, like Ulysses, and to live their life. He joyfully accepted the changed conditions of existence, and studied to adapt himself to them, doing at Rome as Rome did; not like the modern Englishman, who pervades Europe with his tub and his tweed suit, unmistakable, irreproachable, and serenely conscious that everywhere the best-dressed people are trying to look like him and not succeeding. "Whatever you do, my dear boy, try and keep an English cut," was the exhortation addressed to Daniel Deronda by his respected and respectable patron; and it was prophetically wise; for apparently it is the aspiration of every man in Europe, who values himself on externals, to be "correct" and to have an English cut. Things were very different in the days of Elizabeth and the early Stuarts. Howell needs to caution his traveller against too great an affectation of foreign dress and customs; and his reproof of imported tricks of manner and especially of "a phantastique kind of ribanding themselves" recalls Portia's description of Falconbridge, "the young baron of England." "How oddly he is suited! I think he bought his doublet in Italy, his round hose in France, his bonnet in Germany, and his behaviour everywhere." According to Howell, that is just what a young Englishman on the grand tour was likely to have done, or at least needed to be warned against doing. We have changed all that; but certain characteristics of the race remain constant. A tendency to violent hurry is one of the things that Howell's traveller should learn to shake off, for "the English generally are observed by all other Nations to ride commonly with that speed as if they rid for a Midwife or a Physitian"; and this same half-tolerant wonder is excited to-day by our perspiring energy upon a bicycle. Moreover, says Howell, "In these hot Countreyes one shall learne to give over the habit of an odde custome, peculiar to the English alone, and whereby they are distinguished from other Nations, which is To make still towards the Chimney though it bee in the Dog-dayes." The trait is still recognizable.

Of Howell as a literary man I voluntarily limit my knowledge to this one book—a pamphlet, for it is little more. Others have praised, and I believe have even read, the Epistolæ Hoelianæ, and Sergeant-Major Peter Fisher, Poet Laureate to the Protector (surely the least known of all laureates), declared, in an address to the Reader prefixed to Mr. Howell's Poems upon divers Emergent Occasions that "not to know the Author of these Poems were an Ignorance beyond Barbarism." For my own part

I am content with what Mr. Fisher calls his "Topical and exact way for Forreign Travel," and chiefly with his remarks by the way. Here and there in the work one lights upon a patch of sheer Euphuism, in Lyly's purest manner, which seems oddly belated in the middle of the seventeenth century. "There is no complete and incon-trouled comfort," he writes. "This extends from the Lord to the Laquay, from the Peasant to the Prince, whose Crown is oftentimes inlayed with thornes, whose robe is furred with feares, whereof the Ermine is no ill Embleme, having as many black spots in it as white." This elaborate "hunting of the letter" and this ingenuity of metaphor, puerile as it is, keeps a certain charm. Writing in those days must have been a really amusing business, a sort of sleight-of-hand. Howell helps one to trace the connexion between Lyly's parade of artifice and Bacon's subtler employment of the same devices. He quotes Bacon freely, and he imitates him not without success. "Touching Poets," he writes, "they must be used like flowers, some serve only to be smelt unto, but some are good to be throun into a Limbique and to be distilled; whence the memory may carry away the Elixir of them, for true Poetry is the quintessence or rather the Luxury of Learning." It was a pleasant age also for authors that permitted itself to italicise whatever seemed to the writer specially admirable; and the most effusive lady could not be more lavish in her use of underlining than the ingenuous old Welshman, who, Welsh or not, emphasizes in this way the whole of two pages which he devotes to a eulogy of Great Britain and of the English tongue. But he was Welsh enough to know his own tongue too, for he notes upon the fact that "the old Italian tunes and rithmes, both in conceipt and cadency, have much affinity with the Welsh"; and he quotes an instance of jingling cadence which is like enough to some of the rhyming systems instanced by Dr. Sigerson in his "Bards of the Gall and Gael." But Howell's philology (of which he is somewhat profuse) does not incline one to regard him as trustworthy on points of scholarship. As for his political reflections, they were probably as good sense as any other political reflections in their day, but it is no longer exciting for us to consider whether England should have leant to the side of France or of Spain. What keeps a permanent value in Howell is, first, the insight which he gives us into the curiosity of an older age; for instance, in Switzerland his traveller is bidden to observe the political institutions of "those rugged Republics,"—the Alps are merely an obstacle that has to be got over; and, secondly, his very attractive talent for aphorisms and his picturesqueness of phrase.

Perhaps it may be pardonable, since I do not think that Howell is likely to become widely popular, to exemplify his quaint turns of thought. He has a witty piece of advice to his traveller "not to laugh at his own jest, as too many use to do, like a Hen which cannot lay an egge but she must cackle;" and a very honourable counsel, finely expressed, not to lay upon a nation the vice of a few individuals. "One should," he says,

"Parcere paucorum diffundere crimen in omnes."

And it is a generous kind of civility to report always the best." I admire, also, what Mr. Peter Fisher calls the "vein of poësie," running through Howell's prose "in the concinnity and succinctness thereof," as when he declares that the Hollanders "plow the very bowels of the Deep, the wrinkled forehead of Neptune being the furrowes that yield them increase." Better still, perhaps, is his recommendation to his traveller not to neglect a diary. "For the Penne maketh the deepest furrowes, and doth fertilise and enrich the memory more than anything else."

But chiefly what I like about old Howell—and I find myself coming back to the point whence I started—is his conception of travel. By travel he means moving slowly through other countries, picking up their languages so as to speak them intelligibly though without affectation, and conversing especially with the people of those countries. He does not go on to the Continent to see mountains, or churches, or pictures; he goes to see men and to observe the constitution of States. And when I read his execration of those who "travelled much but saw little, like Jonas in the whale's belly," I wonder if he had a prophetic vision of the train de luxe and the wagon-lit.

STEPHEN GWYNN.

KIPLING AND THE OTHER TWO.

[BY E. KAY ROBINSON.]

We all have, consciously or unconsciously, our favourite numbers, and Mr. Rudyard Kipling's is three. In most of his strongest stories he limits himself to three leading characters, as though he instinctively felt that he could handle that number with most ease and skill. We see the habit crystallized, as it were, in "Soldiers Three," but the influence of the familiar numeral pervades all his work, from his "Schoolboy Lyrics" upwards; and, as nothing exists without a cause, we may ask why it should inevitably have been "Soldiers Three" and not "Soldiers Two" or "Four"? Mr. Kipling supplies a clue in his more recent creation of "Stalky and Co." In a different rank of life, "Stalky and Co." are merely Mulvaney, Ortheris, and Learoyd in their teens. They bear just the same relation to their school as the three immortal Tommies to their regiment. At once its pride and its disgrace, always in trouble and always admired or feared by the others; thoroughly understood and highly valued by any sympathetic spirit placed in authority over them, but an uncommonly awkward team to drive in ordinary harness; pre-eminent in worldly wisdom, but always lagging behind the rest in the routine duty that wins professional or school rewards—in a word, these brilliant black sheep of their respective flocks, "Soldiers Three" and "Stalky and Co.," are the same persons.

And another very marked coincidence deserves notice—namely, that in each of the triple alliances there is one predominant partner standing head and shoulders above the other two in presence of mind, wisdom, and resourcefulness. What "Stalky" is to Beetle and McTurk, Mulvaney is to Ortheris and Learoyd. The stories might, in fact, be re-named "Mulvaney and Co." and "Schoolboys Three" without any loss of aptness; while, if we could drop the three schoolboys a few notes in the social scale and give them the soldiers' variant dialects, we might re-name them Mulvaney, Ortheris, and Learoyd, and read the two works as merely two sections of the lives of the same three characters. Moreover, this analysis of the relation which the individuals of each trio bear to each other holds more or less in all of Kipling's three-charactered tales. In each there is one man of commanding character, such as, to take one instance, Strickland. He is almost always a strange, but grandly sympathetic, figure like Mulvaney, and takes into his confidence and friendship a genial, quick-witted friend like Ortheris. The third person of the trio varies more; he is introduced of set purpose to make the story, but unconsciously to complete the trio. This third person is often the nominal hero, but more often, perhaps, the victim in the narrative; though, apart from the miraculously vivid description of the incidents which befall him, the whole power of the story is concentrated in the delineation of the character of the first person, as "Soldiers Three," in spite of the numerous episodes in which Ortheris and Learoyd are separately concerned, may be described as the history of Mulvaney. Even when Mulvaney is absent his influence is over it all. He is still the captain and the guiding star of "the other two." Strickland similarly dominates all the tales with which he is connected; and we may select, to illustrate this, that terrible nightmare sketch, "The Mark of the Beast." How little we think of Fleete, his sentiments and feelings. The grim resourcefulness of Strickland and his recourse to fearful measures of salvation which the narrator scarcely dares to hint at form the real theme of the story. It is Mulvaney, or Stalky, on another plane, with his confident Ortheris or Beetle dealing with a desperate emergency. Fleete is still Learoyd, although he has been stamped with "the Mark of the Beast," and has become a beast; for we need only to take the story of Greenhow Hill, in which Learoyd conceived a cowardly plan to murder the minister, and imagine the measures which Mulvaney, had he been present, might have been forced to take, with the aid and approval of Ortheris, to cure him of his madness, to have a fair parallel to the story of Fleete's demoniacal possession and its remedy. Stalky and Beetle, too, would have stopped at no half measures had McTurk exhibited symptoms of the influence of the Evil One.

And this comparison carries us to another fact—namely, that the second person in each of Kipling's trinities is, consciously or unconsciously, himself. We are all guided in after-life by the experiences of childhood, and Kipling naturally places himself in the position which he occupied at school, midway between two companions, one of whom he revered as leader. The hero-worship of boyhood never leaves us entirely like the measles or the love of sour apples; and in the attitude of Ortheris towards Mulvaney, or of "I" in the Strickland stories towards Strickland, or of Beetle towards Stalky, we see Kipling's unconscious photographs of his own mind. That the narrative of Stalky and Co.—or, at least, the relation of the conspirators towards their schoolfellows and masters—is founded upon the actual experiences of Kipling's life at school, appears from one of his very earliest writings, "The Dusky Crew," incorporated in a tiny volume which was printed for private circulation in 1881, four years before the first edition of "Departmental Ditties" appeared. The volume is called "Schoolboy Lyrics," and is known to very few, even among the most enthusiastic of Kipling collectors. The opening verse runs:—

Our heads were rough and our hands were black
With the ink stain's midnight hue,
We scouted all, both great and small,
We were a dusky crew.
And each boy's hand was against us raised,
'Gainst me, and the other two.

Here we have a very life-like description of Stalky and Co., written by young Rudyard at the very time when he was the lieutenant in that now world-famous gang. And the accuracy of the likeness grows in the second verse:—

We chased the hare from her secret lair,
We roamed the woodlands through,
In parks and grounds far out of bounds
Wandered our dusky crew.
And the keepers swore to see us pass,
Me, and the other two.

This is a complete epitome of the opening chapters of "Stalky and Co." and leaves no doubt as to the identity of that redoubtable trio with "the Dusky Crew." Among their other achievements, the Dusky Crew grow and eat lettuces and cress "in secret caves in the cold, dark earth," and "The radish red gave sweet repast To me, and the other two." But the hand of fate falls heavily upon them, as it falls at times in the story upon Stalky and Co. :—

Our lettuces are dead and gone,
Our plans have fallen through ;
We wander free in misery,
We are a wretched crew ;
For a master's wrath has fallen on us,
On me, and the other two.

He found our cave in the cold dark earth,
He crept the branches through ;
He caught us all in our Council Hall,
Caught us, a dusky crew ;
To punishment he led us all,
Led me, and the other two.

That this represents a climax of the misfortunes of Stalky, Beetle, and McTurk, at "the Coll.," or —, Kipling, and — at Westward Ho there can be no doubt whatever ; and a triumvirate of schoolboys which included in their number one who could thus versify their disasters must have had mirthful times when fortune smiled upon them. There are men in the Service who distinctly recollect Kipling at school in the "Beetle" days, but none who anticipated the fame that awaited their short-sighted, undersized, and queerly-gifted playmate. To the masters he was a conundrum, but to the "other two"—well, to the other two, he was, mutatis mutandis, what Ortheris is to Mulvaney and Learoyd, the "little man" with the ready tongue and bantam pluck, without whom no good fortune was complete, and with whom no bad luck was beyond alleviation by cheery jest and eccentric philosophy.

If we bear all this in mind we can understand why, with infinite variety of incident and amazing range of fancy, so many of Kipling's tales are built on the same ground plan ; and why the keynote of almost all is hero-worship, and the worship of that class of hero who is the British schoolboy's ideal. With no more respect for authority than is necessary to maintain the good repute of that which you honour—your school, your service, or your country—with no more scruple as to the employment of means than is consonant with the achievement of an honourable end ; but with no meanness and no cowardice—the schoolboy's cardinal sins—and no shirking of the worst, if the worst must come—such are the qualities of Kipling's heroes. Such were Stalky and Strickland and Mulvaney ; and by the side of each stands a figure, sometimes clearly defined, like Beetle and Ortheris, sometimes indistinct like Strickland's confidant and friend, but always the same. Smaller in stature but readier of tongue, faithful to his leader and to his leader's ideals, this is Kipling the schoolboy and Kipling the man.

Compared with Stalky and Beetle, Mulvaney and Ortheris, or Strickland and "I," the third person is the "general utility" man of the company ; and, save in such tales as those already referred to—"On Greenhow Hill," and "The Mark of the Beast," where the third person is the hero or victim of the story—his individuality could be spared from it. Any other person would have done as well. Thus the effect of "the other two" upon Rudyard Kipling and his work may be narrowed down almost to the effect of one only, the leader. Whether as Stalky, Mulvaney, or Strickland, he is a being apart from his kind with virtues revealed to few ; a man hard as nails and straight, where he sees his duty, as a carpenter's rule ; a man without fear or favour ; clear-headed and strong-armed, wise in thought and prompt in action. It may be that, like Stalky, he sets all rules at defiance ; that, like Mulvaney, he puts his foot through the letter of the Ten Commandments ; that, like Strickland, he shrinks from no fracture of the penal code to attain his proper ends ; but he remains a hero, worthy of hero-worship, a figure of superhuman size, with just such virtues as youth admires and just such defects as youth condones. Hence Kipling's enduring preference for the men of action, such men as the Indian Frontier breeds, and such men as we send to rule them. In each of his fine characters we see the incarnation of the ideal Stalky grown to manhood ; by his side we see, either as narrator or companion, the adult Beetle ; and when the third is added, whether Learoyd or another, we merely have unconsciously crystallized, in immortal prose, the schoolboy relations of "Me and the other Two."

Notes.

In next week's Literature "Among my Books" will be written by Mr. Arthur Waugh. The number will also contain an original story by Mr. George Gissing.

It is announced that Mr. Clement K. Shorter has resigned the editorship of the Illustrated London News and the Sketch. The proprietors of those publications will, we should fancy, find it difficult to fill his place. Editors with literary predilections are numerous enough, and so are editors who comprehend and cater for the tastes of the uneducated, or comparatively uneducated, multitude. It has been the distinction of Mr. Clement Shorter that, while circumstances obliged him to aim at a wide popularity, he has, when possible, proceeded towards his goal on literary lines. One can hardly say that the Sketch is conducted to satisfy those whom it used to be the fashion to describe, in capital letters, as Persons of Taste, but there was always something in it—in the literary notes, or in the causeries of Mr. Austin or Mr. Adrian Ross—that Persons of Taste could appreciate. On the other hand, in the Illustrated London News, which appealed to a better public, Mr. Shorter has always been zealous to provide the best in preference to the most popular fiction. Mr. Meredith, Mr. Swinburne, Mr. Hardy, and R. L. Stevenson were among his contributors ; and he is—with, we believe, the single exception of Mr. James Payn—the only English editor who has appreciated the novels of Mr. George Gissing at their true value.

Here is the triolet which Mr. Austin Dobson inscribed in the edition of his works which he gave as a wedding present to Lord Crewe :—

In the duo of Love
There is little libretto ;
There are few rhymes but dove
In the duo of Love,
Yet we prize it above
All your epic falsetto ;
In the duo of Love
There is little libretto.

A large portion of the Advertiser's Exhibition now open at Niagara Hall, Westminster, is taken up with examples of the mechanical processes employed in the illustrating of books. Of the various exhibits those pertaining to line and tone block-making naturally lead the way, and some excellent results are shown. The quantity of illustrations here brought together, quite detached from any printed matter, enables one to judge fairly how great has been the progress in this class of work during the last ten years. There are also a few wood blocks on view, but their presence does little more than emphasize the fact that wood engraving is dying. Time now counts for so much, and where line and half-tone processes reproduce the original sketch of the artist there is, from the commercial point of view, only a very limited field left for the direct hand-work of the craftsman. Indeed, the ease with which illustrations, as here shown, are produced, gives much force to the opinion that in the near future all books issued in any considerable numbers will necessarily be illustrated. The work of the illustrated journal has helped to bring this about, and the proportion of illustrated books is daily increasing, the illustrations in some cases having little or no relevance to the letterpress.

A special feature of the exhibition is the rich display of illustrations in chromo-lithography. This class of work is gradually making its way as a means of book illustration, and the success of the "three-colour" print seems assured. For the reproduction of pictures colour-printing has long been in use, but among the more recent developments the reproduction in colours of covers of books and the elaborate and ornate pages of missals and illuminated M.S. stands as the latest phase of coloured illustrations. Of the cruder forms of colour-printing, especially the picture poster, there are plenty of examples, a whole gallery being given up to a display of the work of Mucha, Dudley Hardy, John Hassall, and various other more or less known Maitres d'Affiche.

Those who have but a playhouse acquaintance with their Hamlet are far from knowing the play as Shakespeare wrote it. To fit it into our modern three hours' traffic of the stage it is needful to make numerous "cuts." The version used is generally very much the same, though, as each new Hamlet comes before the public, he has as a rule some slight alteration to make. Mr. Forbes Robertson, for instance, gave us the Fortinbras scene at the end, which is usually left out. Mr. F. R. Benson's happy idea of restoring all the "cuts" and giving the play last Monday entire lent a special interest to this year's Stratford-on-Avon Memorial week—or rather fortnight—which ends to-day (Saturday), during which, as usual, Mr. Benson's company has been at the Memorial Theatre, giving a round of Shakespearian performances. Both afternoon and evening were given up to Hamlet. From half-past 2 until after 5, and from half-past 7 until 10 an audience which quite filled the theatre followed the long course of the tragedy with the keenest interest and with a generous appreciation that, by the end of the evening, culminated in genuine enthusiasm. Mr. Benson must have felt his enterprise was well rewarded, though he is not likely to add Hamlet as a whole to his touring repertory.

For, interesting as the performance was (there is no record of any such performance since Shakespeare's time), it can scarcely be said that the omission of the passages usually "cut" does much harm to the play. When it is given as Mr. Benson gave it, the author's intent, the motives of the action, the exact shades of character come out more clearly, and there is much poetic beauty and interest in the restored lines. But for ordinary performances some parts must be left out, and it is quite possible to shorten the play intelligently and yet leave the substance of the story intact. Five acts, each occupying about an hour, are too much for the average playgoer's evening. Mr. Benson has a capital company, and the performance was decidedly "good-all-round." Mr. Benson himself is an acceptable Hamlet who has many moments of real excellence. Mr. Frank Rodney was an energetic and yet a restrained Laertes; Mr. Hignett, a young actor of great promise, made Horatio more interesting than usual; while Mr. Oscar Asche was exceedingly good as the King. The experiment took many Shakespearian enthusiasts to Stratford-on-Avon from London, and their general verdict was that the journey had been well worth while. Perhaps Mr. Benson or some other manager may follow up this performance with other entire plays. From the literary point of view such innovations deserve warm encouragement.

In Change Alley, at the Garrick Theatre, Mr. Parker and Mr. Murray Carson have made an interesting attempt to provide a picture of eighteenth-century days, and to show the feeling which expressed itself in the years 1719-20, when the South Sea Bubble grew and burst. They have certainly captured something of the atmosphere of those days, but they have left out the drama. The speculation in the Bubble and the love story of the hero make enough plot for a play, no doubt, but yet the authors have not made a vital play of Change Alley. On Tuesday night Mrs. Tree in costume recited the prologue with excellent point and great charm, but as the play progressed its artificiality, shown even in the names of the characters, "Hearttright," "Parchment," and so forth, made itself felt. There is, however, one "moment" in the course of the play, when Mr. Murray Carson as "Hundred and One," the faithful henchman of the hero, Hearttright, struggles with Parchment (Mr. James Welch) for the possession of "the papers." For a moment these two actors gave a touch of drama, but as for the rest, "'twas leather and prunella." The scenes are delightful, the dresses gay and in excellent taste, the realization of Ward's picture of Change Alley is carefully done, but the play wants concentration. It is not a very hopeful sign of the times that the authors who gave us so clever a play as Gudgeons in their artistic youth should, in their prime, put forward so disconnected a pot-pourri of eighteenth-century vanities as Change Alley and call it a Comedy.

The Royal Literary Fund, the 109th annual dinner of which was held last week, is one of those institutions that have grown slowly from small things to great. The balance-sheet for 1794-95 is before us as we write. It is in striking contrast with the balance of 1898-99, with its £60,000 of invested capital and its revenue of £4,000. This is the state of affairs which it unfolded:—

Balance in hand April 21, 1794	88 19 3
Subscriptions received from April 21, 1794, to April 21, 1795	110 5 0

Sums paid by order of the Committee, on Applications for Relief, within the same Time	86 17 0
Balance, April 21, 1795	£112	7	3

An old pamphlet, which gives an account of the establishment of the Fund, throws melancholy light on the depressed state of the literary industry towards the end of the last century. The institution had its origin in a club that used to meet in the Prince of Wales' Coffee House, Conduit-street. We read:

During the summer recess of the year 1788 an event took place which tarnished the character of English opulence and humanity, and afflicted the votaries of knowledge. Floyer Sydenham, the well-known translator of Plato, one of the most useful, if not of the most competent, Greek scholars of his age, a man revered for his knowledge, and beloved for the candour of his temper and the gentleness of his manners, died in consequence of having been arrested and detained for a debt to a victualler who had, for some time, furnished his frugal dinner.

At the news of this event, every friend of literature felt a mixture of sorrow and shame; and one of the members of the Club above mentioned proposed that it should adopt, as its object and purpose, some means to prevent similar afflictions, and to assist deserving Authors and their Families in distress.

The Fund was started two years later, the first meeting for the election of officers being held on May 18, 1790, and its early donations were naturally very small. We read of five guineas being presented to a widow "with a family of four young children unprovided for." Another widow "of a late Doctor of Divinity" applied for relief and "it was resolved that six guineas should be given her, two guineas at a time, according to the direction of Mr. Deputy Nichols." Another lady is allotted ten guineas for the purpose of sending a prodigal son to a distant country; a foreigner, "author of two ingenious publications," gets five guineas; and the largest of all the donations is twenty guineas, given to a Doctor of Laws, of whom it is recorded that "the difficulties under which he at that time laboured proceeded from the distressed circumstances of a gentleman from whom he used to receive annually a valuable consideration for the services which he rendered him."

It is not often that one hears of a literary undertaking which is able to dispense with the advertisement agent. Americans have been much exercised over the fact that the Ladies' Home Journal has ceased to be advertised as widely as it used to be. It appears that the proprietors (the Curtis Publishing Company) are in the enviable position of owning a literary property which has an assured circulation of 850,000 copies per issue. They are anxious that it should not grow any larger, for otherwise the enormous cost of production entailed thereby would outweigh its receipts, and a loss instead of the present handsome profit would result. Their advertising needs have, therefore, found their limit. The Society for Checking the Abuses of Public Advertising might find it worth while to inquire at what point the consumption of patent soap or pills would produce the same result.

"No Risk" writes:—

The following advertisement (cut from The Times, April 19) would probably interest some of your readers.

TO LONDON PUBLISHERS.—The writer of a novel or romance is desirous of a proposal from a respectable London publisher concerning publication thereof. Writer will not submit MS., but will give satisfactory references concerning character and literary ability. He contemplates production of the book by himself. Address Advertiser, care Samuel Edwin Roberts, No. 10, Paternoster-row, E.C.

Possibly the advertiser is so impressed with the truth of Sir W. Besant's repeated assertion that publishers run no risk that he has decided not even to submit the MS.

By-the-by, as Sir W. Besant is so positive that publishers run no risk in connexion with the work they undertake to produce, it would be interesting to know from such an authority whether managers of theatres are equally exempt from risk when they undertake to produce a new piece.

In connexion with the celebration of Racine's bi-centenary, M. Delisle, the administrator of the Bibliothèque Nationale, has collected for temporary exhibition all the manuscripts, medals, and prints of various kinds dealing with the poet. There are, of course, the principal editions of his works, the first of which is dated 1676, and the MS. of Moreau's music, which was composed for "Esther" and "Athalie." There are copies, too, of the works of Sophocles, Euripides, and Pindar, with notes on the margin by Racine at the age of fourteen. Then, too, there is a copy of Horace with two portraits of Racine on the fly-leaves drawn by his friend, Jean Baptiste.

The following translation of Keats' sonnet, "On First Looking into Chapman's Homer," was included in a lecture delivered last month in Paris by M. Abel Chevalley on "Keats and the Religion of Beauty."

J'ai parcouru longtemps les empires de l'or
Et maints palais royaux m'ont admis à leurs fêtes;
Aux îles d'Occident que je côtoie encor,
Bons féaux d'Apollon, dominent les poètes.
Souvent l'on m'avait dit, qu'infini sous l'azur,
D'Homère aux yeux profonds s'étendait le domaine;
Mais ma poitrine, hélas, en ignorait l'air pur,
Quand j'entendis Chapman enfler sa grand'voix pleine.
Alors je me sentis tel qu'un veilleur des cieux
Quand un astre nouveau point au champ de sa vue,
Ou que le grand Cortez quand roula sous ses yeux
D'aigle étonné la mer Pacifique, et que rien
N'éclairant les yeux fous de ses preux vers la nue, Il se taisait, tout seul, sur un pic, à Darien.

Mr. Sidney Lee has already raised the alarm to English book-lovers over the way in which the Americans are absorbing rare books. During this week there have gone across the water a copy of Kipling's "Schoolboy Lyrics" (published at Lahore in 1881, when the author was still in his teens), realizing £135, and "The Troublesome Raigne of John, King of England," which actually brought £510. These books were sold at Sotheby's. "The Troublesome Raigne of King John" formed the skeleton which Shakespeare vitalized, containing the outlines of the characters of his King John, and most of the principal scenes. The old play is strongly anti-Catholic. This feature of it Shakespeare, of course, ignored. Another Kipling relic was a very rare first edition—in the original wrapper with the front flap—of "Departmental Ditties" (1886), which went for £19 15s. But a first edition of Dickens—of the "Sketches by Boz"—fetched £29. Other items of interest were first editions of the Myles Coverdale and the Cranmer Bibles, sold for £43 and £26 10s. respectively. The latter was only an imperfect copy.

Some interesting relics of the famous Birmingham printer John Baskerville were sold at Sotheby's on the 20th April, as part of the Library of Mr. Samuel Timmins. The demand for speed and economy in reproduction at the present day would have been the ruin of a laborious workman like Baskerville, who made his own ink, paper, and apparatus. As it was, it did not pay him. In one lot at the sale we find him addressing Horace Walpole (2nd November, 1762) with a specimen of his printing Begun 10 years ago at the age of 40, and prosecuted ever since with the utmost care and attention, on the strongest presumption that if I could fairly excel in this divine art, it would make my affairs easy, or at least give me bread. But alas! in both I was mistaken.

This holograph letter is, we are glad to see, valued in the place where he lived, for a well-known Birmingham bookseller, bought it for £28.

There have been many admirers of Baskerville's work and of the large clear type which was sent forth nearly a century and a half ago by the Birmingham press. His quarto classics are beautiful specimens of typography—but they are by no means free from errors. John Baskerville was born in 1706. In 1726 he kept a writing school at Birmingham, and in 1745 went into the business of jappanning and made money, which he spent in the prosecution of his love of letters. At the beginning of this century a book was published on typography and wood engraving, which contains an amusing forecast of Birmingham's future and of the one name which posterity would connect with her.

O Baskerville! the anxious wish was thine,
Utility with beauty to combine,
To bid th' o'erweening thirst of gain subside,
Improvement all thy care, and all thy pride.
When Birmingham, for riots and for crimes,
Shall meet the keen reproach of future times,
Then shall she find amongst our honoured race,
One name to save her from entire disgrace.

Baskerville gave up printing, or nearly so, in 1765.

Among the most beautiful of the productions of the Baskerville press is the Orlando Furioso of Ariosto. Combined with type and paper of great beauty, we have illustrations of unmis-takable excellence by Cipriani, Moreau, Eisen and Monnet rendered by such engravers as Bartolozzi, De Launay, Choffard, and others. One of the less known books, but one most characteristic of the press, is the "Edwin and Emma" published in 1760. The few remaining copies of it were bought by Messrs. Longman, and in 1810 published with a few etchings of Bowes Church in Yorkshire where the unhappy lovers were buried, and a few notes relating to their history. When Baskerville died childless, the types found no purchaser, until in 1779 Beaumarchais of Paris gave £3,700 for them. He established paper mills in the Vosges near his enormous printing establishment at Kehl, whence emanated the celebrated edition of Voltaire's works—the Baskerville type being used. It is said that the type eventually descended to a less distinguished use, and was employed for a daily newspaper, the Moniteur! Baskerville's epitaph contains these lines:—

May the example contribute to emancipate thy Mind from the idle fears of superstition,
And the wicked arts of Priesthood.

which confirm the statement that despite his well-known Royal folio Bible he was himself a Freethinker.

J. S. writes:—

Recently we have been told that Mr. R. L. Stevenson was requested by the editor of the New English Dictionary to explain what the word "brean," which occurred in one of his books, might mean. Mr. Stevenson replied that he was sorry to say that he had not read the proofs, but that "brean" must be a misprint for "ocean." And he sent specimens of his handwriting to show how the mistake might have been made by the printer. One wonders if Mr. J. M. Barrie has been asked to explain what the word "sepad," which occurs very often in the last published edition of "A Window in Thrums," may signify. "I sepad it's there yet." "Ay, I sepad he's mair ashamed o't in his heart than she is." "I sepad it had been bocht cheap second-hand." These are some instances of the word's use. What is meant is—"I'se uphaud" (I'll uphold). But this is surely a very strange and puzzling manner of writing it.

Australian Letter.

CONCERNING THE PAROCHIAL SPIRIT IN COLONIAL LITERATURE.

Lord Beaconsfield, in one of his luminous "asides" in a famous novel, contrasting European and American culture, pointed out that the essential difference between them lay in the fact that, that the art and literature which sprang "from the shores of the Mediterranean," was indigenous and native to the former, whereas they had been simply transported to America; and that accordingly there was something which could only be termed "second-hand and provincial" in Transatlantic Genius. Put less pointedly, but perhaps more philosophically, this is to say, that when we speak of American literature we are merely using a loose phrase to indicate a particular variety of modern English literature, for English literature means all that is of permanent value in the written records of the English tongue.

When we turn from America—our grandest and most magnificent colonial expansion—to Australia, the moral of Lord Beaconsfield's aphorism becomes yet more apparent.

To talk of "Australian literature" in the sense of something distinct from English literature is a patent absurdity. Every Australian poet, novelist, or essayist, who is eventually received into the great Brotherhood of Fame, becomes thereby an additional star in the immortal galaxy of English letters. This has nothing to do with the fact that politically Australia is a portion of the British Empire. If Australia became to-morrow an independent commonwealth her native writers would continue to employ (in their own fashion) the English tongue, and so far as they were capable of attaining to a literature of their own that literature would necessarily be English.

But although it is only natural that our young vigorous offshoots, feeling, perhaps too vividly, that if the Past and even the Present are with us, the Future belongs to them, should aspire to produce what they deem to be an independent indigenous culture, they entirely forget that, so long as they are of English stock and continue to use the racial tongue, they can only—though perhaps under new forms and new methods—follow in the traditions of our common literature and language.

In my former communication on "the Australian Volkslieder," it was my pleasurable task to point out one or two new Australian bush ballad-writers, who, in my judgment, are deserving of some measure of Imperial recognition. I do not wish for a moment to overrate such writers as Paterson and Lawson, or even Gordon, the bulk of whose verses must necessarily pass into that Waste Paper Basket of futurity, which is mercifully labelled "Oblivion." In an age when many men, and nearly all women, scribble and aspire to print, we can hardly expect that the poor burdened souls who are to come after us will pay much heed to the pen-scratchings, save of a few of the very choicest spirits of this age. But, certainly, whether these Australian bush bards are, or are not, to be ranked with the Immortals, they must be reckoned with among the few verse-writers of our own time who have a wide public of their own. In that spirit I wrote of their lilting ballads as the Volkslieder of Australia; though it is highly probable they will, in most cases, be succeeded by other popular Colonial song-writers before the dying century is past, and themselves and their rhymes perhaps be utterly forgotten.

It is, however, when one turns from the bush balladist to the more aspiring class of serious Colonial poets that we become so conscious of what Lord Beaconsfield termed the "second-rate" and "provincial." It is here, too, that Australians require the calmer criticism of those who no longer view literary matters from purely Colonial standpoints. In one of those splendid "love-letters" of Elizabeth Barrett to Robert Browning, recently given to the world, the great English woman-poet makes the following highly-suggestive remarks on "American poets."

"Mrs. Sigourney has just sent me—just this morning—her 'Scenes of my Native Land,' and peeping between the uncut leaves I read of the poet Hillhouse of 'sublime spirit and Miltonic energy' standing in 'The Temple of Fame,' as if it were built on purpose for him. I suppose he is like most of the American poets who are shadows of the time, as flat as a shadow, as colourless as a shadow, as lifeless and as transitory."

These words should be printed in bold type and hung over the desk of every "literary" editor in Australia. It is astonishing to find how far this spirit of parochial self-worship obtains, even in so independent a mind as that of the able editor of the Sydney Bulletin. That redoubtable journalist, who recently boasted that his independent judgment was so unbiased that "even if Shakespeare sent him rubbish he would away with it to the W.P.B.," has recently permitted in his widely read and eagerly believed columns sundry local poets, or rather poetasters, to bepraise one another in the true "Sigourney" style.

It will doubtless surprise many "native-born" Australians to find after the warm welcome bestowed in this country on their mere bush ballad-writers, like Paterson and Lawson, that the canons of English literary taste and criticism reject the more elaborate and pretentious poems of such writers as Mr. Victor Daley and Mr. Will H. Ogilvie. Mr. Daley's volume of verse, entitled "At Dusk and Dawn," and Mr. Ogilvie's "Fair Girls and Grey Horses" are now undergoing a veritable tornado of local "booming," which recalls vividly Mrs. Sigourney's poet Hillhouse with his "sublime spirit and Miltonic energy." What to my mind is far worse is that Mr. Daley is permitted to "puff" Mr. Ogilvie in the "red page" of the Bulletin as though he were greater than Tennyson and Swinburne, while through the same widely circulated medium on the following week Mr. Ogilvie returns the compliment by suggesting that Browning and Byron combined were but as babes to the transcendent Daley. My knowledge of the trenchant methods of the Bulletin assures me that if this kind of thing were done by any of the other Australian journals, the editor's riotous sense of humour, and his unbridled spirit of satire, would be aroused with such effect that the most remote bushman or "swaggy" in the "Back-blocks" would soon be singing ribald rhymes on the inflated Hillhouses of Sydney!

Let me at once say that I do not wish to deny to Mr. Victor Daley's and Mr. Will Ogilvie's songs and lyrics the possession of some literary finish and merit, but as a rule they lack all originality; they are neither truly Australian in character, nor do they stand comparison with the finished work of many a so-called "minor poet" in England who is too often the butt of his less literary acquaintances, and is glad of the smallest recognition at the hands of a cynical and prosaic public. After a careful perusal of Mr. Victor Daley's "At Dawn and Dusk," recently, I found it a real relief—a distinct personal pleasure—to read such delightful booklets as have only lately been produced by many of our minor poets at home, among whom it would be invidious to particularise. I turn to them with pleasure after vainly trying to find all the "sublime spirit and Miltonic energy" which Ogilvie assured me was in Daley, and Daley so emphatically declared illumined the pages of Ogilvie. There are numbers of verse-writers who have falteringly issued their tiny editions from the Bodley Head and elsewhere, in this country, who, in my judgment, are far truer poets than these colonial Hillhouses, whom one regrets to find so able a man as the editor of the Sydney Bulletin week by week overpraising in the true parochial spirit, simply because they are Australian, or produce their poetic wares in the Colonies.

It is here, in my judgment, that what may be called the spirit of a wise Imperialism comes in, and may be as invaluable in literature as in politics. We can all admire the genuine bush ballad "racy of the soil"—as unpretentious as it is vigorous—of such men as Paterson and Lawson. Thousands of verse lovers in England are now as familiar with Gordon's best poems as with the work of almost any English poet of the day; but it is too much to expect that the Colonial standard will be blindly accepted in England, in so far as concerns poets and poetry, not soaring above what has been styled "suburban imitations" of Tennyson or Wordsworth, Byron or Shelley.

A. PATCHETT MARTIN.

The following letter, which we recently received from Mr. H. T. Johnstone, who writes from Killinear Cottage, Latrobe Terrace, Geelong, Victoria, we are glad to print as it has some interest for students of literature all the world over whose tastes outrun their purses. Mr. Johnstone calls it "A Poor Man's Library in Australia":—

"The facile and patronising enumeration by the well-to-do of the blessings of poverty carries no conviction; but those advantages, the existence of which the poor man himself admits, may well be taken to be benefits indeed. In the matter of books, alas! in how many others, the poor man doubtless suffers divers disadvantages and difficulties; but here, at least, he is not without his compensation. From what surfeit of unwholesome, or, at best, worthless reading may not poverty secure a man! From what risks of swamping his mind in sloughs of third-rate books about the first-rate books! The masterpieces in his possession his poverty bids him re-peruse, in preference to spending money as well as time upon that which profiteth not. Further, his poverty guides him not only in his rejection, but in his choice. He pauses when making a purchase to consider that the book he buys is to be read and read again—a consideration that points to the great classics of literature. One middling work is not ousted, half-read, by another, to be, in its turn, displaced by a third. I am far, indeed, from affirming that every poor scholar does learn and inwardly digest these lessons; but he is at least more likely so to do than is the wealthy reader; for to the wealthy they are whispered only by the still small voice of reason, unsupported by the rough remonstrances of her ill-favoured ally.

"Out here in Australia the torrent of books is much less tumultuous than at home; and here then, alike for rich and poor, the risk of being swept away in the flood is diminished. To say truth, indeed, research on many a subject is difficult for lack of books, and especially so to those who cannot afford to send home for what they need. Nor is there to be found in these regions any public library of the first order. Those of Melbourne City and of Sydney University are perhaps the best we have.

"For building up his own little private library the resources of the poor man are mainly two—the cheap reprints of standard classics, and the second-hand bookshop. Gratitude, sincere and deep, is assuredly due to those who have given us these cheap editions. Let me illustrate, by looking round my own shelves, what may be done by the expenditure of but twenty shillings:—Shakespeare (Leopold), Milton, Spenser, Chaucer (Globe)—this last, it is true, I have not yet afforded myself, but hope to do so ere long (if, for example, this article of mine is accepted by the Editor)—Gray (Routledge), Pope, Coleridge, Wordsworth, Keats, Shelley (Canterbury Poets). This is a list which will serve to show what the poor man may possess in neat and well-printed editions at an outlay of a single sovereign. What a very wealth of lofty ideal, profound thought, consummate art! Take, again, another illustration—a selection this time of English prose, purchasable for an equal sum—I may observe in passing that out here we do not receive the benefit of those liberal 'discounts' with which you fortunate folks at home seem to be favoured—Addison's Spectator (Morley—an admirable edition), Macaulay (Longman's), Disraeli's 'Curiosities of Literature' (Routledge), Sir Thomas Browne, Lowell's 'Study Windows' and 'Old English Dramatists,' Johnson, Leigh Hunt, Hazlitt, De Quincey (Camelot), Lamb, Bacon (Routledge), Cowley, Dryden, Sir P. Sidney (National Library).

"But that the publishers and editors of some of these editions are in one point deserving of grave animadversion I am forced, notwithstanding all my gratitude, to perceive and to assert. Let me fortify myself in the performance of this ungracious duty by appealing to the authority of Lord Macaulay. 'We love,' thus he expresses himself, 'we love, we own, to read the great productions of the human mind as they were written.' And again, 'what man of taste and feeling can endure harmonies, refaccimenti, abridgments, expurgated editions?' So, too, in the words of another able and discerning critic (Mr. Birrell), whose works I deeply regret being unable to reckon 'Among My Books'—'The motto of all books of original genius is, "Love me, or let me alone."' The gist of my complaint will already have been manifest. If a publisher does not care to bring out a great work in the shape its author gave it when he breathed into its nostrils the breath of life, that publisher's course is clear. He is no way bound to publish it. But assuredly he is bound not to maul and maim and mutilate it. Such is the decision of the artistic conscience, yet, if that decision be disregarded, must the dictates of plain, common honesty be likewise set at nought? Some of these editions have the fact of the mutilation obscurely hinted in a corner of a preface or introduction, as in an edition of 'Tristram Shandy,' which is hacked and hewn almost beyond recognition. Is this honesty? There are cases worse even than this. Once I spent more shillings than I could easily afford upon a copy of Gibbon's 'Decline and Fall,' trusting in the words 'Verbatim Reprint' upon the title-page; yet afterwards I discovered, to my indignation and disgust, that the words I had trusted in were—false.

"Having thus vented my bile, let me return in pleasanter frame of mind to more congenial topics. Let us glance at the other resource of the poor man, the second-hand bookstall. In this mine my own burrowings have been most successful in the department of Classical Literature. Look, for example, at that copy in three volumes, morocco-bound, of Livy's eloquent and fascinating narrative: I had it for 4s. And those Delphine editions, in calf, with their useful indexes and helpful notes—Virgil, Horace, Cæsar—2s. each. And those volumes of Aristotle and of the great Greek dramatists—about eighteenpence apiece. But my most brilliant success in these explorations has yet to be narrated. Continually, though in vain, had I longed for the complete works of Cicero—a library in itself of old-time eloquence, philosophy, and learning; a possession indispensable to him who would gain any entrance within the realm of Classical Scholarship. At length my opportunity arrived. There is the copy—ten stout little volumes, bound in half calf, looking 'as good as new'; these I secured for—was it not a bargain?—seven-and-sixpence!

"Of all the Latin poets Horace is my favourite, and next to him Ovid; and I often wish that I could see these old, eternally young writers treated from time to time, not technically by professed scholars, but out of the fulness of the heart by those who love them; by those who are moved, by long, familiar converse, to draw up a faithful record of the impressions which that converse has matured."

JOACHIM DU BELLAY.

Those readers who happened to glance through the list of the wedding presents given to Lord and Lady Crewe last week must have been interested to note the number of books which figured in it. No doubt it is to Lord Crewe's hereditary taste for letters that this fact is attributable. The son of a poet, he has written himself with credit in both verse and prose, and our readers will, no doubt, remember his interesting contribution to our series "Among My Books." Still, one cannot but hope that the list may become a precedent, and that people will remember that books can be far more distinguished and acceptable presents than a multiplicity of silver knick-knacks. This is the more likely to be the case, because the Prince of Wales headed the list of those who gave books with a copy of the works of Joachim du Bellay. That second star of the Pléiade was once very popular in England; Spenser made his first essay in verse with a translation from

Bellay, first garland of free Poesie

That France brought forth, though fruitful of brave wits.

With the usual enthusiasm of a young poet for his model, Spenser predicted "endless days" and "praise Excelling all that ever went before" to Du Bellay. His fame, indeed, never suffered so absolute an eclipse as that of his companion star of greater magnitude, Ronsard. But it is rather under a cloud in England to-day, and a good many people may have been incited by the announcement of the Prince of Wales' gift to ask themselves what were the exact achievements of Joachim du Bellay. It may be worth while to attempt a brief answer to this question, although Du Bellay himself had so hearty a scorn of the type of "courtier poet" that he studiously held aloof from Royal favour in his lifetime.

The esteem in which Joachim du Bellay was once held may be judged from the fact that his birth, which fell about the time of the Battle of Pavia, was said to be intended by Providence as a compensation to France for that disaster. Unfortunately, there are no scales in which two such events can be weighed against one another, although Matthew Arnold did try to institute a somewhat similar comparison between Shakespeare and our Indian Empire. In modern days Du Bellay's fame has been quite overshadowed by that of his friend and master, Ronsard. It is impossible to determine the exact shares taken by the two men in that development of French literature in the sixteenth century, which has been justly said to have no parallel in literary history, except the similar movement headed by Victor Hugo, Dumas, and Sainte-Beuve in 1830. Sainte-Beuve's first book was an essay upon French poetry in the sixteenth century, in which he dealt mainly with the epoch-making work of the seven writers, headed by Ronsard, "prince of poets," and Du Bellay, who were known as the Pléiade—a name that Ptolemy Philadelphus and Charlemagne had previously given to similar poetical associations. It is not easy to find elsewhere an instance of so strong an impression being deliberately stamped on a nation's literature by a handful of friends and fellow-workers as France has twice afforded, in 1550 and 1830. The work of the Pléiade, indeed, is unique in this respect, and gives us the only realization that we know of Balzac's brilliant dream of the cénacle of the Rue des Quatre Vents.

There is something very charming to the literary student in the well-known story of how the young poets, Ronsard and Du Bellay, Belleau and Baif, and the others shut themselves up from the world—of which two, at least, Ronsard and Du Bellay, had seen too much—for seven years of study and seclusion at the College de Coqueret, whose head, Daurat, was seduced by their ideas and became a star in the constellation. Impetuous youth is scarcely so patient in these days. Thence Ronsard and his friends broke out, as a contemporary said, like the Greeks from the wooden horse to take Troy captive and imprint a lasting mark on its very language. It was Du Bellay who had the honour of leading the attack. His prose work, the "Défense et Illustration de la Langue Française," which was published in 1549, was to the Pléiade what Victor Hugo's preface to "Cromwell" was to the men of 1830. The purpose of this work, which may still be read with pleasure and interest, was to show how the New Learning could be applied to the ennobling and beautifying of the vernacular. In other countries the revival of letters had rather led to the contempt of debased modern tongues. Their scholars preferred to write in Greek or Latin. Hence, for instance, arises much of the artistic inferiority of German to other western languages. Du Bellay urged his countrymen not to content themselves with reading the classic authors so lately made accessible, nor to attempt to copy them in their own tongues, but to draw from them lessons for the improvement of French. Many of his arguments now seem false in the light of experience. Some of the consequences of his advice undoubtedly gave room for the ridicule of envious people like Mellin de St. Gelaïs and sensible people like Rabelais, whose Limousin scholar talks a "Babylonish dialect" that is outdone by some of the verses of Ronsard's disciples. But, on the whole, there is no doubt that Du Bellay's warning against the hackneyed forms—épigrammes, he calls them—of the ballade and rondeau, as against the facility and undistinguished fluency of the popular writers of the first half of the sixteenth century was exactly what French literature needed to carry it over the pathless tract between Villon and Malherbe, and that the remedies he proposed were the right ones. Boileau treated the Pléiade with contempt, and the eighteenth century ignored it; but without the labour and genius of Ronsard and Du Bellay the age of Louis XIV. would undoubtedly have been shorn of its literary glories.

Du Bellay himself was not fated to take a leading part in the revolution which he announced: weak health and premature death were his portion. Yet there is fine and characteristic Renaissance work in the Sonnet Series which Spenser translated, and some of the "Jeux Rustiques" still charm us. Amongst these is the one poem by which Du Bellay is still known to others than students, the "Winnower's Hymn to the Winds," an exquisite trifle, full of haunting melody, with which this notice may fitly end. Thus it goes:—

A vous, troupe légère,
Qui d'aile passagère
Par le monde volez,
Et d'un siffiant murmure
L'ombrageuse verdure
Doucement ébranlez,

J'offre ces violettes,
Ces lis et ces fleurettes,
Et ces roses ici,
Ces vermeillettes roses
Tout fraîchement écloses,
Et ces œillets aussi.

De votre douce haleine
Eventez cette plaine,
Eventez ce séjour,
Ce pendant que j'ahanne
A mon bled que je vanne
A la chaleur du jour!

CODEX BEZÆ.

If it was really necessary to produce another facsimile of Codex Bezae, it was obviously the duty of Cambridge—the University to which the reformer presented his famous MS.—to undertake the task. And the beautiful specimen pages sent to us are evidence of the University's legitimate pride in its treasure. There is only one fault to be found with the work, and that is the very obvious one that the necessity for its appearance is not apparent. Scholars already had what they needed, if not in such a perfect form as the present, yet in one which for all practical purposes was quite sufficient. Codex Bezae is one of the oldest N.T. manuscripts extant, dating as it is believed to do from the end of the fifth century; but, except perhaps, with regard to the text of Acts, its critical authority does not stand very high. It abounds in arbitrary alterations which have an obvious origin merely in the scribe's caprice. Thus, for example, with regard to the rival genealogies, all discrepancy is taken away by the simple process of omitting St. Luke's list of names and putting St. Matthew's in their place. On the other hand, the value of this manuscript stands far higher than it did twenty years ago. Its coincidences with the "Old Latin" and "Old Syriac" version of the Gospel, made circa A. D. 170, have been more widely recognized. It has been realized that they belong to the same group—a group which branched off in the middle of the second century. Under such circumstance there is, a priori, every likelihood that this group would, at least occasionally, preserve an older and more original text. And readers will remember how widely this was felt to be the case two years ago with regard to that startling termination to St. Matthew's genealogy in the Lewis Codex—"Joseph begat."

Of the numerous interpolations in the "Old Latin" the Codex Bezae has few. On the other hand, it inserts a completely new incident of its own in Luke vi. :—

And on the same day, seeing a man ploughing on the Sabbath, he said to him, Man, if indeed thou knowest what thou doest, thou art blessed and a keeper of the law, but if thou knowest not, thou art accursed and a breaker of the law.

The origin of these interpolations is one of the most interesting questions which a study of the Codex Bezae brings with it.

By far the most important part of the subject concerns the text of Acts. Here the deviations from the received text are more numerous than in the Gospels, but of a far more authentic-looking character. Peculiarities of phraseology have recently led Dr. Blass—whose verdict, if violently attacked, has been widely endorsed—to conclude that in Codex Bezae we actually have St. Luke's first edition.

While expressing all admiration for the style and "heliogravure" of the new volume, it is difficult not to wish that the Cambridge authorities had applied their lavish expenditure in a direction where there is a genuine stress—viz., to editing the "Old Latin." The insurance excuse mentioned, that for the future it will not matter if Codex Bezae be burned, does not seem quite adequate. At any rate, such an argument would apply with far more force in the case of the "Old Latin," the chief MS. of which does not seem to have ever been copied quite accurately, and is now falling to pieces.

Obituary.

EDWARD SHERIDAN PURCELL.

The death of Mr. Edward Sheridan Purcell revives the memory of a recent and somewhat acrimonious literary controversy. Mr. Purcell, it will be remembered, was the author of the Biography of Cardinal Manning which appeared in 1896, and he did not, any more than Froude when writing of Carlyle, discharge his task in the servile spirit of a hero-worshipper.

I have [he announced in his preface] suppressed no facts material for the elucidation of truth or the manifestation of character, withdrawn no letters or documents lest, in bearing witness to facts or events in his life, such letters might haply give offence to the timid or the weak, or to them that shun publicity as bats shun the light of day.

The result of this policy was that certain frailties (and more particularly certain inconsistencies) of the Cardinal were exhibited in at least as strong a light as his piety, and his executors took the matter up. They represented that Mr. Purcell had obtained the Cardinal's papers from them on false pretences, that it was only considerations of expense that had prevented them from taking measures to restrain the publication of them, and that they considered the so-called "biography" did not do justice to Cardinal Manning's "high and noble character." To this indictment Mr. Purcell replied with spirit, declaring that the Cardinal had expressly chosen him as his biographer because he knew that he was no mere incense-burner, adding:—

Cardinal Manning was the shrewdest of men. He had thoroughly gauged public opinion in England. None knew better than he that any attempt to bowdlerize his Life, to suppress facts and letters, conflicts and differences—such as those with his fellow Bishops and the Chapter of Westminster, or with John Henry Newman, whose relations with Cardinal Manning were a matter of common knowledge long before the Life was published—would provoke general mistrust and suspicion. Such an ignoble and dishonest attempt at concealment must needs, as Cardinal Manning well knew, damage his own reputation for honesty and fair dealing.

Further than that the controversy did not get. Mr. Purcell effectively cleared himself of the charge of using documents which he had no right to use; but the discretion with which he used them still remains a matter on which the opposite opinion to his own is tenable.

M. ÉDOUARD PAILLERON, author of Le Monde où l'on s'ennuie, and Academician, died last week in Paris at the age of sixty-five, and with him disappears one of the most characteristic of French writers for the stage. More certainly than any of his colleagues at the Academy M. Pailleron was, as a dramatist, in the French tradition. Sardou is an incomparable master of stage effect, but his plays are not literature; Dumas fils, tormented by philosophic and social problems, produced pieces which form an interesting portion of the literary output of our time, but they lacked style, they were wanting in the French distinction; M. de Bornier, who gave at the funeral on Saturday a touching appreciation of Pailleron, is a formal classical dramatist of quite another school; and Pailleron stood alone. He was a sort of modern Beaumarchais with, as M. Larroumet has pointed out, a touch of the Marivaux grace, and this suffices to make his disappearance a real loss.

The estimate of Pailleron by the venerable Henri de Bornier is so just that we translate the most characteristic passages:—

He was of that strong race of writers of comedy sprung as it were from the Paris soil, like Molière, Regnard, Beaumarchais, Scribe, Alexandre Dumas fils, Eugène Labiche, Meilhac, and many another. It is worth noting that the great writers of comedy are almost all Parisians, whereas the masters of tragedy are almost all provincials, from Corneille and Racine to Ponsard. Edouard Pailleron had, indeed, the verve, the gift of observation, gained by the spectacle of Parisian life, a verve often insistent and even a little overbearing, but not without emotion and pity. . . . Gaiety! Pity! These are perhaps the two boundaries of comedy, boundaries less far apart than they seem. Were it not so, comedy would be utterly inhuman, and instead of correcting men would irritate them.

Pailleron began life rich and handsome. He was destined by his family for the law, and wrote, in fact, his first play, Le Parasite, which appeared at the Odéon in 1860, in a notary's office. In 1863 he married the daughter of Charles Buloz, the founder and editor of the Revue des deux Mondes. Until the rise of the author of Cyrano, no young writer of the Parisian world had started out so brilliantly. At thirty, his future seemed assured. His salon was the centre of all that was notable in the social and artistic life of Paris. Yet already it was le monde où l'on s'ennuie. Owing to his relations as son-in-law of Buloz and as Academician, and to his wealth, as well as to his real kindness and urbanity, no man in Paris was more courted than Pailleron and none had a greater social influence. The Hotel Chimay, on the Quai Malaquais, where he received all the most famous personages in Paris, became historic by his sojourn there, and he shed an equal lustre over the mansion at the corner of the Rue du Bac and the Quai D'Orsay, whither he took refuge when expropriated by the École des Beaux Arts. A fate seemed to hang over him, however, hunting him, in a spirit of tragic unrest, from domicile to domicile. Only the other day he was expelled from his second home by the arrival in the heart of Paris of the workmen whom the Orleans Railway Company have sent up and down the quais, ousting the bouquinistes, uprooting trees, and destroying the beauty of the ancient river banks. Pailleron fled to the Parc Monceau, but it was only to die. Like Mme. Michelet, the other day, he never could adapt himself to the new surroundings. Pailleron had not a single happy moment after his departure from the river. He dreaded something vague in store for him. He had ceased to write, and life for him was ended. M. Brunetière, in speaking at Pere Lachaise on behalf of the Revue which he edits, defined Pailleron's work as "French, average middle class, and Parisian." The criticism is sufficiently complete. It explains why Pailleron is likely to hold the place which his masterpiece gave him, and of which his other plays, Cabotins, L'Age Ingrat, Faux Ménages, and L'Élincelle certainly did nothing to deprive him.

Only at this latter end of the nineteenth century can it be said with truth that the voice of the last of the Irish bards is hushed in silence. MICHAEL HOGAN—an untutored poetic genius, sprung from the peasant class—who died at Limerick on April 19, was known throughout Ireland as "the Bard of Thomond," and he had every right to that historic title, and to the unique place in Irish literature which it gave him. In ancient Ireland every clan—indeed, almost every noble family—had its bard, to whose poetic powers they looked for songs of joy on occasions of festivity ; for inspiring exordiums before going into battle ; for comfort in times of affliction ; for the whipping of their enemies with the lash of satire ; for widespread renown during life ; for the record in immortal verse after death of their heroic achievements in war, or their wise and beneficent deeds as chiefs and rulers. Michael Hogan fulfilled all these functions for the ancient Kingdom of Thomond in Clare and Limerick, during the latter half of the nineteenth century. He described in fiery sulphurous language the battles and frays of the ancestors of the people of Thomond, he enshrined in verse the legends of their ruined castles and abbeys, and the fairy associations of their vales and hills and streams ; he also sang in hyperbolic strains the exalted virtues of certain of the citizens of Limerick and the territorial gentry ; and savagely lampooned others who were generally unpopular, or against whom he nursed a personal grievance, real or imaginary.

This interesting and remarkable man was born at Thomondgate, a suburb of Limerick, on November 1, 1832. His father was a wheelwright and carpenter earning very precarious wages. Young Hogan was taught at the Christian Brothers' Schools, and after he had worked for nine years in a flour mill he tried his fortune in the field of letters. He had 600 copies of a poem entitled "The Light of Munster" printed in pamphlet form and succeeded in disposing of the bulk of the booklets at a shilling each by hawking them through the streets of Limerick. In order to dispose of the "remainders" he tramped on foot through the counties of Limerick, Cork, Tipperary, and Waterford, selling an odd copy of his poem here and there among the farmers, or presenting it in return for a meal or a night's lodging. But the mission was not a financial success. He returned penniless to Limerick at the end of eight months, and went back to his old employment in the flour mill. It was not until 1862, after he had passed eighteen or nineteen years in the mill, that he was able to devote himself entirely to literary pursuits. In a poem called "The Bard's Protest," written long after the publication of "Shawn-na-Scoop"—a series of metrical satires—he mercilessly assailed, like the bards of old, those at whose hands he received any slight, and told of his early years of severe toil and drudgery. "The Lays and Legends of Thomond," the work by which Hogan will be best remembered, were published in parts over a long series of years, and were finally included in one volume which Messrs. Gill and Son, of Dublin, brought out in 1880. According to a characteristic introduction to his work, regally signed "Thomond," Hogan's experiences with publishers were unfortunate :—

Twelve years ago [he writes] I made my first advance in the market of letters, and was remorselessly fleeced by a printer's devil who stormed my air-castles, broke through the entrenchments of Mount Helicon, sacrilegiously seized on the chattels of the sacred Nine, and drove me from the ramparts without the honours of war. I was not much dispirited at such an unexpected repulse, for poetry lost nothing of its enjoyment, and the Muse waved a bolder wing than ever, and now I again enter the poetic arena to fight for fresh laurel boughs.

The book was well received in Ireland, and with a view of pushing its sale among the Irish in the United States the bard left for that country in 1886 ; but the mission was financially disappointing, and Hogan returned to Limerick, destitute. The Corporation, however, came to his rescue. They created a sinecure office, called "The Rangership of the Shannon's Banks," and gave it to the bard with a salary of a pound per week, which, at least, kept him from indigence in the last years of his life. One of Hogan's poems, strongly reminiscent of Moore, is addressed to the river Shannon :—

Oh, my spirit floats back in a vision of joy
To the days when I stray'd on thy green banks, a boy,
When my heart, like the linnet that chants in the dells, Gush'd out into song as it drank of thy spells !

We know not the worth of its sweetness and truth,
While we bask in the beams of the spring-bloom of youth ;
Till out on life's turgid sea, shipwreck'd and toss'd
We look back in tears to the Eden we lost.

Mr. EDWARD TRUELOVE, having lived to be nearly ninety, had outlived his celebrity by many years. He was a disciple of Robert Owen and a Chartist, but he was best known as an associate of Charles Bradlaugh and Mrs. Besant in the days when Mrs. Besant did not believe in miracles. He published Malthusian pamphlets—among others the notorious "Fruits of Philosophy," for their connexion with which Bradlaugh and Mrs. Besant stood their trial in 1877. But his case differed from theirs in that he had to suffer imprisonment for his opinions. He was also prosecuted for a pamphlet which he published attacking Napoleon III., but that prosecution was abortive. Mr. Truelove kept a bookseller's shop in Holborn.

The news comes from Berlin of the death of Professor HEINRICH KIEPERT, whose ancient atlases are so well and widely known. Born in 1818, he had been head of the Geographical Institute at Weimar, and had held his Berlin professorship for forty years.

FICTION.

The Fowler. By Beatrice Harraden. 7½ x 5¼ in., 355 pp. London, 1899. Blackwood. 6/-

Reputations have their price and Miss Beatrice Harraden, who has written a novel of some merit in "The Fowler," must expect to find it suffer by comparison with "Ships that Pass in the Night." The truth is that it differs from that highly successful little story as a dexterous copy differs from a vigorous original. The former work gave one all the impression of a transcript of actual experience ; it seemed to be a thoroughly typical specimen of that "one novel" which everybody is supposed to have in him. What has been given us now is the result of a process not of evolution but of self-projection ; the author has had to look outward instead of inward for the materials of her plot and the models of her principal characters ; and this is to attempt a feat of a much more arduous character than the production of the "one novel," and requiring much rarer powers. That Miss Harraden is lacking in these powers it would be premature, and therefore possibly unjust, to affirm ; but it can be safely said that if she possesses them they are at present undeveloped. Her story is weak in construction and not particularly strong in characterization ; her personages, with, perhaps, the one exception of the heroine's father, have been imperfectly realized. A more serious drawback still is that the least actual and credible of her characters is the very one upon whom the whole story hinges. Mr. Theodore Bevan, "The Fowler," who spreads his net for the female sex and for a long time holds Nora Penstone entangled, is a "villain" whose wiles are somewhat too mysterious and remote from the ordinary experience of mankind to command our belief, still less to hold our interest. The little man with the "coldly, subtly cruel face," who impresses every one with his extraordinary abilities though without ever giving any proof of them, and who exercises a mysterious power which every one feels, many resent, but few successfully resist, was a familiar if a fantastic figure of the feminine novel of the "pre-emancipation" days. It is amusing to meet him brought up-to-date in such a passage as this :—

No one had ever seen the writing, at which he seemed to hint thus vaguely, but it was taken for granted that he was one of the leader-writers on an important daily newspaper—perhaps The Times. Perhaps he was ; he claimed nothing for himself, he merely inferred.

It was a comically easy way of acquiring a reputation :—

All the claiming was done by people who believed him capable of anything, and several times when successful books had appeared anonymously he had been charged with the authorship, and he had merely smiled and shrugged his shoulders, inferring by his manner that people might think whatever they choose.

Of course, what Miss Harraden really means is that Mr. Bevan's manner "implied" that he was the author, and that the "inferring" was done by other people ; but her way of expressing this shows to our regret that, though she usually writes correct

English, she can occasionally lapse into one of the common inaccuracies of the lower "journalists."

The object with which this Mephistophelean leader-writer weaves his spells around Nora, as previously around two other ladies, is not made any too clear to us, though he keeps a diary in which he methodically records the progress of his obscure machinations, and which, falling into the hands of his latest victim, enables her to shake off his influence. But it is equally uncertain what he does or how he does it. The Fowler, as he is called, is not engaged in that pursuit to which Burns referred when he cynically described himself, to Mr. Stevenson's indignation, as an "old hawk at the game." The game, on the contrary, is one which Burns would have regarded as a ridiculous waste of time. "What he cared for most in life," said one of his earlier subjects, was "to tame people, or find out their weaknesses, distort their virtues, and leave their mental and moral individuality in ruins." And, a little later, she states her own personal experience thus:—

He weaned me away from all my old friends and my old pleasures and brought discord between me and my dear old aunt who could not bear the sight of him. He made me behave shamefully to her. He and I together spoilt the peace and comfort of the last year of her life. I realized that when it was too late.

Nora Penstone has not got a dear old aunt, but she has a still closer relative in an old father to whom she is deeply attached, and "The Fowler" makes her behave if not shamefully at any rate very coldly and unkindly towards him. She, a girl who is represented as being of brilliant intelligence and no inconsiderable force of character, turns her back upon the distinguished historian whom she is more than half a mind to marry, and who has all the mind to marry her; becomes estranged, as has been said, from her father, and is quite prepared to break with all her friends; loses interest in her former ideals, abandons her optimism for pessimism, and exchanges her faith in human nature for the most cynical views of men and their motives—and all this because it is "willed" by a man who is not even stated to have possessed any of the powers of the ordinary hypnotist. Decidedly Mr. Theodore Bevan does not "palpitate with actuality." The story is well written, the dialogue natural and animated, and perhaps we ought to have excepted the character of Nurse Isabel—the pretty, slightly frivolous, but warm-hearted woman of the world who has taken up nursing without any real vocation for it—from our remark as to the general lack of vitality among the characters. But this lifelessness and the unreality of the motive is what the book suffers from. Miss Harraden must endeavour to free herself from the tendency to which it testifies, and come once more into closer touch with nature and life.

Three of Mr. Rolf Boldrewood's novels, "The Crooked Stick," "Plain Living," and "The Sealskin Cloak," have just been reissued by Messrs. Macmillan in a uniform red binding at 3s. 6d. each.

CANADIAN COPYRIGHT.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—In my letter to you on the subject of Canadian copyright I said that one of the points on which I should personally be inclined to insist was "that the question should be treated as Imperial, and settled by an Imperial statute, the special requirements of Canada and the other Colonies, being of course, fully and respectfully considered." Your comment upon this is that my proposition that the question ought to be settled by an Imperial statute does not admit of argument, it having been pointed out by the Canadian High Court that the rights conferred by the Imperial Act of 1842 cannot be taken away or modified by any legislative body other than the Imperial Parliament so long as Canada remains an integral portion of the British Empire.

I do not stickle for any special form of proceeding. I only desire that the Copyright Question shall be treated as Imperial, not delegated without control to Colonial Legislatures little interested in science or literature and apt to be swayed by the "manufacturing" vote.

You have not parted, I presume, with the supreme legislative power. If an Act of the Imperial Legislature regulating Colonial jurisdiction is found to defeat its own object, as it certainly would if it licensed piracy, it can, I presume, be amended by the same authority by which it was made.

Besides, you unquestionably have the Imperial veto on all Acts of a Colonial Legislature which contravene Imperial policy, as a Colonial Act apparently would if it broke the convention of Berne.

If, as some have contended in relation to this question, there is no such thing as an Imperial Legislature, the Empire is dissolved. Nothing remains but a league; and a league under conditions very onerous to the Mother Country, which is solely charged with the defence.

I have, personally, no appreciable interest in this question. I only desire to see justice done to literature, science, and art.

Yours faithfully,

April 11, 1899.

THE CUCHULLIN SAGA.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—Will you pardon my pointing out that the friendly critic of Miss Hull's "Cuchullin Saga" has somewhat misapprehended the purport of her labours. Her aim was to collect translations (for the most part extant, but in some cases made specially for this volume) of the chief stories respecting the hero, not to attempt an imaginative retelling of his legend. These stories are themselves of diverse dates and exhibit very marked differences of style, differences which are necessarily reflected in the English versions. The variations in spelling of proper names are due to differing methods of transliteration followed by the translators, a fact carefully explained by the editor, Miss Hull.

The object of the work being an exact English rendering of certain Irish texts, it was impossible to use Mr. Standish O'Grady's magnificent "imaginative retelling" of the legend, as impossible as it would be to use Morris' Jason in a volume of translations of Greek heroic myths. It is, if I may venture to differ from your reviewer, Miss Hull's great merit that she has refused to mix up two perfectly distinct aims—furnishing of precise information about the early Irish stories and utilization of the same for artistic purposes.

I should also wish to demur to the implied comparison of Mr. Standish O'Grady with Malory. The latter, though very freely and with considerable compression, translates, the former retells. The latter remains substantially on the intellectual and moral plane as his originals, the former is a modern handling of the ancient epic material from the artistic standpoint of a modern.

Faithfully yours,

ALFRED NUTT.

"THE OLD CURIOSITY SHOP."

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—Pray allow me to thank Mr. Walter Jerrold for pointing out a violation of the unities in one of the notes to "Letters of Walter Savage Landor." I am not quite certain how the mistake arose. I may have accidentally misdated one of the extracts from her old diaries which Lady Graves-Sawle kindly gave me; and apparently two extracts, which should be separated, have been connected.

I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

STEPHEN WHEELER.

Authors and Publishers.

Dr. Bloch's book, "The War of the Future," which has had so much influence on the Peace movement, will shortly make its appearance in an English translation. Dr. Bloch was in London a few days ago for the special purpose of making arrangements for the English publication of his book, and these have now been completed. The original work will not be issued in its entirety, but a full digest of it will be made and published, under the editorship of Mr. W. T. Stead, by Mr. Grant Richards, forming the second volume of that publisher's "The Russian Library." The volume, although condensed, will include all the important facts and deductions, and will contain many of the diagrams and illustrations.

Mr. Alexis Krausse, the author of "China in Decay," has ready for publication his work on "Russia in Asia." It is of a purely political character, and attempts a record of the development of Russian expansion in Asia. The book, in addition to twelve maps specially drawn, will contain, in the form of appendices, the more important of the treaties entered into between the various nations interested in Asiatic affairs.

Mr. Archibald R. Colquhoun, the author of "China in Transformation," has now nearly completed a second tour of inspection of the Celestial Empire. This time Mr. Colquhoun entered China by way of Persia and Siberia, and studied political affairs in Pekin, commercial affairs in Shanghai, and the affairs of the missionaries in Szichuan, Kwei-chau, and Yunnan. At the present moment he is on his way from China to Burma, whence news of his movements is expected shortly. His book, which he will have ready on his return, will be awaited with much interest, for the subject is full of actuality, and well-informed books about it are few.

Mr. Murray has some important announcements besides those we mentioned last week. In a new edition of Sir Alfred Lyall's "Asiatic Studies," the author has added a second series of studies which have not hitherto appeared in book form. Mrs. Louise Jordan Miln's "The Children of the World: an Account of Pickaninnies, Paposes, Bambinos, and other Bairns, chiefly from Personal Observation," cannot fail to attract attention if only on account of its quaint title-page. It was in connexion with this book that Mrs. Miln won the famous case in Mr. Justice Wills' Court, on March 29th, and gained £250 damages. Mr. Murray also promises a new book by Mr. W. S. Lilly, on First Principles in Politics; a new Greek Grammar by Mr. John Thomson—late scholar of Christ's College, Cambridge—who purports to bring boys within reach of recent linguistic discoveries; and another book of an educative character, in which Miss A. Mary Sharp will initiate girls into the mysteries of "Point and Pillow Lace."

Last September we drew attention to the want of a purchasable guide to Buckinghamshire, as a fact that lent some support to the view that the bicycle is killing all true, intelligent love of the English country. The Rev. A. J. Foster's "Chiltern Hundreds" only partially supplied the want of something more than a cyclist's map to this picturesque and historic county. But we are glad to hear that before next summer Mr. Murray will give us a new edition, almost entirely re-written, of his hand-book on Berkshire and Buckinghamshire.

Having recently completed the issue of the "Digest of English Case Law," in sixteen volumes, the publishers—Messrs. Stevens and Sons and Sweet and Maxwell—are issuing as supplementary thereto a new edition of "Overruled Cases," which originally appeared in 1887, under the editorship of Mr. C. W. M. Dale and Mr. R. C. Lehmann—the latter being, perhaps, better known by his contributions to Punch, than by the part he took in this useful compilation. Such a work as "Overruled Cases" is well nigh indispensable to the practising lawyer, showing as it does at a glance how each case has been affected by subsequent decisions; the new edition, therefore, which is being prepared by Mr. W. A. G. Woods and Mr. G.

Ritchie, should prove a fitting complement to the large Digest, in the compilation of which, it may be mentioned, each of the new editors took a prominent part.

"English Writers of To-day" is the name of a new series of monographs upon living writers that Messrs. Greening intend to publish. The volumes will be about the length of those in the "English Men of Letters" Series. A start will be made with "Rudyard Kipling," by G. F. Monkshood. Probably "Algernon Charles Swinburne" will form the second volume, which may be followed by "Richard Le Gallienne."

"First Steps in International Law" is to be the title of the first volume of Sir George Sherston Baker's new book on international law (Kegan Paul). Sir Sherston Baker has been the editor of the "Law Magazine and Review" since 1895, and has edited and written several books on the subject.

"The Monifieth Golf Links Bazaar" is not an undertaking of Imperial interest; but the "Bazaar Book" which its promoters are preparing is likely to prove a striking one. A number of the articles deal with golf, there are others of general interest, and also poems and sketches. Among the contributors are Mr. Andrew Lang; Mr. Neil Munro, Mr. D. S. Meldrum, Mr. George Eyre-Todd, Sir John Leng, M.P., Mr. William Allan, M.P., and others. The bazaar is not to be held till September, but the book is to be published within the next week or two.

The next two volumes of the "Haddon Hall Library," of which Sir Edward Grey's "Fly-Fishing" was the first, will be "Our Gardens," by Dean Hole, and Mr. Dewar's "Wild Life and Sport in Hampshire."

Two further volumes of Messrs. Putnam's "Heroes of the Nations Series" will be published shortly—"Bismarck and the New German Empire," by Mr. J. W. Headlam, and "Oliver Cromwell and the Rule of the English Puritan," by Mr. Charles Firth.

The subscription portrait of Mr. Herbert Spencer, originated by a letter in The Times, and brought to a successful conclusion by the committee, has been, owing to the request of many of the subscribers, reproduced in black and white by Miss E. Gulland, whom Professor Herkomer commissioned to execute an engraving of it.

A gratifying compliment received from Australia by Mr. John Gerald Wheeler, the author of "Confederation of Canada," published by Messrs. Eyre in 1896, has some interest for all who note the progress of Imperial unity:—

Your work [says the writer of the letter to Mr. Wheeler] on the "Confederation of Canada" was of great value and service to the members of the Federal Convention, which drafted the Australian Constitution. As a member of that body I can testify to the free use which was made of your book, especially by the legal members, all of whom welcomed it as a great aid in a critical time. Since preparing the rough notes annexed to the Bill enclosed I have been engaged in preparing more extensive and critical annotations, in which authorities and cases are cited illustrative of the meaning of the various sections. In these annotations I propose to cite many of the leading Canadian cases reported by you.

For Messrs. Sands' "Imperial Interest Library," which, as we stated in last week's Literature, will begin with a volume on China by Mr. Harold Gorst, Mr. W. S. Lilly will deal with India, and Mr. H. A. Bryden with South Africa.

Mr. William Le Queux has written a sequel to his "The Great War in England," which has run through eighteen editions, called "England's Peril." It will be issued next week by Messrs. F. V. White.

M. François Coppée is working at a volume of poems with a religious tendency, to be brought out during the autumn, under the title of "La Bonne Prière."

A new experiment in International publishing will be "Camera Obscura," a monthly magazine of photography, written in four languages, and edited by Mr. J. R. A. Schouten. Messrs. Williams and Norgate are the British publishers.

In the May issue of the Classical Review will be published an account of a new manuscript of Juvenal, discovered by Mr. Winstedt, a student of Magdalen College, Oxford, in the Bodleian. This MS. adds nearly forty lines, unfortunately not of a very edifying character, but apparently of undoubted genuineness, to the famous Sixth Satire.

The proprietors of Nature are issuing a special reprint of the third edition of "Sowerby's English Botany," to be offered on the instalment system. As in the former editions, all the illustrations will be coloured by hand.

The Pall Mall Magazine is about to include a series of tales by Mr. H. G. Wells, illustrated by Mr. E. J. Sullivan, whose work for the latest edition of Carlyle's "Sartor Resartus" we noticed some time ago.

The late Lord de Tabley's "The Flora of Cheshire" is being brought out in a new issue edited by Mr. Spencer Moore and published by Messrs. Longmans. It will include a biographical notice of the author from the pen of Sir Mountstuart Grant-Duff.

Messrs. Oliver and Boyd announce a volume by Professor Wallace, of Edinburgh University, entitled "A Country Schoolmaster, James Shaw, Tynron, Dumfriesshire."

Dr. Almond, Headmaster of Loretto since 1862, is bringing out a volume entitled "Christ the Protestant, and other Sermons." It is partly a re-issue of "Sermons of a Lay Headmaster," which is now out of print. Dr. Almond has recently begun a new history for the use of schools, his view being that the existing histories are too full of names and dates for young students.

Mr. Burleigh announces a poem in the ballad style, from the pen of the author of "The Rani of Jhansi," and other Eastern works. It illustrates the state of unrest in Western India during the downfall of the rule of the Moguls at Delhi.

Monsieur Felix Alcan is to publish next month two books in his "Library of Contemporary Philosophy" which are likely to attract attention, M. Fouillée's "La France au point de vue moral" and M. Paul Janet's "Œuvres Choiesies de Leibniz." Other volumes to appear at the same time are M. Thomas' "Morale et Education," a selection from Nietzsche, edited by M. Lichtenberger, and a "Psychologie des Religions," by M. de la Grasserie.

"Rita" (Mrs. Humphreys) will have a new novel, "An Old Rogue's Tragedy," published early in May by Messrs. Hutchinson. The scenes are again laid in Ireland.

Mr. Morley Roberts' new novel, "Reason of State" will be published by Messrs. Methuen—probably at sixpence.

Messrs. Pearson's series of penny novels is to include copy-right works by "Ouida," Mr. Grant Allen, "John Oliver Hobbes," Mr. Robert Buchanan, and other authors.

STIMULANT OR SEDATIVE ?

Post-prandial oratory should not, as a rule, be subjected to ante-prandial criticism. The most responsible speakers may yield to the genial influences of the moment, and their utterances are sometimes all the briefer and all the more apparently spontaneous for the care with which they have been prepared. We must offer some apology, therefore, to Mr. Edmund Gosse if we devote a little consideration to a remark which he made at the recent dinner of the Royal Literary Fund. His speech did not receive either the attention or the full report which it deserved as a review, both thoughtful and entertaining, of present literary tendencies. The particular observation we refer to was suggested by Lamartine's prediction that, if the world of readers was not careful, the Novel might become "the opium of the West." In view of the preponderance of Prose Fiction, Mr. Gosse expressed the opinion that the most real danger before us at present was "that Literature may cease to be taken as a stimulant and be welcome only as a sedative." The remark is full of suggestion, and is not without its timely warning. But so misleading are the temptations of metaphor to an orator that the sentence is quite equally true—in some respects far more true—when turned the other way. First of all, is literature becoming less of a stimulant than it was? Opium may be the form of intemperance peculiar to the East. It is a very different craving which leads to alcoholism in the West. There we find a desire, not for sedatives, but for stimulants, and in their excessive consumption social reformers find the source of most of the vices and diseases from which we suffer. They would not be far wrong in tracing to an intemperate use of stimulants our mental disorders also. Intellectually a large proportion of society is, so far as anything like good literature is concerned, in a state of chronic alcoholism, the result of too many "nips" of cheap and inferior liquor. The commonest complaint we hear about the journalism of to-day is that it provides a "literature of snippets." And not only snippet journals, but the whole mass of publications which comprise selections from great books, extracts from them, talk about them, and commentaries on them—all come into existence to satisfy the demand for stimulants, for something which will have the momentary effect of stirring the brain to a gentle short-lived activity, and arouse a kind of literary consciousness, without exacting the labour of any prolonged attention to a single subject. Again, the novel which is accused of depriving literature of its stimulus can itself hardly be regarded as an opiate. Not to speak of the sensational story which one "must finish before going to bed," the novels which vex the reader with depressing problems are far too many to give him any hope that in fiction he will always find a soothing and sedative draught.

Secondly, is not the proper function of literature to be a sedative quite as much as to be a stimulant? No book-lover can doubt that it is; and it is for this very virtue that every one who has discoursed on the influence of books has sung its praises. One of the debts we owe to the great writers is that they bring us into a freer, calmer, more spiritual atmosphere. They detach us from ourselves and convey us into a world of scenes and thoughts that have nothing to do with our own interests and worries; and so they have a regulative power, and can curb the blood or lower a feverish temperature. They act, also, as an antidote to the heat and excitement of intolerance. Mr. Mackail tells us that William Morris, who had first been a revolutionary socialist, modified his views after reading the Odyssey. It may not be possible to apply quite so exact a prescription as this for the complaint; but the principle it illustrates is a true one. Though authors may not always be the least passionate and intolerant of men, readers grow more liberal as their studies widen. Or look at it from the point of view merely of style—here it is just the qualities which claim the epithet "sedative," of which we most regret the absence in many recent writers. Who but an inveterate dram-drinker can read the leisurely sentences of Scott, or still more the lucid, harmonious, reflective prose of Hawthorne or Washington Irving, without experiencing a feeling of calm intellectual content? And what of the "sweet calm" of Wordsworth; or, the soothing, sometimes almost caressing music of Tennyson?

The two latter names remind us that when we turn from generalities as to the bracing or soothing influence of literature on the mind to ask how our modern poets affect us, we shall find that here again it is by no means stimulus which is the one thing lacking. Patriotism and pessimism—these are the chords to which two very different schools of fashionable bards tune their music. Some sing of Empire, of ships and battles, and a life of action; others look inwards instead of outwards, and find in healthy action and in the joy of living nothing that appeals to a jaded æsthetic sense. They are both passing phases, no doubt; and they do not exhaust the themes of the modern verse-writer, or fully describe the temper in which he writes. But they help to show the decadence of an older poetical ideal, less material on the one hand, more calm and cheerful on the other. We lack the sedative of a Wordsworth or a Tennyson. Read the former's poem on revisiting the Banks of the Wye. The "sweet inland murmur" of the mountain streams—the cliffs

That on a wild secluded scene impress
Thoughts of more deep seclusion, and connect
The landscape with the quiet of the sky—these give him "tranquil restoration," "a serene and blessed mood" to which his spirit turns

when the fretful stir
Unprofitable, and the fever of the world
Have hung upon the beatings of my heart.

This is the spirit one looks for, sometimes in vain, in the mass of "recent verse," some of which we discuss in another column. There, too, one hopes to find the spirit of Tennyson, the spirit of high romance, of pure poetry unsullied by sordid visions, and never pointing to material ends, reposing as it were in a sheer contemplation of beauty. Of stimulus we have more than enough: it is to the poet of all men that we look to spiritualize the grossness of life and to console us for its sorrow.

Still there may be truth in the view that literature ought to be stimulating in the sense that it ought not to be an end in itself. History, for instance, in the opinion of Dr. Gardiner which we quoted last week, is a poor study unless it is a help to progress. The finest writings may incur a reproach like that which political economists bring against luxuries—that they represent unproductive expenditure. The ethical view of it is that they should either lead to action or stimulate thought, and here, perhaps, Mr. Gosse's dictum as to the tendencies of modern literature seems to represent a truth. Mr. Kipling's popularity is no doubt due in some degree to the belief that he has done something to teach two nations the duties of Empire. But the end of the century does not compare favourably in this respect with its middle period, when such writers as Ruskin, Carlyle, and Kingsley really exercised an influence, hardly yet exhausted, on the practical side of life. It is not so easy to point now to any sphere of literature likely to mould the actions of society: and, as regards the world of thought, the mass of printed matter which passes so rapidly before the eye, the paragraphic style, and the host of subjects which claim a moment's attention do not encourage any activity on the reflective side of the brain. But, after all, at the dawn of letters Tyrtaeus was not the only type of popular bard; and if in modern times writers who have made men think, or spurred them to act, are reckoned among the greatest of the classics, their reputation is built to a great extent on qualities which fall outside the province of pure literature. Indeed, even Mr. Gosse, we suspect, would admit that authors who are too conscious of being teachers, and readers who are too keen upon being taught, miss the finest essence and the most subtle virtues of literature. Modern life, in fact, is much too full of difficulties, both of thought and action, for writers to ignore them. It is the stimulants of literature that seem to us so full of danger. Fifty years ago Matthew Arnold asked where we should find again "Wordsworth's healing power," and we can still echo his lament.

The cloud of mortal destiny,
Others will front it fearlessly—
But who, like him, will put it by?

It will strike many people as strange that Literature alone among the arts should have been ignored in the toasts at the Royal Academy banquet. The omission certainly cannot have been due to the fact that the guests included no man of letters whose position entitled him to respond to such a toast; for the list of those present includes the names, among others, of Mr. J. E. C. Bodley, Mr. F. C. Burnand, Mr. W. J. Courthope, Professor Jebb, Mr. W. E. H. Lecky, Sir John Lubbock, Professor Mahaffy, Dr. J. A. H. Murray, Sir E. Maunde Thompson, and Mr. Stanley Weyman. Yet Music and the Drama were duly honoured, while Literature was left out in the cold. Moreover, with all respect for Sir Squire Bancroft, who made a very good and modest speech, the choice of an actor rather than a dramatic author to reply for the Drama seems to indicate an imperfect appreciation of the true nature of dramatic art.

It happens, too, that this year the exhibition has little to show that touches literature. The portraits of writers seem to have found their way to the New Gallery, where Mr. Glazebrook has shown extraordinary skill in making Mr. Hope, of all people, look cherubic. In the absence of "subject" pictures, the English stand in contrast to the French exhibitions, where the large historical canvas finds its home. We do not regret this so much as the comparative absence of a literary inspiration such as Mr. Abbey's. "Literary inspiration" is, we are aware, "a very vile phrase" in the ears of many artists; but it is not the less regrettable that, as we believe to be the case, the average art student is less cultivated to-day than he was fifty years ago.

The recent protest of the two ladies in the Cornhill against the denial of a sense of humour to their sex—a somewhat too vehement outburst, on which we commented the other day—has rallied to them a thorough-going champion in the person of Professor Tyrrell, who cannot, he declares, see the slightest reason for ascribing to women "an inferior appreciation of humour," and who adds that, "on the other hand," he is inclined to believe that "in the highest kind of humour in English literature a woman occupies a very pre-eminent position indeed." We do not quite see the force of this "on the other hand." The mere fact that a particular woman of genius, with a remarkable gift of creative imagination and high intellectual power, happened also to be richly endowed with the faculty of humour has not much relevance to the question as to women's general appreciation of the humorous. Such reasoning, at any rate, would equally avail to prove that as regards all the rest of the array of mental and spiritual qualities which combined to form the artistic and literary individuality of George Eliot, women in the mass stand on a perfectly equal footing with men. This, which as we know, was "some time a paradox," is not, it is true, regarded as paradoxical in these latter days, but it is a proposition which we take leave to say is still far from being established.

It is a pity, too, that the Professor should have dealt so freely in sweeping pronouncements, not necessary to his substantially just appreciation of the humour of George Eliot, about that of another great English humorist. It is surely going a great deal too far to say that "the humour of Dickens is already beginning to cease to appeal to his own countrymen." That this is true of some of it must of course be admitted, but of what humorists, even of the greatest, is it not true? In all humour there is a perishable element, an element which belongs to the passing modes of its age and expires with them. But we might as reasonably say that the humour of Shakespeare is "beginning to cease to appeal to his countrymen" because we can no longer smile at the idiotic quips of his clowns, or because the catch-words of the Host in the Merry Wives have fallen unmeaning and unamusing with the lapse of years.

The utmost that can be justly said in any comparison between Dickens and George Eliot is that a much larger proportion of the former's humour is of the transitory and perishable kind. But then it must be remembered that its total bulk is much larger also. The Professor, again, is mistaken, we think, in drawing so hard and fast a line between what may be called "fantastic humour" and the humour that is rooted in our common human nature. He seems to imply that the writers who excel respectively in each variety fall into two entirely distinct classes, and he apparently forgets that one of the greatest of the world's humorists was a master of both. Much of Sterne's humour is more extravagant, and, so to say, "unnatural" than that of Dickens, and there were and are many of Sterne's "countrymen" in his day and our own to whom the pure—and impure—fooleries of "Tristram Shandy" did not and do not appeal. But Mr. Walter Shandy, and My Uncle Toby, and Corporal Trim are none the less immortal on that account.

A Society of Dramatic Authors is projected for the purpose of defining and defending the rights and privileges of playwrights. It remains to be seen whether it will form a part of the existing Society of Authors or will frame a separate constitution of its own. In view of the peculiar nature of the grievances complained of, the latter course seems the more likely to be adopted. The chief complaint is that managers arrogate the right of "cutting" or otherwise tampering with the text of plays; and it is argued that they are no more entitled to do this than a publisher is entitled to alter the rhymes and rhythms of a poet. But a theatrical manager stands to lose a good deal more over the production of a play than the publisher does over the production of a poem. On the other hand, the tendency of certain actor-managers to transfer the "fat" of other people's parts to their own, or to those of their leading ladies, is apt to ruffle the feelings of an author. Sheridan, for example, if he were alive, would certainly be annoyed to see Mr. Augustin Daly allowing Miss Ada Rehan to speak the words which he had put into the mouth of Charles Surface. The Society of Dramatic Authors we fear will find that it has its hands full when it sets out to seek a modus vivendi in this difficult matter.

The Life of William Morris. By J. W. Mackail.
vols., 9½ x 6 in., xv. + 375 + 364 pp. London, 1899.

Longmans. 32/-

The task of writing the official biography of "a man so various" as William Morris is no easy one. He was a man of many interests, widely known, displaying his personality freely and without restraint. His biographer, therefore, will be tried by as many different touchstones as there were sides to his character, and, it is inevitable, must fail to represent them all with equal fidelity. But the best must not be the enemy of the good; and, greatly though Mr. Mackail's work falls short of an ideal account of the man, yet it was necessary that some such account should have been written. The very first words of his book emphasize his position and explain it: Mr. Mackail tells us that he undertook this biography at the request, not of Mr. Morris' family and executors, but of Sir Edward Burne-Jones; it is, in fact, "Morris seen from above." Whether the results justify the attitude will be for the readers of the biography to determine. Mr. Mackail several times compares Morris and Johnson. It must have occurred to him that our best picture of Dr. Johnson is that built up for us by the donnish Scot who sank the coldly critical superiority of the classical scholar in the admiring subserviency of the devotee. This book should, indeed, have been written by a committee of authors. The short limits of an article forbid us to follow our author into all the multifarious phases of Morris' activity, and we must merely say that the future historian of English decorative art will find much material here ready to his hand which, given as it is on the authority of the surviving partners of the firm of Morris and Co., must be received as authentic. Mr. Mackail's position as a scholar of some brilliancy awakens special interest in his treatment of the literary aspect of Morris' life rather than the artistic.

The poetic activity of William Morris extends over a very long period, and was more than once marked by changes. His early poems, those of them at least published with "The Defence of Guenevere," combine an analytical turn of mind, quite in the style of Browning, with medieval surroundings and a strong sense of colour. As years went on analysis was expressed rather in the point of view of the narrator than in the narrative itself, till at last his writing was as free from introspection as an Icelandic Saga itself. His verse withal is eminently of the kind that should be read aloud; his theory of poetry demanded this excellency, and he composed long sections of his work walking about and declaiming. His position as a prose writer is more uncertain: a few support his work through thick and thin, undeterred by the cries of "Wardour Street" raised by writers nurtured in styles savouring rather of the Tottenham-court-road or of Shoreditch. The great majority of readers treat his work as they do all good literature, they glance at it and turn away: a few suspend their verdict. Indeed, it is obvious that while the prose style of William Morris is too simple for the admirers of complexity of sentence or involution of thought, it stands a better chance of comprehension at the hands of future ages. All things considered, no one can doubt that the series of prose romances which he produced in the last years of his life forms a unique monument of poetical prose. Mr. Mackail, as is natural, devotes considerable space to an account of the earlier work. Fortunately, he has been able, by the help of Mr. Cornell Price and Canon Dixon, to give us a lively picture of the days when Morris' poetic turn was discovered, and even to furnish us with some hitherto unprinted fragments of the verse of those early days. We are thankful to have seen these latter, not only on account of the intrinsic beauty of many passages, but because they go far to remove the lingering regret we have felt at Morris' refusal to allow this early work to be reprinted. But this latter sentiment must not be understood to apply to the fragments given of Morris' projected Troy Book. No consideration of their incompleteness should, we hold, forbid the printing of fragments as rare and wonderful as these. What reviewer could resist the temptation to quote the song of Grecian Helen pacing slowly round the wooden horse?

O my merchants, whence come ye
Landing laden from the sea?
Behold we come from Sicily:
Corn and wine and oil have we,
Blue cloths and cloths of red.
Merry merchants, when you are dead,
We shall gain that you have lost:
Out-merchants from the sea,
Your graves are not in Sicily.
The corn for me, the wine for thee,
The blue and red for our ladies free.

Morris' theory of writing poetry restricted from the general way in which he put it to the particular, answered his own case very well: tale-telling was to him the whole end of poetry, and versification was but a means of arriving more swiftly and economically at the desired end. Hence, perhaps, his dislike of praise of his earlier poems, where the effect of sound was often the only thing aimed at. Mr. Mackail devotes considerable amount of space to the discussion of "Sigurd the Volsung," which Morris believed would be the work by which he should be longest remembered. His verdict is:—

The fact remains that what he tried to do was wrong, and that no skill can set it wholly right. . . . To continue after the main interest is gone would be a grave fault of art. But it is a fault of art scarcely less grave to anticipate that interest, and excite it at the opening of the tale in disparate matter, and, as it were, on a false issue.

The real meaning of this piece of criticism is that Mr. Mackail is applying to a lengthy piece of work a standard properly applicable to something in the nature of a play—which by the conditions of its production must be heard or seen as a whole at once. Or, more crudely still, Mr. Mackail is not so interested in the story of Sigmund as in the story of Sigurd, and does not perceive the intimate connexion between them. Of Morris' deliberate assault on the classical element in Virgil and his very successful attempt to exchange his toga for doublet and trunk hose Mr. Mackail speaks with more kindness than might have been expected of him: it was, he says, the romantic element in Virgil that appealed to Morris, or, as the poet himself often put it, the ballad element. A useful account of the provenance of the various "Poems by the Way" is supplied; but Mr. Mackail has not told us of the origin of the last "Goldlocks and Goldilocks," which was not only written for it, but was written after the volume was printed, because it was too small, and required at least a couple of sheets more to make it presentable. Mr. Mackail has pronounced the general verdict on the unfortunate rendering of "Beowulf"—a failure in no small measure due to the difficulty which Mr. Morris experienced in obtaining help with the original. And yet we are bound to say that the version contains detached passages of the utmost brilliancy, which do not lose by comparison with anything that the poet ever wrote.

Of the personal side of Morris' character we are given but few glimpses. We are told of the qualities in which he conspicuously differs from Mr. Mackail, but the little anecdotes which throw so much light on a man's personality are woefully to seek. Some day, it is to be hoped, we shall have a few of "the hundred merry tales" of Red Lion Mary, and of Mr. Marshall, or some of the stories of the Icelandic expedition which Morris used to tell—stories which would have relieved a rather monotonous chapter. A hint is given of his likes and dislikes in literature. But there is much omitted that might have been said. He liked a tale; he was disgusted when he found that the "Three Midshipmen," which he had bought on a railway journey in the hope that it was a tale of the Marryat order, turned out to be a religious tract. Michael Scott, Marryat, Cooper, and Lever he would always read: Borrow and Dumas and Dickens he loved to his dying day, but the only play of Ibsen he could endure was The Enemy of the People; he disliked the Russian spirit in literature, he could not read Meredith, and he loathed Maeterlinck and the literature of which he is a representative.

Perhaps the stricture on his disposition which Mr. Mackail makes with most apparent ground is the complaint of his self-sufficiency. As he did not depend on the good opinion of the world, so could he dispense with the friendship of his friends. The outer circle of these last made no difference to him, and this, mainly, is the reason why he has left no school. He was surrounded by, he had to work with, men who were jealous of his undoubted superiority in the field of art, and were always on the watch for some opportunity of pillage. All his life long, he once said, he was abused and stolen from. The irascibility, the Berserker fits of rage on which Mr. Mackail lays stress, were but physical manifestations of energy, and he would often stop in the middle of a storm to quote Leech's angry husband or some appropriate passage of Dickens.

It will be seen that in our opinion the personal biography of William Morris has yet to be written, but no biography, by whomsoever written, will altogether supersede the book that is before us; the view of Morris is so individual that it could have been supplied from no other quarter and its absence would have been a distinct loss. It reminds us of a description of a Gothic cathedral seen from the rarefied atmosphere and cold serenity of a captive balloon moored to the cloister garth. The lovely beauty of the saint-king watching over his royal town, the angels circling the apse, the gargoyles and grinning demons, all these are caught and described, but not one word of the tapestry-covered walls, the carven pillars, the storied front, or the jewelled windows which delight the eyes of the humble dweller on mother earth. In some special qualifications for his task Mr. Mackail is painfully lacking: a man can have great scholarship and a high position in the literary world without knowing anything of medieval literature or sentiment, but such a one is distinctly unfitted to deal with the problems that arise in Morris' life. No person who knew anything of medieval French would have said that there were two translations of Aucassin and Nicolette—there is a translation and a paraphrase, agreeable and interesting, but wilfully mistranslated and wanting in many of the fine qualities of the original—nor would any one familiar with medieval literary history speak of the Troy story in terms which seem to place Benoît and Guido on the same footing, whereas one was the originator and the other a copier. A medieval scholar, too, would hesitate to attribute the Ogier story to Celtic sources, knowing as he would the difficulties in the way of maintaining such an attribution. Moreover, an English scholar would have felt a certain difficulty in coupling Piers Plowman with Chaucer as models of the modern in literature opposed to the English of the Gesta Romanorum, and certainly would not have referred to a story from the latter by the number given it in two of the many versions which exist, instead of giving its number in Oesterley, which is the recognized edition.

As a writer, too, Mr. Mackail does not fulfil our expectations. Take, for example, such a turgid sentence as the following, "As rich in imagination, as irregularly gorgeous in language, as full in every vein and fibre of the sweet juices and fragrance of the spring"; or again, "The particular spot was, however, very much chosen"; or again, "The part of the volume which one gathered to represent its spirit and form most intimately to many lovers of poetry is neither of these." And, if we may hint such a thing, the repetition of a harmless jest about the Marquis of Lorne and the poet-laureateship is hardly in the best taste. Mr. Morris' serious selection for the post was of course Sir Theodore Martin.

We have left ourselves little space to deal with other aspects of the book. The history of Morris' Socialism is written from the standpoint of a cultured and not unsympathetic outsider, but future historians of the democratic movement should be warned that no statement in the book is of the least value as giving the inner history of the movement. We have to add that the work is well and handsomely got up, printed on better paper than we have seen for a long time in works of this kind, and that the illustrations do credit in a marked degree both to the artist and to the reproducers, Messrs. Walker and Boutall. Especially we would call attention to the photogravures of the Watts portrait and of Morris' painting of Queen Guenevere. We congratulate the publishers on so handsome a volume, and the author on the very real measure of success he has had in the treatment of so difficult a subject.

CROMWELL.

The Two Protectors, Oliver and Richard Cromwell. By Sir Richard Tangye. With 38 illustrations. 9×6 in., 302 pp. London, 1899. Partridge. 10/6

Oliver Cromwell and his Times. Social, Religious, and Political Life in the Seventeenth Century. By G. Holden Pike. Illustrated. 7½×5½ in., vii. + 286 pp. London, 1899. Fisher Unwin. 6/-

The tercentenary of the birth of Cromwell affords an opportunity for a fresh outburst of encomiums upon the Puritan hero from his most enthusiastic admirers. In a measure, we can all take part in it; though we can hardly, by an extension of Milton's phrase, consider the Protector, as Sir Richard Tangye does, to be "England's Chief of Men." There can be little doubt that for 150 years after the Restoration his character and policy received much less than justice; but, in the present reign, devotion to his memory has almost passed into a cult, of which the Nonconformist bodies and one political party (minus their Irish allies) are the most fervent votaries.

Neither of the books which are the subject of this notice can claim to be of much independent value in a literary sense: the writers have employed original authorities, but they have compiled still more largely from modern authors. Sir Richard Tangye is often content merely to echo Mr. Frederic Harrison, to whom his book is dedicated, and from whom he borrows whole pages at once; Mr. Pike quotes almost as freely from Carlyle, Macaulay, and Mr. Picton. Nor does either work attempt an estimate of Cromwell's character or of his conduct at critical junctures; each is simply one long pan of indiscriminate eulogy. Sir Richard gives a short list of "authorities," in which contemporary and modern writers are jumbled together; but with the exception of "Carrion" Heath (whose Carlylese nickname must be made to stick) they are all on one side; there is no evidence that he has read a page of Clarendon. With such a list a one-sided view is a foregone conclusion. Some allowance, however, may be made for one who has a fine collection of Cromwellian relics, and who in this work offers his countrymen some share in his treasures. Including the "Horoscope" and the "Death Mask," it contains no fewer than twelve presentments of Oliver, the originals of six being in the author's collection; and many of the ancient prints and autographs here reproduced are of great interest. Sir Richard has also made use of a few unpublished documents from his own collection, the most important of which are letters written by Oliver during the second siege of Pontefract, a Journal of his Second Chamber by its Clerk in 1658, and some very interesting particulars of Richard Cromwell's later years. We are inclined to think the short chapter on the latter the most valuable, because the most original, part of the work. Very few people remember that, after being Protector for nearly eight months, he was obliged to live abroad for more than twenty years; and that, residing subsequently on his estate for more than a generation, he very nearly outlived the Stuart dynasty, as he died only two years before the death of Queen Anne brought that dynasty to a close.

Turning once more to the great Protector, we find in both these works a tendency to glide easily over the more questionable incidents in his career, of which his severity during the Irish campaign may serve as an instance. Mr. Pike had intended, he tells us, to devote a whole chapter to this part of the subject, but apparently found it so uninviting that he has condensed it into three pages. Sir Richard Tangye opens his chapter on the campaign with a sentiment which it would be well if he would apply rather more widely. "In dealing," he says, "with a period of history more or less remote there is a natural tendency to judge of the action of men by the standard of our own time." Yet it is by that standard alone that he judges the severities of the Star Chamber, the mistaken Church policy of Laud, and the personal government of Charles. He is never tired of alluding to "the cropping of Dissenters' ears" &c., forgetting that in the seventeenth century the modern spirit of toleration had no existence. Cromwell, indeed, was so far in advance of his time as to advocate it in theory; but any one who will closely examine his treatment of Romanists and of the Royalist clergy when he was in power will discover how very far removed his practice was from such an ideal. We fancy, from some of Sir Richard's remarks about "the Romanizing clergy," that he has himself not fully learnt the lesson; at any rate, his statement that "Popery, under Laud, had a free hand" in the Church will to-day need no refutation. We should like to know Mr. Pike's authority for his assertion that Laud was ever offered or "desired" a pension from Rome. It is true that, on succeeding to Canterbury, he was tempted with a cardinal's hat; but the charge against him of seriously entertaining the proposal utterly broke down, as may be seen from his written reply to it; while his controversy with Fisher the Jesuit and his success in making converts from Rome will go far to prove his fidelity to the English Church.

Opinions will always, we suppose, be hopelessly divided on the morality and the policy of the execution of Charles. Mr. Pike, with a truly remarkable insight into the secrets of the dead, says that "till the last Cromwell's conscience never accused him of wrong-doing in regard to that dread act;" and yet the same writer speaks of regicides as having been "basely judicially murdered at the Restoration." Sir Richard Tangye stoutly defends the execution against all censure. But we think he is mistaken in the sequence of events which led to it. He represents the King's escape from Hampton Court in 1647, and the outbreak of the Second Civil War in 1648, as the moving causes of the deed—the first, because it proved that negotiation was useless, the second, because it caused so much fresh bloodshed. But a letter from Baillie to Henderson of May 19, 1646—a fortnight after the King joined the Scots—proves that even at that early date a party in the Army wished for his execution. At first Cromwell gave little support to this party; but afterwards he was gained over to it by the fear that Charles would make a separate arrangement with Parliament and the Presbyterians behind the back of the Army. Whether or no Cromwell secretly suggested the escape from Hampton Court, as Clarendon hints, in order to put a stop to the negotiations with Parliament, it is plain that, without the concurrence of the Army, he did not wish them to succeed; and it was their renewal by Parliament and the Scotch before the close of the Second War that really sealed the King's fate. This it was, and not revenge for the more recent bloodshed (a poor defence truly!) which brought on Pride's Purge and the tragedy that so swiftly followed it. Sir Richard Tangye actually has the courage to insinuate that "the Sovereign People" could rightfully do what Sovereigns themselves, as Henry VIII. and Elizabeth, had done to other crowned heads. Passing by the fact that these "heads" were not "Sovereigns," we need not discuss whether the deed could be defended, if it had really been the act of "the people," though, at least, it would have been less indefensible. For when Lady Fairfax (if it were really she) exclaimed from the gallery of Westminster Hall that "not half the people of England" were concerned in it, she was much understating the case. As Hallam shows, it was the act of a very small minority, who happened for the moment to have the sword at their back. And we have since learnt—though some of our neighbours seem slow to learn—that the due subordination of the Army to the civil power is the foundation of all domestic order. Sir Richard Tangye's hatred to the unfortunate King is well illustrated by a note to the remarks on his doom. We are told that "in order to promote his suit with the Infanta Charles was base enough to permit the sacrifice" of Raleigh to Spain. Such an innuendo is as unworthy as it is utterly unfounded. Charles was under eighteen at the time and had no share in the government; and even if the Spanish match were then more than a hazy project, it is notorious that four years later he was personally indifferent to it.

We fear that we have somewhat neglected Mr. Pike's book. As its title indicates, it is not strictly a life of Cromwell; for though all the illustrations are connected with him, little more than a third of the text is dedicated to his glory. The rest consists mainly of excerpts from books, which we must be pardoned for saying are more interesting in the original, as the Memoirs of Colonel Hutchinson, Evelyn's Diary, and the account of the King's escape in the "Boscobel Tracts." As a whole, however, it is agreeably written, with an eye for the picturesque; and the last chapter brings together many useful details of religious and social life. Unfortunately, the correction of the press leaves a good deal to be desired.

DANTE IN ART.

Iconografia Dantesca. The Pictorial Representations to Dante's "Divine Comedy." By Ludwig Volkmann. Revised and Augmented by the Author. With a Preface by Charles Sarolea. With 17 plates and 4 woodcuts. 11×7½ in., xx.+240 pp. London, 1899. Grevel. 21/- n.

Dr. Volkmann's work on the illustration of Dante has been well received in Germany and Italy (where a translation by Baron Locella has recently appeared), and it was certain that sooner or later there would be a demand for an English translation. Messrs. Grevel have now issued the work in English, in a handsome volume, which will appeal to all lovers of Dante. Of the value of Dr. Volkmann's researches there can be no question. One of the most interesting points established by him is that, contrary to the general impression on the subject, Dante's influence upon Italian art in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries was comparatively insignificant. The time-honoured claim, for instance, of the great fresco in the Campo Santo at Pisa (now assigned by the experts not to Orcagna, but to Lorenzetti da Siena) to be a representation of Dante's Hell will not stand for a moment before Dr. Volkmann's critical examination. Similar claims on the part of the frescoes in San Petronio at Bologna, of those by Taddeo Bartoli at San Gemignano, and of others in various parts of Italy are in like manner summarily disposed of. In one case only does any medieval artist appear to have deliberately followed Dante in the details of his composition. That artist was Bernarke Orcagna, whose well-known and fortunately well-preserved fresco of Hell in the Strozzi Chapel in Santa Maria Novella in Florence so closely follows the topography and arrangement of the Divina Commedia as practically to serve as an illustration to the poem. A fairly successful photograph of this fresco is given as Plate I. in this volume. It suffers, however, from being on too small a scale, which makes it impossible to distinguish the details clearly. In this respect it is far inferior to the representation of the same fresco given by Kraus in his Dantes Leben und Werk recently reviewed in these columns. In order to do justice to the fresco Dr. Volkmann ought to have divided it into sections, and to have reproduced these on a much larger scale in several plates. This is the only fault we have to find with the illustrations of the book, which, so far as the rest are concerned, fulfil their purpose admirably.

After dealing with the frescoes, Dr. Volkmann treats of the illuminated MSS. and the woodcut illustrations in the early printed editions of the Divina Commedia. The famous Botticelli drawings once in the Hamilton collection, now in Berlin, form the subject of an interesting chapter, which is accompanied by an excellent full-page plate of Botticelli's sketch of Dante and Beatrice, in illustration of Canto XIII. of the Paradiso. Dr. Volkmann points out that Botticelli was conspicuously superior to many of his successors in his accurate knowledge of the poem he was illustrating. Gustave Doré was a great sinner in this matter; and to any one really familiar with Dante, and with the spirit of the Commedia, his conceptions appear often ludicrously inadequate. It is interesting to English readers to note how many famous English artists have drawn inspiration from Dante. Pre-eminent among these, of course, figures D. G. Rossetti, who forms an exception to the general rule in that he studied for the purposes of his art not the Commedia, but the Vita Nuova. Dr. Volkmann displays a very creditable acquaintance with the English department of his subject, which may be accepted as a guarantee of his thoroughness and accuracy in the rest of the work—qualities which have been vouched for by the consensus of continental opinion.

We could have wished that the author of the English translation, whose name does not appear, had been better qualified for his task. Many of his sentences have a very un-English ring about them, and he uses terms (such as "dome" for cathedral) in senses which are not current on this side of the Channel. The shortcomings on the part of the translator are the more to be regretted, since in all other respects (with the single exception mentioned above), the volume is highly commendable.

THE HERO OF "THE TALISMAN."

Saladin, and the Fall of the Kingdom of Jerusalem.
(The Heroes of the Nations Series.) By Stanley Lane-Poole.
7½ x 5¼ in., 401 pp. London, 1898. Putnam. 5/-

Few would dispute the application of the name of hero to Yusuf Salah-ed-din, the conqueror of Jerusalem; but it is a little difficult to think of him as the hero of a nation. A Kurdish adventurer who ruled first over Egyptian fellaheen and then over Syrians and Mesopotamian Turkomans is as little "national" as almost any man that can well be cited. We say "almost" because Messrs. Putnam's series already includes a life of Julian the Apostate, who is even more oddly placed in it than Saladin himself.

But to cavil at a title is ungracious when the book itself is excellent. Mr. Lane-Poole is well known as a competent Orientalist, whose knowledge extends into many corners of Mahomedan history, where English scholars rarely intrude. That his severer studies do not prevent him from being a very picturesque and interesting writer when he has to address a popular audience the present book is sufficient to prove. We may describe it as eminently readable from the first page to the last, even when the author is obliged by his subject to wade through obscure Mesopotamian wars or difficult Syrian genealogies.

Saladin is mainly known to the British reading public as the opponent of Richard Cœur-de-Lion in the Third Crusade. But it is from his earlier campaigns that he is better judged; in 1191 he had become so far the greatest monarch of the East that his very qualified success in fending off the crusaders and maintaining Jerusalem seems unworthy of his reputation. More might have been expected from the victor of Tiberias than a campaign ending with a compromise, by which the Moslem sacrificed the coastland in order to be permitted to retain the inland. The really striking part of Saladin's life is the period between 1169 and 1183, during which he strung together, state by state, all the long list of principalities that owned him as suzerain. When in the first-named year he was left Vizier of Egypt by the sudden and unexpected death of his uncle Shirkuh, there was as yet nothing in his career that gave promise of his future achievements. "Men thought him," as Mr. Lane-Poole remarks, "a well-behaved and intelligent subaltern, too quiet and unambitious for high command—it was, indeed, this opinion of Saladin's docility that procured him an office where a tractable tool was wanted."

Unless we were acquainted with the Sultan's early years of manhood, in which he had showed himself a loyal and obedient servant, and never thrust himself to the front, we should be unable to grasp his character. The record of his middle life, looked at from the outside, reads like that of many other successful military adventurers. It is only by comparing it with his previous career that we realise that he was no mere self-seeking usurper, but a conscientious statesman trying to keep Islam together for the great struggle with the Franks. It would be as unjust to represent Gustavus Adolphus as inspired by nothing more than a lust for military glory and territorial aggrandisement when he invaded Germany as to draw Saladin as an ordinary Oriental conqueror. Both he himself and his followers looked upon his whole career as a long episode of the Jihad, the "Holy War" against the Infidel. If he took the reins of power out of the hands of the heirs of his master, Nur-ed-din, it was because he saw that union was absolutely necessary for the Moslem states of the Levant. The Frankish principalities had been established in Syria mainly owing to the fact that the Seljuk Empire had broken up into small and jealous factions just before the First Crusade. The progressive dismemberment of Islam had only ceased when Zengi united enough of the faction-ridden Emirates to make a solid barrier against the Christians. But when Zengi's great son had expired, it seemed as if history were about to repeat itself, and the strong state, not yet forty years old, which had held back Baldwin III. and Amaury, were destined to disruption. The young boy Es-Salih and his self-seeking ministers and relatives would almost certainly have wrecked the Empire of Nur-ed-din if Saladin had not interfered. That he honestly looked upon himself as the champion of Islam in all that he did in Syria and Mesopotamia is certain. As far as he could he left the house of Zengi undisturbed. Its younger branches, when he had forced them into vassalage, were left as reigning princes, and long survived in Mesopotamia. In dealing with Moslems he always preferred to make the older rulers do him homage rather than to expropriate them. He was not set on annexation, but only on binding together all the forces of Islam for the great attack on the Kingdom of Jerusalem which was the dream of his life.

It was the enthusiastic admiration and affection which his moderation and justice inspired among all who came in contact with him that enabled Saladin to carry out his great plan. A mere self-seeker would probably have failed; the man whom all were compelled to recognize as the genuine champion of Islam just succeeded. Yet even Saladin himself more than once thought that all his efforts had been thrown away. There were moments during the Third Crusade when the Sultan almost made up his mind that the game was lost and Jerusalem about to fall back once more into the power of the Franks. When in 1192 he dismantled all the fortresses that he had gained with such toil in 1187-88 and drew back for a final stand in front of the Holy City the prospect looked very black. The army was cowed by the carnage of Arsouf and the terrible reputation of Cœur-de-Lion. The Emirs were discouraged, though still ready to fight out the desperate game at their master's orders. But the Sultan stood firm, showed a bold front, and was rewarded by seeing his enemies turn back and finally ask for peace, instead of making the final rush on Jerusalem that must almost inevitably have succeeded. To those unacquainted with the personal and racial feuds that raged in the camp of the Franks, the saving of Jerusalem for Islam must have appeared almost like a miracle wrought in favour of the never-despairing Sultan.

Hitherto we have looked at the great struggle of Saladin's life from the point of view of the Moslem, as Mr. Lane-Poole would have us see it. It is not the point of view most familiar to us. Accustomed to read the Crusades in historians of our own faith, we have, perhaps, undervalued the strength of the Christian attack. It is usual to speak of the Frankish kingdom of Jerusalem as a failure from the first, a state bound to fall to pieces before the first strong enemy who should attack it. Far other is the impression given by the perusal of the Mahomedan chroniclers. It seems to us so astounding that a few hundred Christian knights should ride roughshod over Syria for three generations, that Kings of Jerusalem should deliver battles at the head of armies that never counted more than 1,500 or 2,000 mailed horsemen, and often shrank to 400 or 500, that we refuse to take the Frankish kingdom as a serious factor in the history of the East. The enemy knew better; unwilling admiration pierces through their hatred when they describe the astounding exploits of their enemies. Osama and Boha-ed-din give us a far better appreciation of the Crusader's courage than any Western chronicler. It is from their confessions that we understand the astounding fact that but for Zengi and Saladin the Frankish kingdom might have gone on "conquering and to conquer." If a man of real genius had ever ruled at Jerusalem the Christians, in spite of their small numbers, and despite of the feudal organization that clogged their efforts, might have pushed to the line of the Euphrates and even have conquered Egypt. It was the ill-fortune of Christendom that the man of genius appeared on the other side. Jerusalem fell, King Richard was turned back with his task not half accomplished. Yet even then so strong was the grasp of the Franks on Palestine that their rule survived Saladin, and that Acre, Tyre, and Tripoli, with many a strong town more, still flew the banner of the Cross three generations after the great Sultan had been laid in his tomb at Damascus.

We must give a word of approval to the admirable genealogical tables which are dispersed through Mr. Lane-Poole's book. The illustrations are also excellent, but we cannot say as much for the maps of Palestine and of Saladin's Empire, which are far too coarse and ill-engraved. They are almost the only blots on an otherwise excellent book, and should be replaced in a second edition. If we may criticise a very minor point—the orthography of names—we would suggest that some corrections might be made among Western names—e.g., Malo-Leone should surely be Mauleón, and the Earl of Ferrers should be Ferrers, Earl of Derby. But these are trifles and would not take five minutes to set right.

RECENT VERSE.

I.

The poems of "Maxwell Gray"—contained in THE FOREST CHAPEL (Heinemann, 5s.)—whose reputation hitherto has been founded on her novels, seem to us among the most likely of all the collections before us to become popular. They are healthy, cheerful, and sometimes old-fashioned in their subjects. In treatment they are always lucid, which is a comfort, but they have also high lyrical qualities, a graceful movement in the sequence of thought, and an almost invariably musical rhythm. The irregular metre of the ode, for instance, is treated in many of them with exceptional skill; and "New Year's Bells," which is in this style, is really a beautiful poem. The old Pantheism which has inspired so many religious poets has seldom been more simply and faultlessly expressed than in "The Charm," beginning—

If there be glory in the sun,
If splendour on the sea,
Sweet music in all rills that run,
Dear God, it is of thee.

This little book is well worth perusal by all who are seeking among our modern bards a singer who has a true ear for melody and is wholly free from affectations.

To attempt a conclusion of "Christabel" at this time of day requires a certain amount of pluck. Mr. E. J. Chapman, however, has, in his DRAMA OF TWO LIVES (Kegan Paul), been courageous enough to essay the effort, and we may say at once that his amiable and modest preface invites none but the kindest judgment. Mr. Chapman does not take himself over seriously—a rare virtue in a poet—and the attitude is the more commendable in that he has considerable felicity in the versifier's art. His imitation of Coleridge, for example, is a really clever pastiche, catching more than a faint echo of its original:—

Up from her knee rose Christabel,
And toss'd aside her blinding hair,
And cried with cry of fear and pain:
"What bring'st thou, then, from Tryermaine,
That thus thou standest silent there?"
He bent him low and answer made:
"A gruesome tale have I to tell—
Jesu, Maria! shield thee well
From witchcraft's hate and powers of Hell!"
"God's mercy shield us all," she said.

This is admirable imitation, and Mr. Chapman's talent is not confined to imitation alone. He has a delicate sense of natural beauty, much metrical facility, and more than a little humour. Several sides of verse-making are agreeably displayed in his pleasant pages; and, if he does not exhibit himself as a particularly pretentious poet, he is at least an eminently sane and companionable singer.

We imagine Mr. Aleister Crowley, author of SONGS OF THE SPIRIT (Kegan Paul), to be a young man; evidently he is just passing through the Swinburnian epoch. His verse is full of the influence of "Poems and Ballads"; it contains a riot of words without much thought at the back of them. We seem, for example, to have heard this sort of thing a good many times before:—

The garland I made in my sorrow
Was woven of infinite peace;
The joy that was white on the morrow
Made music of viols at ease.
The thoughts of the Highest would borrow
The roar of the seas.

And yet, despite a good deal of bombast about "just being one with love," and the like, Mr. Crowley has many poetical qualities, and a good deal of promise. His muse is windy, and boyish in over-emphasis, but he has a true sense of musical sound, and, metrically, he has scarcely a bad line. He should mature and live to write very respectable verse. We doubt if he will ever be original; but in the middle way of discipleship he ought to do well enough.

Sir J. Grainger Stewart has, in THE GOOD REGENT (Blackwood), attempted the difficult task of settling an historical question in the medium of blank-verse drama. His hero is the Earl of Moray; and, believing him to have been misjudged, the poet seeks to portray his character in a more favourable light than the common. Now, blank-verse drama is not a good medium for the development of a thesis, and it is impossible to deny that "The Good Regent" falls between two stools. As drama it is terribly heavy, as verse it can hardly be called distinguished:—

Welcome, dear brother! counsel such as yours
Is ever valued. All that you have said
Of Rizzio, and Bothwell, and the rest,
Has been considered and most duly weighed,
But to Lord Darnley you must be more just.

This is a sample chosen at random, and it will readily be perceived that over two hundred pages of it is apt to prove soporific. The work, however, is not without dignity of a certain formal kind; and, if pompous, is at least interesting in its historical aspect. We are inclined to think it a pity that the work took verse-form at all; it would have made a suggestive character study, for it is eminently thoughtful and well digested.

The Unicorn Series of Books of Verse (Unicorn Press, 2s. 6d. n.), of which IN THE WAKE OF THE SUN, by Mr. Fred. G. Bowles, is the fourth, is certainly the richer by its publication. A cultivated lucidity would greatly heighten the value of some of Mr. Bowles' work, no doubt, but there is music and imagination which make his verse welcome reading. There are some fine pictures of the "old ecstasies" of the skies in a poem called "Orion," beginning:—

Where life-touch'd planets lifeless swept,
Mid blazing comets idly spun;
High-born Orion proudly kept
The shadowed highway of the sun!

But we confess we like Mr. Bowles best in a simpler vein, as in the following:—

Let us go home, the day is done,
And softly steals the pale young moon,
A silver shadow of the sun,
Athwart the broken haze of noon.
Let us go home; the summer night
Is all for you and me, my lass;
The years have stolen half our sight,
But come! there's one more stile to pass.

Let us go home, the corn is ripe,
All yellow falls the driven leaf,
What are they but the golden type—
The richer hope that springs from grief?
Let us go home; the dawn was fair,
The noon was full, the eve is sweet;
The night may hide enough of care—
But love shall guide our homeward feet!

Let us go home! we cannot stay.
Our eyes are blind—or is it night?
You, Dear, shall lead our homeward way:
Yours is the clearer, truer sight.
Let us go home; our love is strong,
But here, before you, stands the stile—
My hand, good wife, 'twill not be long,
I'll join you in a little while!

Some well-written verse is to be found in Mr. Robert Bain's IN GLASGOW STREETS (Glasgow, Henry Nicol), a little book which, coming in a humbler guise than most minor poetry, contains much that deserves a more careful reading than can be invited for the majority. There is a pleasant ring about this Howe'er I wander o'er the world

May fate be kind to me,
And never let my tired feet
Be far from the salt sea.

My eyes may lose my native hills,
But yet my heart's at home,
If at the winding of the road
I catch the glint of foam.

For the sweet, salt savour of the sea
Brings healing to all pain—
The open road, the only road,
That brings us home again!

There are some touching Scots songs, too; and, though the note is generally a minor, there is a certain harmony in the little volume which lifts it above the common herd. Mr. Bain has much of the secret of sympathy.

The Dean of Ely, in a little volume, paper bound, called BRYHTNOTH'S PRAYER, and other poems (Fisher Unwin, 1s. 6d.), writes pleasant enough verse in varying moods, reminiscent sometimes of Kingsley, of whom the Dean is a devoted disciple. He is most successful, we think, in his carols, of which we should have been glad to have had more than the two given us.

Mr. George Bidder's book, BY SOUTHERN SHORE (Constable, 6s.), is chiefly worth reading for some pleasant pictures of Italy such as "Naples, Early Morning" and "Naples, Night," and for its reproduction of the atmosphere of the land where—

Blue as a sapphire swells the sea,
Into the gleaming of the air!

OTHER NEW BOOKS.

THEOLOGY.

Such books as WOMEN OF THE NEW TESTAMENT, by Mr. Walter F. Adeney (Service and Paton, 3s. 6d.), show how sluggish is the popular imagination. The "delightful simplicity" (to use the author's words) of the Bible conveys little to the jaded skimmer of daily papers; for every year the number of those who have learnt to read grows less and less. Therefore Mr. Adeney must step in and (in language modelled upon its favourite journals) repaint the gospel pictures for the public. Fresh from the police-court columns, the story of Salome conveys nothing to us, till we are reminded that it is "an unparalleled mingling of bloodthirsty vengeance with sickening jocularity"; and are told that "such a scene unsexes any woman"; and that "Lady Macbeth would shrink from it with horror," which is probably unfair to Lady Macbeth; also that "Lucrezia Borgia could not be credited with the loathsome combination of devilry and buffoonery." Poor Lucrezia, that innocent victim of modern opera! Why should she be dragged in? But we do not blame Mr. Adeney. The fault is rather in the public which requires him.

The title RECONCILIATION BY INCARNATION (T. and T. Clark, 7s. 6d.) well explains the purpose of Dr. D. W. Simon's learned if somewhat heavy treatise. Starting with an inquiry into the ultimate factors of the universe, matter, energy, &c., he proceeds to discuss the relationship between God and Man and the "rectification of the abnormal relations" by the Logos. His treatment of the questions raised by the Incarnation is independent and free, but, on the whole, he settles to the belief of the Church, seeing fewer difficulties, for instance, in the virgin-birth than in the objections to it. The thought of the present century, he notes, has found more and more truth in the idea of an incarnation, however various may have been the modes of conceiving it, and however far it may have been from accepting the simple account of the Gospels. The incarnation he defines further on as "the becoming a member of the organism of humanity." The book covers a good deal of ground, natural science and literature being marshalled before us, as well as theology, both English and German.

It is pleasant to think that such sensible sermons as Dr. J. H. Bernard's VIA DOMINI (Hodder and Stoughton, 6s.) are being constantly preached in the cathedrals and college chapels of England and Ireland. Religious animosity may run high in the sister island, but here in the centre of its learning, at Trinity College, we find a spirit that augurs a better future. For Dr. Bernard is essentially reasonable and tolerant; he is broad-minded in his orthodoxy, and he is not hampered by eloquence. It must be admitted, also, that his style is without much distinction; and his thought is marked by commonsense rather than originality in dealing with the profound subjects that are raised by these "Sermons for Christian Seasons."

Two new volumes of "The Bible Student's Library" (Queen's Printers, 6s. each) are THE BOOK OF DANIEL FROM THE CHRISTIAN STANDPOINT, by Rev. J. Kennedy, and THE AGE OF THE MACCABEES, by Rev. A. W. Streane. The appearance of these books makes one wish that her Majesty would change her printers; or that Messrs. Eyre and Spottiswoode would make an effort to place the Queen's print on a level with the Queen's English. Such ugly, vulgar dulness of type, title-page, and cover is now happily becoming exceptional. Of the two volumes Dr. Streane's is the more interesting; it deals with a little known period, which yet is of great importance for the student of the New Testament; for the attitude of the Jews at the time of Christ cannot be understood by those to whom the period between Alexander the Great and Herod the Great is a blank. Dr. Kennedy's "Daniel" is merely a fighting book. He attempts to confute Dr. Driver and the higher critics, and in doing so exhibits more learning than tact. What, for instance, is so likely to prejudice a reader against the argument that is to follow as the motto on the fly-leaf:—"Can Time undo what once was true?"

CHRISTIANITY AND ANTI-CHRISTIANITY IN THEIR FINAL CONFLICT, by Mr. Samuel J. Andrews (G. P. Putnam's Sons), is a thoughtful, rather than a powerful book. The writer's apparent aim is to show that in the tendencies of the present time may be discerned a "preparation for the final fulfilment of the Scripture predictions" respecting a widespread apostasy from the Christian faith, and the appearance of an Anti-Christ. Mr. Andrews' view of these tendencies is uniformly pessimistic, and a large section of the book is devoted to quotations from modern writers. Mr. Andrews' summary of the Scriptural statements respecting the Anti-Christ is careful and sober, though it does not take account of the results of recent criticism—e.g., in regard to the date and character of the Apocalypse, or the authorship of the second epistle of St. Peter. Mr. Andrews' survey of modern movements and tendencies lacks balance, but much that he says is forcibly and suggestively stated.

Mr. Macpherson's CHRISTIAN DOGMATICS (T. and T. Clark, 9s.) is an attempt "to give a systematic presentation" of Christian doctrines from the standpoint of a "moderate Calvinism." The section on the "History of Dogmatics" is singularly fair and admirably concise. In its calmness, its spirituality, and its breadth, Mr. Macpherson's statement of Christian doctrine contrasts favourably with most books of the same class.

Two reissues which deserve notice are the sixth edition of Mr. W. J. Cripps' OLD ENGLISH PLATE (Murray, 21s.), which incorporates the new information, especially as to church plate, gained by antiquarians, many of whom were stimulated by the appearance of the book twenty years ago to make their own inquiries; and the third edition of Mr. Rowland Ward's RECORDS OF BIG GAME (Rowland Ward, 30s. n.), which has many new illustrations, and another valuable addition in the shape of short descriptions of the characteristics and distribution of each species.

Messrs. Newnes' new HANS ANDERSEN'S FAIRY TALES (12s.) is a handsome, well-printed quarto, with a wealth of illustrations (set in the page) by Helen Stratton. They are worked in pen and ink, and are full of originality and humour, and in thorough accord with the spirit of the text.

COCK-CROW.

The moon has set; the prophets of the morning
Sonorous and defiant, shrill and clear,
Under the starlight echo forth a warning:
"The Lord of Day is near!"

A sense of light unseen is slowly growing
O'er weald and wold ere yet the dawn's unfurled—
Ere yet the God, on stairs of gold a-glowing,
Climbs up the edge o' the world.

Sweet is the sunrise savour of the grasses,
Fragrant the incense of the dewy way,
And breath of flowers; yet no sweet surpasses
The scent of the newborn day.

THE MOOD AND THE BOOK.

It is rather a strange thing—but observation assures one of its truth—that comparatively few people understand that in reading, as in every other pursuit worth pursuing, there is room for the practice of art. Nowadays we are all utilitarian rather than artistic; and it is, perhaps, because so few people know how to read that we are gradually ceasing, as the literary journals perpetually remind us, to be a nation of book-lovers. Every man who knows his letters thinks he can read; and the portly financier who sits opposite you in the railway carriage every morning, deep in columns of stocks, would smile with indulgent contempt if you assured him that from end to end of the year he never reads intelligently at all—reads, that is to say, in the only way that reading is worth while—the only way that leaves an effect beyond the moment. Still, one scarcely expects Throgmorton Street to be literary, and the art of reading would not be worth discussing at all among one's books and bookmen friends if it were not that many of the sincerest lovers of literature seem to miss the full enjoyment that springs from a book chosen to fit a mood, and a mood chiming in exact harmony with a book. The mood and the book! The time, and the place, and the loved one all together! This is the true secret, the true art, of reading, and in its kind its charm is unsurpassable. Only to attain to it is difficult.

All art is a matter of selection; and, above all things, the art of reading depends upon choice. But, just as the maiden in her first season fails to know her own mind, however much she is herself convinced to the contrary, so the untrained reader is ignorant of what he wants, is incapable of choosing the book which he is ripe to enjoy. I know a man, a true lover of poetry if ever there was one, who will go out into the fields on a blue spring morning, and read Wordsworth's "Ode on the Intimations of Immortality" in the open air, full of the belief that this is the one way to appreciate it. And I believe that nine people out of ten would agree with him; possibly, indeed, they are right. Yet I remain unconvinced. The open country, where "the young lambs bound as to the labor's sound," with the springing sod beneath me, and the carolling lark above—here is, perhaps, the one place and the one moment in which I do not want to read that immortal pæan of spring, in which it seems for the hour unnecessary, for the very reason that it is inevitable. Poetry, said its author, is emotion remembered in tranquillity; if that be so, reading, too, should surely be governed by the same sentiment. To enjoy the portrayal of an emotion, whatever the form of art, we must be at the moment free of it in our own selves. If you are labouring under loss, you do not want to see the Antigone; and it is when we are without trouble ourselves that we are best able to sympathize with the less fortunate. Emotion, in a word, works by contrast; and since reading is essentially the arousing of emotion, it is largely dependent upon the selection of contrasted or antithetic moods. The man who is without a sense of contrast is without imagination also; and to lack imagination is, intellectually, to be dead already. And in some form or other imagination survives in almost every healthy, working intellect. To look at the thing in its lightest aspect, we all remember Calverley's city clerk at the seaside, how he sat him down upon the yellow sand, between the sun and moon upon the shore:—

And thought how, posted near his door,
His own green door on Camden Hill,
Two bands at least, most likely more,
Were mingling at their own sweet will

Verdi with Vance. And at the thought
He laughed again, and softly drew
That Morning Herald that he'd bought
Forth from his breast, and read it through.

Well, that is the Cockney reduction to absurdity of my little theory of contrast, and it is so violent that it almost seems to wreck it with burlesque. And yet consider the human nature of the thing! Consider how the reader revelled in the familiar stocks; in the railway accident at London Bridge, "whereby many City men were delayed for an hour at the busiest time of the morning"; and how every item gained in relish from the sense that for a fortnight he was free of it all! He chose a homely medium, it is true, but he appreciated the value of contrast; and I am not sure but that he went down to his house justified rather than my friend who needs the chorus of nature about him before he can be at one with Wordsworth!

Of course, one does not want to labour the point of contrast; literature is not entirely "allopathic," as Harley Street might say. The mourner must still return to In Memoriam, and the armies of the future will doubtless march into action to the music of Mr. Rudyard Kipling. But that well-worn Greek audience, which fined Phrynichus for moving it to tears, understood better than most of us that man lives by the reaction of moods alone. The child, too, seems to understand it better than the man. In a familiar passage Mr. Ruskin declares that, if a young girl is turned loose in a library, she will inevitably choose only such books as are healthful to her. In the matter of girlhood Mr. Ruskin is an optimist; and one fears that in these days of "feminine culture" the confidence is a little too enthusiastic. But it is certainly true that boys and girls, running riot among their father's books, do manage with wonderful felicity to pick out the book that suits the mood. Youth has no affectations; it never reads what it does not care about, and it derives immense enjoyment and stimulus from the book that pleases it. Somehow, the richer shelves of maturity do not always seem to add to that pleasure quite in the proportion that they should. It may be that many interests blunt the emotions, that "he who increaseth knowledge increaseth," if not "sorrow," at least confusion, and that when the moods become more complex it is more difficult to find the books to fit them. Certainly, in the art of reading, there are some things that never return, "some first affections, some shadowy recollections," which can never be recaptured. They come like a flood of light across the countryside in spring; every bush and every tree falls into relief, and the wood beyond is woven with mysterious hollows. So, when first the mood and the book join hands, in the golden spring of boyhood, life seems flooded with new meaning, a great wonder breaks in upon us; we lift up our eyes unto the hills, and we know that the world is good. And oh! if only those emotions, those evasive, tremulous moods could be restored to us! But they pass with the light step and the careless laugh, and the thoughts of man are grey, grey thoughts!

It may be, then, that for pure enjoyment the man of few books is to be envied, just as the man of few moods seems to come most easily through the tangle of existence. But the moods must be strong; and the books, need one add? must be of the elect. Perhaps not even a hundred "best books" are necessary to a liberal education: one has known men of natural literary culture who were probably on intimate terms with fewer. For the elect have always their moods; you never turn to them in vain; they mourn to you, they pipe to you, you may weep or dance at will. But what is one to say for the dreary multitude of books poured forth every week from these weary presses of Britain, books whose very existence seems staked on the boast that they have no mood for any one? Worse still are the magazine and the popular pennyworth of home chatter. It is said that the cheap periodical is killing the book in England; if there is any truth in it, it is a wretched outlook. For the newest form of magazine seems designed solely for the killing of moods; it snaps its cheap information at you like a pistol, with a "Stand and deliver" intonation which annihilates thought; it is nothing for two pages together; it makes mocks and mows like a dancer in a booth, and it leaves you exhausted without the satisfaction of having been entertained. It is produced by those who lack imagination for the better suppression of imagination in others, and it promises to be fatal to the play of the idea. Promises—but, let us hope, will fail of its effect. Surely we shall not be contented with it for long. It seems impossible that the coming generation will not return upon itself—return, too, to the pleasant pastures of pure literature. The very violence of the change must end in reaction; restlessness cannot be a permanent mood, even with the young. But never more than now was it the duty of those of us who care for literary tradition, and believe in the incalculable power of books to humanize and recreate—never was it more our duty to do what we can to hold to what is restful and sure in letters, and to repress what is restless and vain. Life is made up of emotion; it is by literature that emotion is most keenly aroused. There is the mood and there is the book. Shall they not work together to the perfecting of the little while that is given us for toil and for enjoyment?

ARTHUR WAUGH.

FATE AND THE APOTHECARY.

[BY GEORGE GISSING.]

"Farmilee. Chemist by Examination."

So did the good man proclaim himself to a suburb of a city in the West of England. It was one of those pretty, clean, fresh-coloured suburbs only to be found in the West: a few dainty little shops, everything about them bright or glistening, scattered among pleasant little houses with gardens eternally green and all but perennially in bloom; every vista ending in foliage, and in one direction a far glimpse of the Cathedral towers, sending forth their music to fall dreamily upon these quiet roads. The neighbourhood seemed to breathe a tranquil prosperity. Red-cheeked emissaries of butcher, baker, and grocer, order-book in hand, knocked cheerily at kitchen doors, and went smiling away; the ponies they drove were well-fed and frisky, their carts spick and span. The church of the parish, an imposing edifice, dated only from a few years ago, and had cost its noble founder a sum of money which any church-going parishioner would have named to you with proper awe. The population was largely female, and every shopkeeper who knew his business had become proficient in bowing, smiling, and suave servility.

Mr. Farmilee, it is to be feared, had no very profound acquaintance with his business from any point of view. True, he was "chemist by examination," but it had cost him repeated efforts to reach this unassailable ground, and more than one pharmacist with whom he abode as assistant had felt it a measure of prudence to dispense with his services. Give him time, and he was generally equal to the demands of suburban customers; hurry or interrupt him, and he showed himself anything but the man for a crisis. Face and demeanour were against him. He had exceedingly plain features, and a persistently sour expression; even his smile suggested sarcasm. He could not tune his voice to the tradesman note, and on the slightest provocation he became, quite unintentionally, offensive. Such a man had no chance whatever in this flowery and bowery little suburb.

Yet he came hither with hopes. One circumstance seemed to him especially favourable; the shop was also a post-office, and no one could fail to see (it was put most impressively by the predecessor who sold him the business) how advantageous was this blending of public service with commercial interest; especially as there was no telegraphic work to make a skilled assistant necessary. As a matter of course, people using the post-office would patronize the chemist; and a provincial chemist can add to his legitimate business sundry pleasant little tradings which benefit himself without provoking the jealousy of neighbour shopmen. "It will be your own fault, my dear sir, if you do not make a very good thing of it indeed. The sole and sufficient explanation of—of the decline during this last year or two is my checking health. I really have not been able to do justice to the business."

Necessarily, Mr. Farmilee entered into negotiation with the postal authorities; and it was with some little disappointment that he learnt how very modest could be his direct remuneration for the responsibilities and labours he undertook. The Post-office is a very shrewdly managed department of the public service; it has brought to perfection the art of obtaining maximum results with a minimum expenditure. But Mr. Farmiloe remembered the other aspect of the matter; he would benefit so largely by this ill-paid undertaking that grumbling was foolish. Moreover, the thing carried dignity with it; he served her Majesty, he served the nation. And—ha, ha!—how very odd it would be to post one's letters in one's own post-office! One might really get a good deal of amusement out of the thought, after business hours.

His age was eight-and-thirty. For some years he had pondered matrimony, though without fixing his affections on any particular person. It was plain, indeed, that he ought to marry. Every tradesman is made more respectable by wedlock, and a chemist, who, in some degree, resembles a medical man, seems especially to stand in need of the matrimonial guarantee. Had it been feasible, Mr. Farmiloe would have brought a wife with him from the town where he had lived for the past few years; but he was in the difficult position of knowing not a single marriageable female to whom he could address himself with hope or with self-respect. Natural shyness had always held him aloof from reputable women; he felt that he could not recommend himself to them—he who had such an unlucky aptitude for saying the wrong word or keeping silence when speech was demanded. With the men of his acquaintance he could relieve his sense of awkwardness and deficiency by becoming aggressive; in fact, he had a reputation for cantankerousness, for pugnacity which kept most of his equals in some awe of him, and to perceive this was one solace amid many disappointments. Nicely-dressed and well-spoken and good-looking women above the glass of domestic servant he worshipped from afar, and only in vivacious moments pictured himself as the wooer of such a superior being.

It seemed as though fate could do nothing graciously with Mr. Farmiloe. At six-and-thirty he suffered the shock of learning that a relative—an old woman to whom he had occasionally written as a matter of kindness (Farmiloe could do such things)—had left him by will the sum of six hundred pounds. It was strictly a shock; it upset his health for several days, and not for a week or two could he realize the legacy as a fact. Just when he was beginning to look about him with a new air of confidence, the solicitors who were managing the little affair for him daily acquainted him with the fact that his deceased relative's will was contested by other kinsfolk whom the old woman had passed over, on the ground that she was imbecile and incapable of conducting her affairs. There followed a law-suit, which consumed many months and cost a good deal of money; so that, though he won his case, Mr. Farmiloe lost all satisfaction in his improved circumstances, and was only more embittered against the world at large.

Then, no sooner had he purchased his business, than he learnt from smiling neighbours that he had paid considerably too much for it. His predecessor, beyond a doubt, would have taken very much less; had, indeed, been on the point of doing so just when Mr. Farmiloe appeared. This kind of experience is a trial to any man. It threw Mr. Farmiloe into a silent rage, with the result that two or three customers who chanced to enter his shop declared that they would never have anything more to do with such a surly creature.

And now began his torment—a form of exasperation peculiar to his dual capacity of shopkeeper and manager of a post-office. All day long he stood on the watch for customers—literally stood, now behind the counter, now in front of it, his eager and angry eyes turning to the door whenever the step of a passer-by sounded without. If the door opened his nerves began to tingle, and he straightened himself like a soldier at attention. For a moment he suffered an agony of doubt. Would the person entering turn to the counter or to the post-office side? And seldom was his hope fulfilled; not one in four of the people who came in was a genuine customer; the post-office, always the post-office. A stamp, a card, a newspaper wrapper, a postal order, a letter to be registered—anything but an honest purchase across the counter or the blessed tendering of a prescription to make up. From recreation he passed to amusements, to (tragic) farry; he cursed the post-office, and committed to detestable perdition the man who had waxed eloquent upon its advantages. Of course, he had hired an errand-boy, and never had an errand-boy had so little legitimate occupation. Resolved not to pay him for nothing, Mr. Farmiloe kept him cleaning windows, washing bottles, and the like, until the lad fairly broke into rebellion. If this was the sort of work he was engaged for he must have higher wages; he wasn't over strong, and his mother said he must lead an open-air life—that was why he had taken the place. To be bearded thus in his own shop was too much for Mr. Farmiloe; he seized the opportunity of giving him a full swing, and burst into a frenzy of vilification. Just as his passion reached its height (he stood with his back to the door) there entered a lady who wished to make a large purchase of disinfectants. Alarmed and scandalized at what was going on, she had no sooner crossed the threshold than she turned again, and hurried away. Her friends were not long in learning from her that the new chemist was a most violent man, a most disagreeable person—the very last man one would think of doing business with.

The house was but poorly furnished, and Mr. Farmiloe had engaged a very cheap general servant, who involved him in dirt and discomfort. It was a matter of talk among the neighbouring tradesmen that the chemist lived in a beggarly fashion. When the dismissed errand-boy spread the story of how he had been used, people jumped to the conclusion that Mr. Farmiloe drank. Before long there was a legend that he had been seen suffering from an acute attack of delirium tremens.

The post-office, always the post-office. If he sat down to a meal the shop bell clanged, and—hope springing eternal—he hurried forth in readiness to make up a packet or edify a mixture; but it was an old lady who held him in talk for ten minutes about rates of postage to South America. When, by rare luck, he had a prescription to dispense (the hideous scrawl of that pestilent Dr. Bunker) in came somebody with letters and parcels which he was requested to weigh; and his hand shook so with rage that he could not resume his dispensing for the next quarter of an hour. People asked extraordinary questions, and were surprised, offended, when he declared he could not answer them. When would a letter be delivered at a village on the north-west coast of Ireland? Was it true that the post-office contemplated a reduction of rates to Hong-kong? Would he explain in detail the new system of express delivery? Invariably he betrayed impatience, and occasionally he lost his temper; people went away exclaiming what a horrid man he was!

"Mr. What's-your-name," said a shopkeeper one day, after receiving a short answer, "I shall make it my business to complain of you to the Postmaster-General. I don't come here to be insulted."

"Who insulted you?" returned Farmiloe like a sulken schoolboy.

"Why, you did. And you're always doing it."

"I'm not!"

"You are!"

"If I did"—terror stole upon the chemist's heart—"I didn't mean it, and I—I'm sure I apologize. It's a way I have."

"A damned bad way, let me tell you. I advise you to get out of it."

"I'm sorry."

"So you should be."

And the tradesman walked off, only half appeased. Mr. Farmiloe could have shed tears in his mortification, and for some minutes he stood looking at a bottle of laudanum, wishing he had the courage to have done with life. Plainly, he could not live very long unless things improved. His ready money was coming to an end; rent and rates loomed before him. An awful thought of bankruptcy haunted him in the early morning hours.

The most frequent visitor to the post-office was a well-dressed middle-aged man, who spoke civilly, and did his business in the fewest possible words. Mrs. Farmiloe rather liked the look of him, and once or twice made conversational overtures, but with no encouraging result. One day, feeling bolder than usual, the chemist ventured to speak what he had in mind. After supplying the grave gentleman with stamps and postal orders, he said, in a tone meant to be conciliatory:—

"I don't know whether you ever have need of mineral waters, Sir?"

"Why, yes, sometimes. My ordinary tradesman supplies them."

"I thought I'd just mention that I keep them in stock."

"Ah—thank you—"

"I've noticed," went on the luckless apothecary, his bosom heaving with a sense of his wrongs, "that you're a pretty large customer of the post-office, and it seems to me"—he meant to speak jocosely—"that it would be only fair if you gave me a turn now and then. I get next to nothing out of this, you know. I should be much obliged if you—"

The man of few words was looking at him, half in surprise, half in indignation, and when the chemist blundered into silence he spoke:—

"I really have nothing to do with that. As a matter of fact, I was on the point of making a little purchase in your shop, but I decidedly object to this kind of behaviour, and shall make my purchases elsewhere."

He strode solemnly into the street, and Mr. Farmiloe, unconscious of all about him, glared at vacancy.

Whether from the angry tradesman, or from some lady with whom Mr. Farmiloe had been abrupt, a complaint did presently reach the postal authorities, with the result that an official called at the chemist's shop. The interview was unpleasant. It happened that Mr. Farmiloe (not for the first time) had just then allowed himself to run out of certain things always in demand by the public—halfpenny stamps, for instance. Moreover, his accounts were not in perfect order. This, he had to hear, was emphatically unbusinesslike, and, in brief, would not do.

"It shall not occur again, Sir," mumbled the unhappy man.

"But, if you consider my position—"

"Mr. Farmiloe, allow me to tell you that that is a matter for your own consideration, and no one else's."

"True, Sir, quite true. Still when you come to think of it—"

"I assure you—"

"The only assurance I want is that the business of the post-office will be properly attended to, and that assurance I must have. I shall probably call again before long. Good-morning."

It was always with a savage satisfaction that Mr. Farmiloe heard the clock strike eight on Saturday evening. His shop remained open till ten, but at eight came the end of post-office business. If, as happened, any one entered five minutes too late, it delighted him to refuse their request. These were the only moments in which he felt himself a free man. After eating his poor supper, he smoked a pipe or two of cheap tobacco, brooding; or he fingered the pages of his menacing account books; or, very rarely, he walked about the dark country roads, asking himself, with many a tragi-comic gesture and ejaculation, why he could not get on like other men.

One afternoon it seemed that he, at length, had his chance. There entered a maidservant with a prescription to be made up and sent as soon as possible. A glance at the name delighted Mr. Farmiloe; it was that of the richest family in the suburbs. The medicine, to be sure, was only for a governess, but his existence was recognized, and the patronage of such people would do him good. But for the never-to-be-sufficiently-condemned handwriting of Dr. Bunker, the prescription offered no difficulty. Babbling his palms together, and smiling, as he seldom smiled, he told the domestic that the medicine should be delivered in less than half an hour.

Scarcely had he begun upon it when a lady came in, a lady whom he knew too well. Her business was at the post-office side, and she looked a peremptory demand for his attention. In vainly futile, he crossed the shop.

"Be so good as to tell me what this will cost by book post."

It seemed to be a pamphlet. Giving a glance at one of the open ends, Mr. Farmiloe saw handwriting within, and his hostility to the woman found vent in a sharp remark:—

"There's a written communication in this. It will be better rate."

The lady eyed him with a terrible scorn, and said:—

"You will oblige me by minding your own business. Your remark is the merest impertinence. That packet consists of MS., and will, therefore, go at book rate. Be so good as to weigh it at once."

Mr. Farmiloe lost all control of himself, and well-nigh screamed:—

"No, Madam, I will not weigh it! And let me inform you, as you are so ignorant, that to weigh packets is not part of my duty. I do it merely to oblige civil persons, and you, Madam, are not one of them."

The lady instantly turned and withdrew.

"Damn the post-office!" yelled Mr. Farmiloe, alone with his errand-boy, and shaking his fist in the air. "This very day I write to give it up. I say—damn the post-office."

He returned to his dispensing, completed it, wrapped up the bottle in the customary manner, and despatched the boy to the house.

Five minutes later a thought flashed through his mind which put him in a cold sweat. He happened to glance along the shelf from which he had taken the bottle containing the last ingredient of the mixture, and it struck him, with all the force of a horrible doubt, that he had made a mistake. In the frate confusion of his thoughts, he had done the dispensing almost mechanically. The bottle he ought to have taken down was that; but had he not actually poured from that other? Of poisoning there was no fear; but, if indeed he had made the slip, the result would be a very extraordinary mixture; so surprising, in fact, that the patient would be sure to speak to Dr. Bunker about it. Good Heavens! He felt sure he had made the mistake.

Any other man would have taken down the two bottles in question, and have examined the mouths of them for traces of moisture. Mr. Farmiloe, a victim of destiny, could do nothing so reasonable. Headless of the fact that his shop remained unguarded, he seized his hat and rushed after the errand-boy.

If he could only have a sniff at the mixture it would either confirm his fear or set his mind at rest. He tore along the road—and was too late. The boy met him, having just completed his errand.

With a wild curse he sped to the house, he rushed to the tradesman's door. The medicine just delivered! He must examine it—he feared there was a mistake—an extraordinary oversight.

The bottle had not yet been sent upstairs. Mr. Farmiloe tore off the wrapper, wrenched out the cork, sniffed—and smiled feebly.

"Thank you. I'm glad to find there was no mistake. I'll take it back, and have it wrapped up again, and send it immediately—immediately. And, by-the-by—" he fumbled in his pocket for half-a-crown, still smiling like a detected culprit.

"I'm sure you won't mention this little affair. A new assistant of mine—stupid fellow—I am going to get rid of him at once. Thank you, thank you."

Notwithstanding that half-a-crown the incident was, of course, talked of through the house before a quarter of an hour had elapsed. Next day it was the gossip of the suburbs; and the day after the city itself had heard the story. People were alarmed and scandalized. Why, such a chemist was a public danger!

One lady declared that she ought at once to be "struck off the rolls!"

And so, in a sense, he was. Another month and the flowery, bowery little suburb knew him no more. He hid himself in a great town, living on the wreck of his fortune whilst he sought a place as an assistant. A leaky pair of boots and a bad customer found the unbearable spot of his constitution. After all, there was just enough money left to bury him.

Notes.

In commemoration of the thousandth anniversary in 1901 of King Alfred's death, it has been decided that a statue of him, together with a hall to be used as a museum of Early English History, shall be erected at Winchester, where he was buried. The publication of a popular work on Alfred has, we understand, also been arranged for, and other means of commemoration are being considered. For these purposes £30,000 will be necessary, of which £3,000 has already been subscribed. Donations should be sent to Mr. A. Bowker (ex-Mayor), Guildhall, Winchester.

At last Saturday's ceremony at Edmonton, where bas-reliefs to Lamb and Keats were unveiled to commemorate their connexion with the town, Mr. Frederic Harrison noted the one element in common between the two men, that they were both almost entirely self-educated. Otherwise it would be difficult to find two contemporary writers of genius so different as the respective authors of "The Ode to the Nightingale," and "A Dissertation upon Roast Pig." As to Lamb's connexion with Edmonton, the story of his sister's illness, which brought him there, and of his own somewhat sudden death must always appeal to the visitor to "Bay Cottage."

But the interest of Keats' sojourn at Edmonton as a surgeon's apprentice, and at Enfield under the tuition of the Rev. John Clarke, and as a schoolfellow of Charles Cowden Clarke is not so purely personal. It touches the question as to the character of his early studies. While at Enfield he made the exhaustive researches in Lempriere's "Classical Dictionary," Tooke's "Pantheon," and Spence's "Polymetis" which bore fruit in his treatment of the Greek Mythology. Mr. W. M. Rossetti says he also made some acquaintance with Shakespeare, and told a younger schoolfellow that he thought no one durst read Macbeth alone in the house at two in the morning. While at Edmonton, too, the future author of "The Eve of St. Agnes" no doubt imbibed much of its medieval spirit in his studies of Spenser. The mixture of classical and medieval lore in "The Faerie Queene" is in fact thoroughly typical of Keats. His attachment to Spenser, too, like his attachment to De Foe, fostered his native gift of narrative poetry. Perhaps his love for "The Faerie Queene" accounts for some of the longueurs of "Endymion," just as his later studies of Dryden's Fables may have been partly responsible for the conciseness of "Lamia."

Influenza has claimed another victim in the world of letters in the person of Mr. Henry Offley Wakeman, who was taken ill at Basle, on his way home from Egypt. Mr. Wakeman had a distinguished career at Oxford, taking a first in history in 1873, acting as bursar and tutor at Keble, and as history examiner in 1888 and 1889, and holding an All Souls' Fellowship. He wrote a great deal on historical subjects, and many of his books were very widely read. The principal of them were—"The Church and the Puritans," "Introduction to the History of the Church of England," and "The Ascendency of France" in the "Periods of Modern History" Series. His impartiality as a historian was, to a certain extent, affected by his well-known and pronounced leaning towards the views of the High Church Party, but the merits of his writings were recognized even by his opponents, and high hopes were entertained for his future work.

The late Duke of Beaufort had a certain connexion with letters. In conjunction with Mr. A. E. T. Watson he edited the whole of the Badminton Library of Sport, and was also author of the volume on Driving, part author of that on Hunting, and a contributor to that on Riding.

When The Prisoner of Zenda proved successful in its stage version at the St. James' and the vogue arose for "costume plays," there was some thought of Mr. George Alexander reviving Henry V. In place, perhaps, of Shakespeare's drama, Mr. Edward Rose provided a play of the next reign, called In Days of Old, in which the wars of York and Lancaster form the background to a complicated story of the loves and hates of Lillian, Amyra, and Ulick Boddart, which admits the appearance on the stage of Henry and Margaret of Anjou. Here, again, as at the Garrick last week, despite the excellent setting, dresses, and actors, the drama has been forgotten. This is the difficulty which hampers the praiseworthy desire to revive the historical drama. There is a clash of interests on the part of the two Boddarts, and there is a clash of swords and some atmosphere of the period, but Mr. Rose has yet to write an epic play on the Wars of the Roses.

The vulgarization of the fittest among words and proper names is an inevitable process. It takes but a few years, sometimes a few months, for terms of appreciation to become hackneyed and insincere—and therefore meaningless—by the violent uses of journalism. "Precious" died ten years ago; "winsome" had but a feeble existence which has now fluttered away; "convincing" is moribund; "distinguished" and "charming" need much care. No critic who respects his style can now say that so-and-so "has arrived" or "will go far." The phrases serve for a day, and to-morrow pass into the banal; the ready-made, into the service of the hurried and the commonplace—some of them, perhaps, to be revived under happier auspices.

The decay and the revival holds good in just the same way in the case of proper names. "Multa renascentur quæ jam cecidere." This is a matter of which the romance writer must take careful note. Many names have had to be blotted out of the already small list suitable for serious heroines. A correspondent, Mr. Leonard Merrick, is at the present moment unable to finish a book because, as he wrote, the name of his heroine had taken on an entirely new significance. For three years he thought of her as Maud; he endowed her with the attributes of the Maud of his imagination. But meanwhile time had been at work, and a change for the worse had set in—"Mord Em'ly" was published, then came Alice Maud of the "Hooligan Papers," and, behold, Maud had become a synonym for 'Arriet. Maud is no longer "tall and stately."

Maud, the delight of the village, the ringing joy of the hall.

What is she now? My dreams are bad. She may bring me a curse.

To-day she suggests, not the calling of the birds in the high hall garden, but the discords of a concertina in a side street off Covent-garden. Tennyson would not have chosen Maud had he written to-day.

Our correspondent thinks that there should be a protest against the profanation of the most beautiful names belonging to Englishwomen. Yet the heroines of Lambeth may be as good Englishwomen as those of Kensington Gore. The name of Maud, for instance, is for all the world to use. Tennyson popularized it; in the passing of a generation it fills the streets of Walworth. The days of Maud, we fear, must, like those of Helen of Troy, have an end. Maud, Violet, and Irene slip from Bayswater into Bermondsey; the whirligig of time brings in his revenges, and Betty, Peggy, Susan, and Sarah are once more the names which suggest the beauty and light of English womanhood. Some names, like John and Mary, belong to all classes and yet retain for special reasons a dignity of their own. But they are exceptions which prove—that is, as our correspondence on this phrase explained, "test"—the rule.

The innumerable verse-writers of the day, a selection from whose recent productions we review on another page, are by no means averse to experiments in metre; and we cannot but think it a pity that they so very rarely see what can be done with that expressive and essentially English rhythm, the hexameter. It is only by a coincidence that the English bears a deceptive resemblance to the Classical hexameter; and it is essentially English, not only because it has in the hands of Clough, Kingsley, and Longfellow proved its magical power as a vehicle for romance, for vers de société, and for classical legend, but because it represents almost perfectly the cadence natural to English sentences.

This characteristic, and the licence which the poet may allow himself in placing the accent on the third or on every other syllable, involves, of course, a serious danger, and accounts, for instance, for Longfellow's "hasty, but somewhat irascible blacksmith." But for a writer with a fine ear, even if he do not bind himself by the severe accentual rules observed by Kingsley in "Andromeda," the lilt of the metre can be made to reveal a peculiar charm and distinction of its own, and indeed to transport us, as no other metre is able to do,

Far over hillock and runnel and brooklet, away in the champaign, into the land of dreamlike and beautiful visions. But it is not suited to a lyrical introspective mood; and does not, therefore, we suppose, suggest itself to the self-conscious minor poets of to-day who have allowed the novelist to monopolize the field of romantic narrative—a field in which the poet has achieved, and, when a fresher, happier spirit breathes over the face of the waters, will, we hope, yet again achieve, his greatest victories.

A very clever and interesting pamphlet recently published by the Oxford University Press, and written by a Cambridge scholar, Mr. W. J. Stone, seems to show that to critics nurtured on classical metres—Mr. Stone is, we think, an Etonian—this view of the hexameter does not offer much satisfaction. He recognizes the accentual English hexameter as a legitimate metre, and we do not quite see why, if this is admitted, he should object to its being used for translating Homer. Nor should he ignore the distinction between Kingsley, who alone made a conscientious attempt to avoid trochees, and the other hexametrist among our English poets. But he is not content with our accentual hexameter, and appeals in almost plaintive phrases, as of one crying in the desert, for the revival of a metre purely quantitative. He is conscious that he is "exploring a desert white with the bones of distinguished predecessors, and persistently shunned and derided by the mass of sensible Englishmen." So dissatisfied is he with the present state of things that for him there is no other road for a hexametrist but that which leads to the desert aforesaid.

I shrink with horror [he says] when I picture the crowd of ready sympathizers, who, like Matthew Arnold, are prepared to meet me half-way. Believe me, there is no compromise. Reject the idea altogether, or be prepared to follow it to its logical end. No one need agree with me on any single point of prosody, but a strict prosody there must be, if the attempt is to have any sound basis at all.

This of course is one main difficulty to Mr. Stone's ingenious argument. A strict prosody must be to a great extent arbitrary and as little likely to gain general consent as a system of phonetic spelling. We are wholly at a loss to see why the first syllable of "reaction" is to be long because "Syllables followed by a vowel are all long unless they come after the accent of a word." And is even Mr. Stone, when with laudable intrepidity he puts his principles into practice, always a safe guide? Take these two lines:—

For shē | willed Ōdys | seūs should ā | wāke ānd |
see hēr in | āll hēr |
Loveliness.

and

Thān whēn | twō dwēlling | in ōne ā | bōde āre āt |
ōne in | āll things.

What, we ask in despair, is to be the quantity of "in," which, though in each case followed by a vowel, is here both long and short? But the real bar to the recognition among us of a quantitative metre is one not alluded to by Mr. Stone. To Southern peoples with their lingering speech, dwelling with a soft monotony on the longer syllables, quantity becomes easily appreciable. To the northerner who ejects his words with forceful jerks no metrical distinction is possible but that of accent.

But it is only fair to give a brief sample of Mr. Stone's own performance, entreating our readers to read it slowly, keeping the natural accent, but dwelling on the syllables which are naturally long.

When maidens and mistress alike had wearied of eating,
They cast from them aside their veils and fell to the ball-play,
White-armed Nausicaa leading the measure to the players:—
As the arrow-scattering goddess Artemis hunts on a hill-side,
Or on Taygetus far-towering or Erymanthus,
Glorying in the rapid-footed hinds and hardy-footed boars:
While many nymphs with her, all of Zeus begot aegis-bearing,
Come to the hunt sportively;—a pride and glory to Leto.

On the second or third reading much beauty may be extracted from the rendering. "The arrow-scattering Goddess," quite unscannable by "accent," gains a fine sonorousness for the "quantitative" reader. To all students of prosody this pamphlet will afford much matter for thought—not only for its ingenuity but for its sketch of the history of the English hexameter.

An interesting study in metre as illustrated by the rhythms of Coventry Patmore has just been written by Mr. Maurice F. Egan, LL.D., of the Catholic University of America. He analyses the general technique of Patmore, and concludes that:—"It is in the management of the pauses—in the recognition of the value of time beats—that Coventry Patmore's supremacy in the ode form lies."

The day has not come when the reading of poetry will be taught as carefully as the musician teaches the reading of music, but a score of the verse effects of Mr. Patmore might easily be prepared, within certain musical limitations, which would broaden the views of those readers of verse who now fancy that the music of the great poet consists principally in recurrent rhymes or assonances, and thus limit their perception and enjoyment.

The revised edition of Mr. J. E. C. Bodley's "France" (Macmillan, 10s.) contains a new preface of great interest. Its aim is to persuade English readers that the failure of justice in France, and the too powerful influence of lawyers and journalists "who for twenty years have made ministerial instability a science," gives no ground for suggesting any inferiority in the French nation itself. Mr. Bodley disputes the maxim that "every people has the government it deserves." Aptitude to work parliamentary government successfully "is not a virtue the absence of which degrades a people, as the French may see if they look across the Vosges."

Germany in its united Empire and in its component parts has a political system of which any schoolboy in Laputa could demonstrate the vices. None the less it has pushed past France to the front rank of nations. . . . The greatness or superiority of a nation does not depend on the theoretical principles of its constitution, or we should hail Uruguay and Venezuela as patterns of government for the human race. It depends on the effective sum of the qualities of its people. . . . Parliamentary proceedings at Westminster usually give no sign that there is a dark side to the picture of national prosperity with which we dazzle the world: while most often the debates in the French Chamber totally disguise the existence of goodness and decency in the land.

The French "inferiority" in fact, such as it is, "comes from their adherence to a régime which disagrees with them." The new volume on which Mr. Bodley is at work deals with religious subjects in France, including possibly Anti-Semitism.

Few people are aware that one of the novels of M. Quesnay de Beaurepaire, "Le Forestier," was translated in 1892 by Mrs. Simpson, the daughter of the late Mr. Nassau Senior, and the authoress of "Many Memories of Many People," for Harper and Brothers, New York. It stands apart from other and later writings by the same author, and reveals a real love of the country. It is written under the pseudonym of "Jules de Ghouzet." It has never been published in England.

We mentioned in our last issue some volumes of interest which changed hands at Messrs. Sotheby's last week. The following also deserve mention:—Caxton, Higden's "Polychronicon," an imperfect copy, £111; Garrick's own copy of the "Poliphili Hypnerotomachia," 1499, £25 5s.; the only known copy of Martin Luther's "Enchiridion piarum precatumum," first edition, £4; Walton's "Compleat Angler," a fairly perfect copy of the first edition, £91; Milton's "Paradise Lost," first edition with the first title-page, 1667, £89; Ben Jonson's "Collected Works," first edition, two vols., quarto, in beautiful condition, £18 15s. Among the more modern books were Tennyson's "Ænone," the privately printed edition of 1857, with the Latin translation by Lord Lyttelton, £35. This little pamphlet was in the pink covers so rarely found complete, and, with the exception of one leaf, was in perfect condition. Thackeray, "Esmond," first edition, £43; Scott, "Waverley," first edition, three vols., in boards as issued, £150—a record price. This copy was perfect, the leaves being entirely uncut. A somewhat similar copy was sold in the same rooms in March last for £5 15s., but in this latter case it was a cut copy in cloth, which made all the difference. Included in the sale was an almost complete set of the Kelmscott books, and the prices obtained showed a considerable advance on those paid for a similar set sold in February last.

But the surprise of the sale came in the extraordinary prices realized by the Stevensoniana. They consisted chiefly of odd pamphlets, and the whimsical Davos Platz prints, thrown off when the author and Mr. Lloyd Osbourne were amusing themselves there with a printing press in the winter of 1881-2. Many of the sixty-seven lots consisted of small single pages, and the majority of them were absolutely without any intrinsic value whatever. Yet together they fetched the enormous aggregate of over £600. The actual average would undoubtedly have been higher had not the collection contained many duplicates—eighteen copies, for instance, of "The Pentland Rising." On the other hand, some of the lots represented the only specimens which can come on the market, the executor of the late Mrs. Stevenson having placed in the sale, unreservedly, all the pamphlets, &c., given by Stevenson to his mother.

As this sale was, so far as the works of Stevenson are concerned, unique, we give below the prices paid for each individual example, quoting the top price where duplicates were concerned, the others not falling much below the figures here given:—"Macaire," a melodramatic farce by W. E. Henley and R. L. Stevenson, 1885, £14; "Beau Austin," a play, by W. E. Henley and R. L. Stevenson, 1884, £20; "Admiral Guinea," a melodrama, by W. E. Henley and R. L. Stevenson, 1884, £19 11s.; "Kidnapped," the original unpublished leaflet edition, 27 pp., £30; "Testimonials in favour of Robert Louis Stevenson, Advocate," privately printed, 1881, £5; "Father Damien," the original Sydney edition, 1890, £41; "Notice of a new form of intermittent light for Lighthouses," 6 pp., with three diagrams, £12; "The Pentland Rising," 1866, £9 10s.; "The Charity Bazaar," 4 pp., £8 10s.; "Moral Emblems," 6 tiny leaves, £13 10s.; "Advertisement of a Second Collection of Moral Emblems," single leaf, £6; "Black Canyon," 4 small leaves, £11; "Advertisement of Black Canyon," 1 leaf, £5 5s.; two leaves printed on light blue paper with rude woodcut of a man admiring a daisy, and on the opposite page, "The Marguerite. Lawks! what a beautiful flower! T. S.," 1882, £8; "A Martial Elegy for some Lead Soldiers," a single leaf, £2 6s.; "The Graver and the Pen," 6 ll. and five woodcuts, £12 15s.; "Not I, and other Poems," four diminutive leaves, £22; "Rob and Ben; or, The Pirate and the Apothecary," three rude woodcuts in black and white, £16 5s.; "The Surprise, vol. The Ashburnham MSS., sold by Messrs. Sotheby on Monday last, formed one of the most noticeable collections of the kind dispersed during the last years of the nineteenth century—certainly since the Hamilton MSS. were sold ten years ago. Yet they constituted only the "appendix" of the immense collection formed by the fourth Earl of Ashburnham. The catalogue was compiled from notes made by the late Lord Ashburnham himself. The first lot, a slightly imperfect "Legenda Sanctorum, or lives of Seyntis in Englysshe," fourteenth century folio, realized £37 (Quaritch). This once belonged to Elias Ashmole, whose arms were stamped in gold on the binding. A folio Bible of the fourteenth century in Latin, written on fine vellum in Gothic characters, brought £125; another Latin Bible of the eleventh century, also on vellum, £146; and a copy of the later version of Wycliffe's Bible of the fourteenth century, a fine specimen of calligraphy on vellum, no less than £1,750. In 1620 William Davenpore, of Bramhall in Cheshire, left "this Booke (God willinge) for a heire loome" to his heirs. A Psalter of the thirteenth century, written in double columns on vellum, brought £51, and a copy of the Gospels in Latin £110. The latter was a fine manuscript in long lines with rubrics and initials in red. Books of devotion realized by far the highest prices at this sale, and among them the following are worthy of mention:—"Heures avec Calendrier, &c.," a quarto of the fourteenth century, £57; three quartos of the fifteenth century, "Horæ Latine," £81; "Orationes Devotæ," £77; "Officia Liturgica," £70. Others were "Horæ Beatissimæ Virginis Mariæ," a sixteenth-century octavo, £300; "Evangeliarum, sive lectiones Evangeliorum per anni circulum," a twelfth-century folio, £300; and "Evangelium S. Matthæi," a ninth-century folio, £166.

Chaucer was represented by six entries, three of which related to contemporary MSS. of "The Canterbury Tales," all unfortunately defective. They realized respectively £130, £23 10s., and £101. Rolle's "Pricke of Conscience" appeared three times, the best MS. being one of the fourteenth century, on vellum, which sold for £71. Sir Philip Sidney's "The Countesse of Pembroke's Arcadia" (sixteenth century) was a surprise, for it brought a trifle of twelve shillings only. Froissart's "Les Chroniques de France" (fifteenth century), in three vols. folio, on vellum, realized £151; and Bede's "Historiæ Ecclesiasticæ libri quinque," a very ancient MS. of the eighth century, £230. A fifteenth-century copy of Higden's "Polychronicon" brought £66, but three copies of "The Chronicle of Brute" failed to sell for more than a few pounds, though each was written on vellum and dated from the fifteenth century. In the case of printed books an estimate of their value can usually be given with tolerable accuracy; not so with MSS. No one would have supposed that a folio volume of "York Miracle Plays," fifteenth century, would have realized £121; or that a very important collection of MSS. made by John Urry for his edition of Chaucer's works, contained in four volumes, would have brought no more than £1 8s. On the whole, however, this sale was an extremely important one. The total sum realized amounted to £8,495 3s.

American Letter.

A NEW KIND OF PLAY.

Among the few dramatic novelties which have been offered to our playgoers during the season now pretty well ended, it is not saying very much of Mr. James A. Herne's Rev. Griffith Davenport to say it is first. It is not saying too much to say it is the only new thing of importance; for neither Cyrano de Bergerac, which was so bad, nor Trelawney of the Wells, which was so good, was quite fresh, though both were notable, and both were new to us. These pieces were of foreign origin and were of foreign sanction before they came here; but Mr. Herne's play is native to our air, if not to our time; and though it has not yet fully made its way with our public, it is worth considering for the high plane on which it has measurably succeeded. That is where I should like to consider it, without concealing my belief that it has faults which may well account for its want of entire success.

This has certainly not been attributable to unfriendly treat-correspondence. On the whole, Mr. Leslie Stephen, after noting that there is no breach of confidence involved, as Browning left his son full authority to do what he pleased with his love letters, gives the publication his approval.

The difficulty [he writes] about the Browning letters is, I think, this—whether, in spite of their own undeniable merits, they will not set a precedent eminently likely to be abused. They may be justified as exceptional. The case is one of those in which the total result is so impressive and edifying that the ordinary rule may be disregarded. Unfortunately, when a precedent is set, there is no way of limiting the application to be made of it. Everybody is apt to be exceptional in his own eyes, and in the eyes of his nearest relatives; and one fears that the habit of turning out the most private receptacles will be encouraged without reason by the success of this particular performance. . . . All that one can do is to recognize the possibility of some bad consequences, and reserve a right to condemn the next follower.

Another article in the same number to which one turns with interest is that on "An Irish Poet," by Lord Lytton. Lord Lytton is only twenty-three years of age, but his paper proves that he inherits the literary talents of his family, and has a gift for luminous and suggestive criticism.

A writer in Blackwood's gives an account of a curious and remarkable volume which (though Macaulay knew it well) is probably known now to few, under the title of "An Irish Boswell." In the same year in which "Boswell's Johnson" was published, there was also published a biography almost worthy to rank with that immortal work, and for the very same qualities which have made it immortal, viz., the life of one Philip Skelton, an Irish Ecclesiastic of much vigour of mind and body, written by Samuel Burdy, his enthusiastic admirer. This is a very well written article, and the topic is an excellent one.

In Longman's Mr. Andrew Lang talks pleasantly about the late Mr. Palgrave, against whom the only charge he ever heard brought was that he talked too copiously. "Poets and critics at Oxford," says Mr. Lang, "come in little groups—Mr. Arnold, Mr. Clough, Mr. Palgrave; or, Mr. Mackail, Mr. Beeching, and their group." He regrets that Palgrave did not write the "Lives of the Poets," which Jowett suggested he should do. In writing of Palgrave, Mr. Lang mentions Mr. Ruskin, and adds the following little reminiscence:—

I think I can remember, in the sixties, hearing Mr. Ruskin ask, "Who is Villon?" and certainly I lent him the works of that poet with which he had been unacquainted.

Mr. Lang, by the way, thinks that the Professorship of Poetry at Oxford should be a matter of three years tenure, instead of ten; and he excites our curiosity by the remark, "There can be no doubt as to who should succeed Mr. Courthope in the chair of Mr. Matthew Arnold." In the same magazine Mrs. Clement Shorter has a good narrative poem in the ballad style, called "Earl Roderick's Bride."

Macmillan's is political rather than literary this month; but it has one sketch of fine poetical quality picturing Finland in its summer glory of rich colour. We may cull from it one little flower:—

The vitality of the human could not vie at all with this vegetative vitality. The pale-hued peasant leisurely handling his hay, piling it high on the low sledge (now doing its summer service of sliding along stubble instead of ice) sank into insignificance amid his environment of flowers girdling the shorn field like a huge garland. Perhaps the difference lay in that they had slept under the snow and he been wakeful, possibly hungry, above it, so that they, but not he, throbbed with the joy and wonder of resurrection. It seemed to me that in them the land was singing a loud, jubilant doxology, singing it in colour instead of in sound, but with as just and rare a music.

Temple Bar has, in "Jacobean lyrists," one of those well-written critical studies one is accustomed to look for in this magazine. It gives a pleasantly-written account of Herriek, Carew, Suckling, and Lovelace—"the four poets whose names are one sweet litany associated with the last years before the storm."

FICTION.

The Awkward Age. By Henry James. 7½ x 5¼ in., 414 pp. London, 1899. Heinemann. 6s.

Those of Mr. Henry James' readers who believed and perhaps hoped that "The Other House," and still more "The Two Magics," might be taken as marking the definitive adoption by him of a new and a broader and bolder artistic method than that of his earlier works will be, if not disappointed, at any rate undeceived by his latest novel. "The Awkward Age" is, from the point of view of manner, a most pronounced "reversion to type." It is Mr. James at his most subtly psychological, at his most overwhelmingly copious, at his most exasperatingly deliberate. As regards subject its affinities are more recent. It shows us again the Mr. James of "What Maisie Knew," and, later still, of "In the Cage," the minute and patient, and, if the truth must be told, the too often wearisome student of that curiously corrupt and frivolous section of contemporary society to which he has latterly devoted so much of his attention. Here he is at his acutest as an analyst, and as a storyteller at his slowest and his most difficult. The length of "The Awkward Age" is inordinate, and though the delicacy and fineness of the literary workmanship are, as usual, admirable, the reader's interest in the fortunes of its characters is in danger of waning to extinction before its close. This, too, is the more to be regretted because the main motive of the story—an exhibition of the contrast between the manners and sentiments of the "old school," as represented in the elderly Mr. Longdon, who has lived for some twenty or thirty years out of the world, and those of the newest new, as personified by Mrs. Brookenham and her daughter, Mr. Vanderbank, Mr. Mitchett, the Duchess, and the rest of the fashionable triflers and intrigantes, among whom he finds himself—is one which no living writer is capable of presenting with that half-humorous, half-tragic truth which so impresses one in all Mr. James' work on these particular lines.

Considered apart as character sketches, the various figures that flit through this long but almost eventless society drama are, many of them, individually excellent. Mrs. Brookenham, the attractive, witty, absolutely "unmoral" woman of the world, with her modern, precocious, and too knowing, but frank, down-right, and in many ways loveable, eighteen-year-old daughter, are both drawn with singular skill; and the way in which the elderly Mr. Longdon, who has cherished a hopeless attachment for the girl's grandmother, gradually overcomes the shock of the contrast between the faded romances of the past and the rather slangy prose of the present—a recovery which becomes at last so complete that he makes Nanda his wife—is made credible and, even in a suppressed sort of way, touching. The colourless husband of Mrs. Brookenham, and the "decadent" son Harold, with his cynical vivacity of talk and his habit of helping himself to money from his mother's bureau and of borrowing casual five-pound notes from afternoon callers—these, too, slight as they are, are well realized portraits. Here is the former:—

It could not be said of Edward Brookenham, who seemed to bend for sitting down more hinges than most men, that he looked as if he knew this or anything else. He had a pale, cold face, marked and made regular, made even in a manner handsome by a hardness of line in which, oddly, there was no significance, no accent. Clean shaven, slightly bald, with unlighted grey eyes and a mouth that gives the impression of not working easily, he suggested a stippled drawing by an inferior master. Lean, moreover, and stiff, and with the air of having here and there in his person a bone or two more than his share, he had once or twice at fancy balls been thought striking in a dress copied from one of Holbein's English portraits. But whenever some such meaning as that had been put into him, it took a long time to put another—a longer time than even his extreme exposure or anybody's study of the problem had yet made possible.

Allowance made for a touch of Mr. James' characteristic obscurity in the last sentence, this is a vivid piece of description, which goes far to enable us to realize Mr. Brookenham's true inwardness. There is sympathy, too, as well as insight, in the portrayal of the humorous, tender-hearted, secretly proud, carelessly chivalrous millionaire, Mitchett, son of a great bootmaker "to all the Courts of Europe." Indeed he is one of the most effective pieces of character-drawing in the novel just as "Little Aggie," the surely impossibly ingenuous ingénue, is the least so.

But no skill of portraiture, no inventiveness in dialogue, will fully compensate a reader for the relentless longueurs of "The Awkward Age," the intolerable thinness to which the material is beaten out, and the indescribable slowness with which the author conducts us to his conclusion. It is only an apparent paradox to add that the journey is the more fatiguing because his pace and ours are set steadily in the direction of the goal, and we advance towards it without halt or divagation. A frankly discursive book offers continual reliefs; but we feel here that nothing is purely episodic, that every chapter is conscientiously designed to bring the dénouement infinitesimally nearer—and it is this feeling which makes impatience ungovernable, just as to creep along a high road, "unhasting but unresting," at the rate of a mile an hour would tire one more than any number of rambles over the adjoining fields. In the avowedly "short story" Mr. James can often be concise enough: if he would only learn to cultivate the art of compression and apply it in those longer works of his which need not be as long as they are, it would be much to the advantage of his art.

The Black Douglas. By S. R. Crockett. Illustrated by Frank Richards. 7½ x 5 in., 479 pp. London, 1899.

Smith, Elder. 6/-

Mr. Crockett is always picturesque. In his latest book that feature of his work is as pronounced as ever, but the effect is too often produced at the expense of fidelity. His great fault is over-elaboration. He is never content to place his characters naturally before the reader; he must always dress them up in the exaggeration of the stage. Did woman ever live to whom the following description could be truthfully applied?

Her skin was fair with a dazzling clearness, which even the gathering gloom only caused to shine with a more perfect brilliance, as if a halo of light dwelt permanently beneath its surface. Faint responsive roses bloomed on either cheek and, as it seemed, cast a shadow of their colour down her graceful neck. Dark eyes shone above, fresh and dewy with love and youth, and smiled out with all ancient witcheries and allurements in their depths. Her lithe, slender body—and so on. Then would a casual meeting with a stranger in friendly circumstances be likely to arouse such powerful feelings as Mr. Crockett describes here?

As Sholto passed them on his return he stood aside, poised at the salute, looking meanwhile with awe on the great and notable French soldier. Yet at the first glimpse of his unvisored face there fell upon the young man a dislike so fierce and instinctive that he grasped his bow and fumbled in his quiver for an arrow, in order to send it through the unlaced joints of the Marshal's gorget.

Such passages—and they are numerous—show a singular lack of self-restraint. They give an air of unreality to the whole book, and leave the impression of a fairy tale. Yet, apart from these faults, it is a good story of its kind. The Black Douglas, the sixth earl, is a fine character, and we are unfeignedly sorry to lose him when he is inveigled to Edinburgh by the treacherous Crichton and there done to death after a mockery of a trial. From an artistic standpoint, his disappearance at this early stage must be regarded as a blunder, for the story is only half told. The interest drops at once and does not revive again until the end is nearly reached. Sholto MacIse, we suppose, must be considered the author's hero. At any rate, when the Black Douglas goes, he takes the leading rôle. He is a marvellously lucky youth. The son of a smith, he is taken into the Earl's household, finds the daughter of a baron ready to fall in love with him, is made Captain of the Castle guard and knighted, and speaks and acts as one to the manner born—all within a few months, and while he is still in his teens. This is rapid promotion indeed, and we can only say that he seems to have justified it. After the Earl's death Sholto goes in disguise to France in pursuit of Marshal de Retze who has carried off two girls, one of them the baron's daughter. There we are introduced to devil-worship, and are invited to witness the sacrifice of children. This would be horrible enough if it were convincing, but it is so overwrought that it fails to stir the pulse. Still, Mr. Crockett should know his public by this time. There is no reason why "The Black Douglas" should not be as popular at the libraries as any of its predecessors.

Rachel. By Jane F. Findlater. 7½ x 5 in., 319 pp. London, 1899. Methuen. 6/-

Miss Jane Findlater's new novel, at once pleases and disappoints us. In Rachel she has drawn a living, breathing woman; but the immaturity which marred that arresting but painful story, "The Green Graves of Balgowrie," has not disappeared. Miss Findlater has many and good gifts, amongst them a faculty of creating out of simple materials a powerful and abiding impression. No one who has read it can forget the picture of the two desolate little girls playing in the chill house at Balgowrie; for the physical sensation of aching cold which it produces only certain scenes in the school part of "Jane Eyre" seem to us comparable with it. In "A Daughter of Strife," the picture of Anne sitting in her little attic room in a flashing glory of sunset lives in the memory, and so does Michael, in the book before us, telling fortunes in a publichouse in Edinburgh. Nevertheless, we do not realize Michael; neither, we are disposed to think, in spite of the careful work she has bestowed upon him, does Miss Findlater. The son of a gipsy woman, who eventually leaves her husband for a man of her own people, Michael is endowed with second sight and an absolute unworldliness, and possibly it is this which makes him so aggravating. He becomes the fashion in London, as leader of a strange religious sect, the Foreseers. He is lionized, rich, and famous, though fallen from grace, and using his gift of prophecy for self-aggrandizement. All this happens after he has crossed the path of Rachel Chesney, Rachel whom he loves, but leaves to marry Ellen Morrison, his landlady's daughter. Rachel is delightful. Sharp-tongued, flippant, fresh and gay she is, and such she remains even when happiness is snatched from her grasp. Miss Findlater's style is always direct and unaffected, often it reaches distinction; yet here and there signs of weakness are apparent which seem traceable to a somewhat tentative grasp on some of the vital matters of life. Moreover, she has not yet quite learnt the art of presenting her characters impersonally, allowing them to make their own impression without asides and comments. How well Miss Findlater can write at her best, a passage from near the end of the book may indicate:—

An extraordinary feeling crept over Rachel then, a feeling of expectancy, of she knew not what. She sat up and wondered what it could possibly be that she expected to see. "If I believed in ghosts, I would think it was that," she said.

Then suddenly she rose and crossed the room to the window and drew up the blind. It was a clear night; overhead there were myriads of stars. "Oh, I know, I know," Rachel cried. "He's leaving the world; at this very moment he's leaving me." She pushed up the window and knelt down beside it. The night wind blew in cold against her bare breast, but Rachel never noticed the cold. She gazed up at the dark, glittering sky, and all her childish pictures of the soul as it passes up to Paradise through the air came crowding back upon her fancy. Such a chill night! So far to go among those uncounted worlds! So alone . . . just a moment ago, in that dark room she had been in to-day, the next moment passing up, up through the clear cold air into curiously different and changing conditions. . . . It seemed to Rachel as she knelt there, looking up into the sky, that she followed Michael's soul a long, long way from earth; and then gradually she felt as if he had left her too far behind. "I have lost sight of him," she said. She crept back into bed, and lay there looking up now at the whitewashed ceiling that appeared a symbol of the limitations of poor human nature. She was on earth; Michael was before God. An awe that was very foreign to Rachel's nature overcame her at the thought; the Spiritual world pressed in upon her; the earth she dwelt upon seemed to shrivel to the size of a crown piece.

Though it is not an advance upon the author's previous books, "Rachel" is yet a clever and interesting piece of work.

A week or two ago we referred to Mrs. Hogan's "The Study of a Child," and on the general question of child-study we deprecated the over-strained attitude adopted by enthusiasts. The contrast to such a book as Mrs. Hogan's is THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF A CHILD (Blackwood, 6s.), which, after appearing serially in Blackwood's Magazine, is now issued in volume form. Mrs. Hogan shows us the mother and the teacher intently watching the development of the infant mind; careful, solicitous—over careful, over solicitous, it may be, yet ever mindful of the little mortal's physical, mental, and moral well-being. The author of the "Autobiography" tells a story which is, in the main, a record of the cruelty and mismanagement to which a little girl was subjected some thirty years ago, when the "child-study" movement had not begun. It is a story told with vivid, life-like effect; indeed, if it were not so absolutely convincing, we should hesitate to believe that some of the instances of ferocious brutality towards a helpless child were possible to any but the lowest and most degraded of human beings. This is the portrait of the unfortunate child's mother:—

She made so superb a picture that even I, who saw her through a hostile and embittered glance, stopped and asked myself if that imperial creature really were my mother. Her very beauty was of a nature to inspire terror, as if the mere dropping of her white, gold-fringed lids meant the sentence of death to the beholder. She was a curious woman, my mother. Children seemed to inspire her with a vindictive animosity, with a fury for beating and banging them, against walls, against chairs, upon the ground, in a way that it seems miraculous to me now how they were saved from the grave, and she from the dock.

And as if it were not enough that the hapless little Irish girl should have owned a parent of this nature, she was handed over at the age of eight to the tender offices of the "Ladies of Mercy," the nuns of a convent at "Lysterly," the neighbourhood of which town may be conjectured from the context:—

Do the ladies of Lysterly continue to train atrociously and mismanage children, to starve and thwart them, as they did in those far-off days? Or has the old convent vanished, and carried off its long tale of incompetence, ignorance, cruel stupidity, and futile vexation?

We sincerely hope so. There is nothing so harrowing as to read of an ill-treated child, and, despite its many bright pages, its assurance that life was not all tears, sorrow, and beating, the "Autobiography" is sufficiently heart-breaking. As a story, in spite of its vividness, it suffers from occasional irrelevant digressions, and a tendency on the part of the author to reflection and comment when simple statement would be more effective. But the sadness of such a book as this lies in the reflection that the ill-treatment of children is not the characteristic of any particular period. At the present time, side by side with the anxious parent and teacher pursuing the study of the childish mind with strenuous, even ludicrous, ardour, there are tyrants and bullies exerting physical cruelty, and a still larger class of unsympathetic, unimaginative grown-up people inflicting even worse mental torture upon the little ones in their charge. "It is so easy to make a child happy that it is a mystery to me how the art is not universal with grown-up people," says the author of the "Autobiography." Let us forgive any exaggeration in the "child-study" movement if it tends even by a hair's-breadth to advance this art.

Among the score or so of women novelists who are producing really sane and successful work, Miss Arabella Kenealy impresses one specially as a writer with brains. In her last two books, "Woman and the Shadow" and A SEMI-DETACHED MARRIAGE, just published (Hutchinson, 6s.), you feel in touch with a keen wit throughout. This impression is not derived from any display of conversational fireworks, or from any brilliant reflections on life. Indeed, certain ideas as to the modern woman entertained by Miss Kenealy sometimes betray her into propositions so nearly approaching nonsense as "This our day is a day of mannish women and emasculate men." Apart, however, from her views on the "woman question" she always writes with verve and originality; but her power is particularly shown in the perfect command she maintains over her plot and her characters, and the vivid, clear cut presentment of certain types of men and women. The scheme of her picture is clearly conceived and every touch is put in with certainty. This strikes us particularly in the love story of Celia Welltron and Sir Latimer Coyle, who agree, on the latter's instance, to form a "semi-detached marriage," that is to marry and keep up two separate establishments. Celia, the pretty heiress of a rich dynamite manufacturer, is an enchanting study; Sir Latimer, a completely selfish neurotic baronet, is the villain of the piece. Of course, their marriage turns out all wrong, and the dynamite is ready to bring about the crisis which ends, we are glad to say, in Celia marrying the right man at last. But the story of the baronet's courtship—Celia idealising the man of intellect, and Sir Latimer captivated by her fascinating femininity—is traced, so it seems to us, with extraordinary consistency and skill. There is more attention paid to plot and less to character in this novel than in "Woman and the Shadow," and it contains nothing so good in the way of social satire as Mrs. Kew-Barling. But the story is always well in hand; every character in it tells, and at every turn of it the humour or the pathos is hit with an unerring hand—the one never cheap or banal, the other never maudlin or depressing. It is in this mastery over her materials, and in the vivid conception of what she means that the critic finds to his satisfaction that among the host of women writers he has here met a novelist with brains.

Mrs. H. E. Dudeney is a good writer, and her MATERNITY OF HARRIOTT WICKEN (Heinemann, 6s.) is a notable book, though certainly not a pleasant one. The subject is heredity—the most fascinating and obscure of subjects. But Mrs. Dudeney, in laying stress on the evil and disease carried with it by the Wicken blood, does not take sufficiently into account the saner healthier influences which the Wicken marriages must have introduced. Although Harriott's mother was a poor weak creature, and as such bound to succumb to Wicken strength, she came at least of a healthy normal stock. Her sister, Mrs. Megson, is the very type of the commonplace, common-sense British matron. Harriott's husband, Dandie Darnall, is unimaginative, even-tempered, essentially normal. He and Harriott lead a happy, uneventful life up to the birth of their child, and one might reasonably expect this child to inherit something of its father's constitution and temperament, to derive something from its mother's ancestry. But it proves to be from birth an idiot of the most hopeless kind. How Harriott endeavours to conceal the child's affliction from her husband provides the plot of the story, and here Mrs. Dudeney forsakes real life to wander into novel-land, where concealments and misunderstandings are the very breath of our nostrils. The improbabilities of this part of the book are palpable; but, in spite of this, and in spite of much quite unnecessary vilification of the suburbs and of housewifely qualities, "The Maternity of Harriott Wicken" abounds in admirable passages, in little nature-pictures of cloud, of flower, of tree so freshly observed as to stick pertinaciously in the memory. Mrs. Dudeney has the power of translating a feeling, an impression into a few vivid words which faithfully transmit her experience to the mind of the reader—and this is great art.

OMAR THE TENTMAKER, by Nathan Haskell Dole (Duckworth, 6s.), has a certain interest in virtue of its subject. It is an attempt to make the great Persian poet live again for us in a work of fiction; but the author, though always fluent, and sometimes even eloquent, is not quite on a level with his task. He possesses many gifts, but not the particular gift of story-telling. There are too many incongruous modern touches in his work; and the illusion—what there is of it—is constantly dispelled by the bad habit of beginning chapters with general observations, such as "The chase has ever been regarded as the noblest sport of kings," "The monotony of female wearing apparel in the East is favourable to intrigue," and "In all religions, in every age, the priests, as a class, have claimed their privileges with 'the greatest jealousy.' Not thus do those proceed who have learnt the art of rivetting the attention of the reader. The book has, undeniably, a critical value. It does, to a certain extent, show us the relation between the poet and his poetry—the philosopher and his philosophy. In a measure it also recreates the period. But it contains too many bald historical statements for a novel, with too much chatter for a serious study, and only touches the emotions when it quotes FitzGerald. The Omarist, though he may wish it had been better done, will find it an interesting addition to the literature of the subject.

It is unusual to find in these days a novelist who allows a single book to occupy her for seven years. Yet this, according to the note prefixed to ONE POOR SCRUPLE (Longmans, 6s.) is what Mrs. Wilfrid Ward has done, and she would deserve praise, if for no other reason, for having approached so nearly to the nonum prematur in annum of Horace. We have no means of discovering whether this deliberate procedure has improved her book. It bears no signs of undue carefulness, but, on the other hand, it certainly is free from the common faults of the lady novelist. There is no slipshod diction about Mrs. Ward's style, which is a considerable point in her favour. The central motive of her story is not particularly strong, but, at any rate, the story is well told. Mrs. Ward has drawn her female characters admirably; Madge in particular is excellent, and, if her men seem rather weak by comparison, it is only because we naturally compare them with her own women, not with the men commonly found in other novels. Mark Fieldes, the rising young author, is sketched with clever satire, but he remains somewhat unconvincing. Lord Bellasis and the others are shadowy. Yet the book is above the average; it bears the stamp of originality, and several of the scenes are finely conceived. The author knows a good deal about Roman Catholicism and about London society. Her own sex she knows perfectly. The conversation of these ladies is done to admiration; every sentence uttered by Cecilia or Madge is characteristic of the speaker. The dialogue is undoubtedly the best part of the book, as the title is the worst.

FROM OMDURMAN.

The influence of Omdurman is indeed far-reaching, for a crop of military melodramas would seem to have sprung from the stricken field of last September.

RACECOURSE AND BATTLEFIELD, by Nat Gould (Routledge, 2s. 6d.), takes the hero with the Sirdar's army to Khartum, and devotes successive chapters to the rush of the Baggara, the stand round the Black Flag, the charge of the 21st Lancers, and such like events, which we read of in yesterday's newspaper. It is an unobjectionable tale, but we found the newspaper more enthralling.

UNTIL THE DAWN, by S. E. Walford (Chapman and Hall, 3s. 6d.), is brightly written. There are no glaring defects of style or characterization in it. There are one or two cleverly contrived situations, but too often the author stretches "the long arm of coincidence" until we can plainly see the fingers manipulating the puppets. The best part of the book is the conversation of Hilda Boscawen, a clever flirt who discharges with great zest and flippancy many epigrams.

THE THREE CAT'S-EYE RINGS (Simpkin, Is.), by Mr. T. Mullett Ellis, is a tale of the pursuit of the Khalifa. The fortunes of the Khalifa are in some subtle way mixed up with the fortunes of a certain Scottish family, and the story rests upon the superstition that, in order to capture him, it is necessary to bring three cat's-eye rings together. One of the rings is in the possession of a beautiful English lady; a second is owned by a brave English officer; the third is on the finger of the Khalifa's favourite wife. The beautiful lady therefore persuades three young men from an army crammer's to assist her in organizing a private expedition to the Sudan, and the novel narrates the adventures which befell that expedition. It is not a novel which is calculated to interest the man of taste; but we do not doubt that there will be a public for it.

IN CLOAK AND SWORD.

So long as novelists write as cleverly as Mr. S. Levett-Yeats in THE HEART OF DENISE, AND OTHER TALES (Longmans, 6s.), the public will delight to honour the romance of cloak and sword, Denise de Mieux is Maid of Honour to Catherine de Medici: she is married against her will to M. de Lorgnac, a soldier of fortune at the Court of Henry III. When they meet, later, under remarkable circumstances, Denise loves her lord and all is well. Catherine de Medici and Henri of Navarre both sit for their portrait. The volume also contains a story of an Italian bravo, "The Captain Maratti's Last Affair," which is told with great élan, and some other tales of Indian and Burmese life which are also good.

MERODECH (Sands, 3s. 6d.) is a promising romance by Mr. Cecil Hartley. He has taken as his hero the son of Chilperic, and in the stirring times in which that unfortunate prince lived he has found much excellent material for an exciting story. The period is well described and the characters are natural, but the end will hardly please the ordinary reader of fiction. Stories of this class are often given to young people in order to teach them history. In Mr. Hartley's book, however, there are expressions to which a careful parent will object; it is a pity that he should have unnecessarily limited his audience.

Mr. Fred Wishaw's MANY WAYS OF LOVE (Dent, 4s. 6d. n.) is a pleasantly told and simply conceived romance of the Court life of the time of Catherine the Great. The early days of the future Empress at Zerbst are sketched with skill, and the later life at the Court of the Tsarvna is well suggested, if not actually depicted. The heroine of "Many Ways of Love" tells the story of her life in the first person, and manages that difficult task with delicacy and wit. Elsa von Adlerberg is the daughter of some early friends of Catherine, and in due course she goes to the Russian Court in the service of the great lady who is known at Zerbst by her childish name of "Figchen." But before this departure Elsa has met and loved Douglas von Doppelheim, a heroic and handsome young gentleman of the period, and he loves Elsa. At the Court of Catherine they meet, and then begins the duel between the heroine and her mistress, for the grand Duchess has looked upon Douglas and loved him. Elsa refuses to surrender her lover, and there are plenty of trials of faith, but all comes right in the end. The picture of Catherine seems rather poor and colourless to those who know her period and are familiar with M. Waliszewski's intimate and vivid portrait, but it is sufficiently clear and pleasing to serve for fictional romance.

Probably not many authors have ever succeeded in spoiling the material for a good story so completely as has Mr. Henry Hudson in WILD HUMPHREY KYNASTON (Kegan Paul, 6s. n.). It is plain that the author and his friends have taken considerable trouble to ferret out particulars about the bold outlaw—the Robin Hood of Shropshire—who serves for the hero of the book. There is a lengthy appendix, compiled, as we learn, from researches in the British Museum and the Record Office, dealing with Humphrey Kynaston, his property, and the rest of the Kynaston family, with which it appears that Mr. Hudson is himself connected. Accuracy is, no doubt, good, and the author has woven a tolerable plot from the adventures of his hero, but these advantages are nullified by his absurd manner of writing. Archaic diction is permissible in a tale of the fifteenth century, but surely, even in the reign of Henry VII., conversations were not carried on with the ridiculous pomposity that characterizes Mr. Hudson's dialogue. And his own narrative is couched in equally inflated language. He employs the periphrastic method so dear to our ancestors, in which the simplest occurrences must be dignified with a wholly disproportionate wealth of words. A man tries to catch a mare, and is kicked for his pains. In Mr. Hudson's language this is translated, "The unwary constable received a thud full upon the buckle of the belt which confined the rotund proportions of his inflated abdomen." This is humour of the unconscious variety, and the reader will be repaid by many such gems in the course of the book. "Wild Humphrey Kynaston" is sumptuously bound in green and gold, and illustrated with photographs, including one of the author.

SOME NOVELS "TO PATTERN."

To our mind, Miss Mary Angela Dickens wastes her pleasant and straightforward style on so mechanical and out-worn a plot as that of her new novel, ON THE EDGE OF A PRECIPICE (Hutchinson, 6s.). That blow on the head, followed by total loss of memory which is only restored by a second mental shock; how often are we not treated to this in fiction, and what a cheap device it is, after all! Nevertheless, the story is briskly written, and, although personally we look for something better from Miss Dickens, it will serve its purpose, no doubt, in providing an afternoon's amusement.

The novels of Colonel Savage are all cast in the same mould. They are, emphatically, machine-made fiction, and the aim of their author is to make them hot and strong and sweet. To do him justice, he generally succeeds in pleasing the taste of the general public. There is a manly directness about his methods; he does not waste his time over psychology or subtle characterization. His stories are told in superlatives—pictures of love and adventure painted in the primary colours. THE WHITE LADY OF KHAMINAVATKA (Routledge, 2s. 6d.) is by no means a bad specimen of its class, full of excitement, if rather breathlessly narrated. Colonel Savage's manner is very much that of Mr. A. C. Gunter, but it has the saving merit of avoiding the perpetual use of the historic present. The scene in this instance is laid in the Ukraine, and the story deals with a feud between the houses of two Russian nobles.

THE LUCK OF THE FOUR-LEAVED SHAMROCK, by E. Balme (Routledge, 6s.), is a pleasing little tale of a familiar type. A pretty and penniless orphan comes to live in the house of a lonely man who is her relative and benefactor. His household consists of three very unattractive females, who act as an excellent foil to the young beauty. The end would be so obvious that no story at all would be needed if the author had not artfully brought in a second man, mildly villainous, to complicate the plot. He is triumphantly disposed of at last, and all ends in the only possible way.

Mr. Tom Gallon's book, THE KINGDOM OF HATE (Hutchinson, 6s.), deserves popularity. Labyrinthia is one of those delightful principalities just over the border-land of probability which are well-known to us from the writings of Stevenson and many others. But Mr. Gallon's details are all his own and often far out-run the wildest fancies of other historians of the kingdoms of strange doings. We recommend those who like a breathless story of love, adventure, beautiful princesses, wicked cousins, murders in Soho, and an ever-increasing series of dramatic surprises to read "The Kingdom of Hate." Its method, however, is somewhat cheap, and it will add to the reputation of the clever author of "Tatterley" chiefly as demonstrating his versatility.

Mr. Hamilton Aidé runs his story, JANE TREACHEL (Hurst and Blackett, 6s.), on well worn lines. His heroine, Jane herself, in fact, is the mysterious, magnetic governess we have all met and, in the person of Mademoiselle Ixe, cordially admired. Jane Treachel, however, is not a Russian spy; she has been a circus rider in Madrid instead, and it is her daring horsemanship which first attracts Sir George Grandville, the father of her little pupil. From the moment when Jane "vaulted into the saddle, touching the groom's hand with her foot, and stroking Ambassador's arched neck with her right hand as she seized the reins with her left"—the domestic tragedy begins, and it requires all the skill of Geoffrey Chaworth, a cousin who cherishes a strictly platonic affection for Lady Grandville, to avert catastrophe. For Jane, and apparently not for the first time, goes from bad to worse, and endeavours to remove Lady Grandville by poison inserted through the rind of an orange. Geoffrey frustrates her knavish tricks, and the determined Jane is brought to bay. "I throw down the cards," she says, and then, in conclusion, "Had you been free, I should have made you a good wife, Sir George," she observes, ignoring the presence of Lady Grandville with engaging frankness. Nevertheless, we like Jane. She is interesting, as, indeed, is the story as a whole.

A WEAVER OF RUNES, by W. Dutton Burrard (Long, 6s.), does his weaving in Kashmir, and does it with liveliness and spirit. But, like so many authors, Captain Burrard hardly understands the value of compression. His book would be twice as good, in our opinion, were it half as long.

Mrs. Edward Kennard and Nat Gould between them would seem to have a "corner" in modern sporting novels, and, though these writers have not the merits of a Surtees, a Whyte-Melville, or a Hawley-Smith, they seldom fail to supply their admirers with a readable story. In MORALS OF THE MIDLANDS (Hutchinson and Co., 6s.) we have the approved mixture of horsey slang and county scandals. The book teems with descriptions of runs and races, but none of these can compare with Ouida's thrilling account of the Grand National in "Under Two Flags." Mrs. Kennard gives us no very pleasant impression of the manners, the morals, or the grammar of "Midlandshire."

THE AMAZING LADY (Heinemann, 6s.) is a rather extravagant story of a neurotic young lady who comes from her town surroundings down to her brother's country vicarage for change of air and amuses herself with embroidering altar frontals and complicating the lives of two well drawn but not ideal men. The novel is said to be by a new writer, and there is certainly a quality of freshness about it which helps one to forget its equally apparent absurdities. The author, M. Bowles, is a fairly acute observer, and some of the detached scenes in the book are admirable. It is a considerable accomplishment on the part of Miss Bowles (doubtless the writer is a lady), while taking her heroine seriously, to have constructed a rather amusing and original novel out of not very promising materials.

CARR OF DIMS CAUR, by Theo. Douglas (Harpers, 6s.), has a highly sensational plot, involving a malevolent old man whose one idea is to keep alive until the clock strikes twelve upon a particular day in order to use the power which will then be his to disinherit an unfortunate widowed daughter who has displeased him. Of course, the main excitement hangs round this momentous date, but there is a weird interest introduced, which is rather effectively managed. Until the very end we are not sure whether the fascinating woman who is the real heroine is intended for flesh and blood or an apparition. The idea of a large legacy being left to a ghost is a new one in the way of "sensations," and makes a startling climax to the scene where the old man's will is read. "Carr of Dimscaur" has little literary merit, but, in its kind, it is far from being a failure.

HARRY INGLEBY, SURGEON, by Frederic J. Webb (Fisher Unwin, 6s.), is curiously unequal in its merits. Where the author deals with drawing-room topics and dialogue the book is banal to weariness, but no sooner does Mr. Webb come to medical matters than his book is quite exceptionally striking and interesting. The daily drama of a great hospital, the accidents, the struggles with death, the pathos of the "children's ward," the difficulties and humours of a young doctor's life are set out in "Harry Ingleby" with a simple directness that shows a true dramatic sense. We have seldom read anything more convincing in its way than the chapter on "Some Realities of Practice." There is no mass of technicality that will pass over the heads of readers; it is the purely human side of surgery and medicine that Mr. Webb has treated so admirably. If he will drop feminine dialogue and keep to his medical students and their experiences he should certainly succeed as a novelist.

Correspondence.

JOACHIM DU BELLAY.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—I was much interested by your article on Du Bellay last week, but was somewhat surprised to see the orthography in which that lovely poem, "The Winnower," appears there, though I recognize the great freedom that was taken with orthography before the days of Vaugelas. I would like to ask, however, why you say "Ronsard and Du Bellay had seen too much of the world." I am not aware that Du Bellay's life was in any way irregular before he published "La Défense," in 1549, and no authority I can consult has been able to enlighten me.

I have taken the liberty of translating the Latin ode by the Venetian Navagero, which served as Du Bellay's model for the sonnet. Your readers will thus see how greatly Du Bellay has enriched the theme with new images of grace and beauty:—

Ye winds that rustle through the grove
On pinions light with gentle sound,
Cymon the winnower offers to you garlands.
And sprinkles baskets of sweet scented saffron
Allay your rage, sweep away this dead chaff,
The while he winnows the ripe grain till noon.

By the way, Mr. Lang has translated "The Winnower," or rather interpreted it for English readers, for he often strays from the beaten path; as for instance when he translates:—

Ces merveillettes roses
Tout fraîchement écloses
Et ces œilletz aüssi,

as

This branch of blushing roses,
Whose fresh bud encloses
Windflowers too.

May I offer an alternative reading, which at least has the merit of verbal and metrical fidelity:—

Roses of beauty rare
Fresh-blown and clustering fair,
Carnations too.

One last query:—When Shakespeare wrote his seventeenth and fifty-fifth sonnets had he seen this of Du Bellay?

Si, sous le ciel fust quelque éternité
Les monuments que je vous ay fait dire
Non en papier, mais en marbre et porphyre
Eussent gardé leur vive antiquité.

Respectfully yours,

HY. WINTER.

Middleton College, Carlton Road, New Brighton, May 2.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—In the notice of Du Bellay which appears in your issue of April 29, the writer remarks that "his birth, which fell about the time of the battle of Pavia, was said to be intended by Providence as a compensation to France for that disaster." But surely Du Bellay never occupied such a position in the world's eye as to warrant such a suggestion? It was beyond all doubt Ronsard to whom this unique compliment was paid: Ronsard, "the Prince"—the admired of all Europe, from Mary in her prison to Elizabeth on her throne, in whose immortality the sceptic Montaigne believed, and for whose patronage Tasso humbly sought.

Yours faithfully,

Dublin, April 30, 1899.

OMAR.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—Many of your readers will be reading just now FitzGerald's translation of Omar Khayyam. The following couplet, which was shown to me some years ago, when or how I have forgotten, may therefore prove of interest. It will be noticed that the letters which compose the word Omar are here used in seven different combinations.

Sit mora sub ramo, canit Omar, fontis ad oram;
Cui sit amor quantum dat tibi Roma, Maro!

Yours faithfully, CECIL HEADLAM.

Authors and Publishers.

A verse translation of Ibsen's "Love's Comedy" is being prepared by Professor Herford, who translated "Brand" in the original metres. It will appear in the series of Foreign Dramatic Classics, edited by Mr. R. B. Johnson. The current issue of the Dublin Daily Express has an article by Professor Herford on "The Scandinavian Theatre."

The book on Turner's life and art, which Mr. Walter Armstrong, director of the National Gallery of Ireland, is preparing, comes at an apt moment. This volume, with the illustrated work on Turner to be published by Mr. George Allen, will help visitors to the Guildhall Gallery to arrive at a mature judgment of Turner's powers. Some of the enthusiasms, perhaps, of thirty years ago will be found to lack substantiation. Mr. Armstrong's book is to contain some seventy reproductions of pictures generally recognized as the finest of his work. Messrs. Agnew are the publishers, and the work will be issued at twelve guineas and at six guineas.

Mr. Whistler's new book, "The Baronet and the Butterfly: A Valentine with a Verdict," will be published in Paris before the end of this month, by Monsieur L.-Henry May (9 and 11, Rue Saint-Benoit, Paris). There will be two editions, the popular one, price six francs net, and the édition de luxe, printed on Van Gelder paper, limited to 250 copies, and signed by Mr. Whistler, price 25 francs. It will in appearance be uniform with Mr. Whistler's previous book, "The Gentle Art of Making Enemies."

The "International Geography," which Dr. H. R. Mill is editing for Messrs. Newnes, promises to be an exhaustive work. The first part will include about a dozen articles on the Principles of Geography, containing one on the Oceans by Sir John Murray and Dr. Mill, and another on Political and Applied Geography by Dr. J. Scott Keltie. The other parts will deal exhaustively with every quarter of the globe in articles by well-known travellers, such as Sir H. H. Johnston and Professor F. Nansen.

M. de Lanessan, the former Governor of Indo-China, has written a book on the Algerian question, which M. Alcan is to publish within two or three weeks. With M. Leroy Beaulieu, M. de Lanessan is the most eminent French authority on colonial matters, and the solution which the latter has given in his book to the antisemitic problem is eagerly awaited. This volume will appear in the famous "Library of Contemporary History," in which is shortly to appear the "Savoie-Sardaigne et Mantone" portion of the "Recueil des Instructions données aux Ambassadeurs de France depuis le traité de Westphalie jusqu'à la Révolution Française," and in which came out the other day the most useful summary we have of the history of the Wars of the Revolution and the Empire: "Les Campagnes des Armées Françaises" (1792-1815), by M. Vallaux, a normalien now professor in a Brest academy. This book, by the way, deserves to be recommended to those who, bewildered by the mass of new documents unearthed during the last fifteen years, and conscious that many of the old views are erroneous, seek for a compact record of the period in which all this fresh matter has been utilized and critically compared.

Mr. James Henry Yoxall, M.P. for Nottingham Boro' West, the author of "The Lonely Pyramid," "Secondary Education," and other books, contemplates a new volume of extracts from his addresses, essays, &c., on education and cognate subjects; and is also issuing a new and revised edition of "The Pupil Teacher's Geography." Mr. Yoxall's début as a writer of books was made at seventeen years of age in a little volume called "Facts and Fancies about Ferns," published anonymously. As a student of the Westminster Training College he published two slim books of verse which achieved the distinction of entailing no pecuniary loss on their author. Mr. Yoxall, by the way, claims to have been among the first to recognize a writer of merit in the author of "Ships that Pass in the Night," whose latest novel, "The Fowler," we reviewed last week. Eight years ago, when Miss Harraden's name was quite unknown, he selected for reproduction in a school book, out of a hundred story books, of similar size and price, published by Messrs. Blackie, her delightful little tale, "Things will Take a Turn."

As a counterblast to the highly specialized series so much in fashion, the Bradley-Garretson Publishing Company of Toronto are about to pack the whole of the nineteenth century into twenty-five volumes, treating of political, literary, social, religious, and scientific progress. That no corner of knowledge be overlooked, "other cognate subjects" will be included. Dr. Aubrey, author of "The Rise and Growth of the English Nation," will deal with the economic progress of the century. The music of the "Recessional" would not seem to be ringing in the ears of the Bradley-Garretson Publishing Company.

Notwithstanding the remonstrances of the municipal councillors of Tours to the projected commemoration of the Balzac centenary on May 16th, the actors of the Théâtre Français will go officially to Tours for the centenary in order to play Mercadet. In Paris a one-act play in verse entitled Orgon, found among Balzac's papers after his death, will be produced at the Français. According to the French law, the copyright in the whole of Balzac's works expires on August 16th, 1900, and French publishers are already preparing to meet the probable demand for cheap editions. Several expensive éditions de luxe are also projected.

Apart from Sir Rudolf Slatin Pasha's volume, no book dealing with the affairs of the Sudan can be so full of knowledge and interest as that of Herr Charles Neufeld, which is about to be published by Messrs. Chapman and Hall, under the title of "A Prisoner of the Khaleefa."

Mr. Menzies Fergusson will publish shortly, through Mr. Gardiner, of Paisley, a book on Alexander Hume, an early Scottish poet, and some of his contemporaries. Hume's "Hymns and Sacred Songs" were first issued three centuries ago, and were reprinted by the Bannatyne Club in 1832. One of the most notable of his friends was the first Earl of Stirling, an intimate of Drummond of Hawthornden, and the author of a metrical version of the Psalms which has sometimes been attributed to James VI. of Scotland and I. of England. Mr. Fergusson's forthcoming book will contain an account of the life and work of the Earl.

There are, we believe, some fifty musical journals, if we may include the Nonconformist Musical Journal in the same list as such special publications as the Brass Band Journal. Nothing daunted, however, the Unicorn Press are about to publish a new shilling quarterly, to be entitled the Chord. It is designed for the general reader who "loves music for its own sake," and not for its technicalities; who, in fact, accepts all "chords" as beyond criticism. In the first number M. A. Bruneau, the French composer and critic, will write on the prospects of the younger composers in France, and Mr. J. F. Runciman will deal with "The Orchestra and its Degeneration." Two practical architects will give a design for a music room.

"The Little Book of Death and Rest Eternal," a book Messrs. Rivingtons are to publish, embodies an interesting, if somewhat morbid, conception. It contains the old English Office of the Dead, the celebrated treatise of Henry Montagu, Earl of Manchester, on Death and Immortality, first printed in 1631, and the Contakion, or Anthem, from the Russian Office for the Departed, with its proper musical setting. The volume has been designed to serve as a memorial book for departed friends and contains a Kalendar with blank pages for entering obits. The Office of the Dead is printed in red and black, and a copy of an old engraving is inserted as a frontispiece.

Mr. F. M. Ramsay writes to us from Preston House, Faversham, to point out that it should have been Rudolf, not Paul, Lindau who was mentioned in a note in our issue of April 15 as a German writer who gives singular true pictures of English society. The full title of the book, of which a new edition has just been published in Berlin, is "Fonar und Mayfair"; another book by the same author, "Robert Ashton," gives an excellent picture of English life.

For the subject of an address at a meeting of the National Home-Reading Union, to be held at Drapers' Hall on May 9th, Mr. James Bryce could hardly have chosen one more vital to the interests of the Society—viz., "What Reading Means." The Vice-Chancellor of Cambridge University, Sir Owen Roberts, and others will assist. Tickets of admission may be obtained from the Secretary, N. H. R. U., Surrey House, Victoria Embankment, W.C.

Under the direction of the Imperial Academy of Sciences a series of critical editions of Russian classical authors is being prepared, the early volumes of which are announced for publication this year. The first will be the works of Pushkin in two volumes; those of Lomonossow and Lermontow are to follow.

The two autograph responses of Moses Maimonides, recently acquired by the British Museum, will be published in an early number of the Jewish Quarterly Review. In the same article will be given the original Arabic text of other responses by the same authority. Maimonides has for the last seven hundred years been at once the Luther and the Aristotle of his co-religionists.

Mr. H. Croft Hillier has in the press a comprehensive work of a philosophical nature, to be issued in four volumes, with the title "Heresies: or, Agnostic Theism, Ethics, Sociology, and Metaphysics." He propounds scientific proof of the existence of God, and of the falsity of existing theological creeds and moral conventions. Mr. Grant Richards is to be the publisher, and the first volume will be ready early this month.

Dr. Otto Pniower has in preparation a comprehensive work on Goethe's "Faust" dealing with the origin of the Faust legend and the growth of Goethe's work, the writing of which, as is well known, extended over a period of fifty years. In chronological order a collection will be given of every scrap of correspondence and conversation obtainable on the subject, and Goethe's own interpretation of certain obscure passages. It will be the most ambitious commentary ever attempted on the great German masterpiece. It is to be published by Wiedmann, Berlin. In commemoration of its associations with Goethe's youth the town of Strasbourg has decided to erect a statue of the "Young Goethe" there, which will be unveiled this year on the anniversary of the poet's birthday.

The interest in local antiquities is fast developing. The new county magazines have given it much encouragement, and a good many books have been published recently on British archæology in various aspects. We have noticed books on the round towers of Ireland and on the history of the High Crosses. We are now promised a work on Scottish Market Crosses, by Mr. John W. Small, F.S.A., the author of "Scottish Woodwork of the Sixteenth and Seventeenth Centuries." It will be the first published on the subject, and will consist of about 100 drawings, accompanied by an account of all the known old market crosses in Scotland. The publisher is Mr. Æneas Mackay, who will issue the volume to subscribers at the price of 40s.

Messrs. W. and J. Goss, of High-street, Kettering, are issuing to subscribers a transcription of "The Compotus of Kettering for the Year 1292," prepared by Mr. C. Wise, who has been examining the roll of the different manors owned at this period by the Abbey of Burgh. The list is an interesting example of the monkish caligraphy, and was recently discovered at Rockingham Castle. Mr. Wise will also translate and copiously annotate the document, throwing light upon the manorial practices to which reference is made in the Compotus.

Messrs. Houlston announce a book on "The Vale of Anworth," in Scotland, by Mr. D. B. Anderson, also containing papers on a number of eminent men, including Sir Charles Hallé, Professor Blackie, Professor Veitch, Rev. Dr. Boyd, of St. Andrews ("A. K. H. B."), &c.

Mr. A. Stapleton writes to us from 30, Notintone-place, Sneinton, Nottingham, to say that he is investigating the whole subject—bibliographical, antiquarian, historical, &c.—of the "Merry Tales of the Wise Men of Gotham" as a student of Nottinghamshire history. He says:—

I invite the co-operation of all who may be interested, and shall be pleased to acknowledge any notes bearing on the subject. I shall be glad to have my attention drawn to any references to the "Tales" as a book, or to the "fools of Gotham" as a tradition, in old literature (beyond the references already printed in modern or well-known books); and I shall specially welcome notes (with dates, if possible) of editions of the "Tales" printed in London, the provinces, Scotland, or Ireland, and hope to be brought into correspondence with owners of such impressions.

One more edition of the Sonnets of Shakespeare is announced by Mr. John Lane. It will be illustrated by Mr. Henry Osipov, who has an attractive decorative method.

Mr. J. M. Lely has nearly finished a popular handbook to Church Law, which will be published by Mr. Horace Cox.

Mrs. Arthur Bell has brought up to date her volume, "Heroes of American Discovery," for a third edition. The two companion volumes, "Heroes of North African Discovery," and "Heroes of South African Discovery," are also to be published shortly, in revised fifth editions, by Messrs. Walter Scott.

An enlarged number of the Gospel Magazine will be published in memory of its erstwhile editor, A. M. Toplady, the author of "Rock of Ages." A large amount of original matter connected with Toplady's life and writings will appear.

Naming novels has become as difficult as naming race-horses. Two years ago we reviewed Miss M. C. Balfour's "The Fall of the Sparrow." A new novel already announced as "The Fall of a Sparrow," by Mrs. H. H. Penrose, has had to change its title to "As Sparrows Fall."

Mr. Grant Allen will publish on May 9, through Mr. Grant Richards, his new romantic story, "Miss Cayley's Adventures." The volume will be profusely illustrated by Mr. Gordon Browne.

Mr. Nat Gould has arranged with his publishers to write four novels for the year 1900, and has three more to deliver for the current year. Messrs. George Routledge have, in fact, agreed with him for seven novels in advance.

Mr. Silas K. Hocking's new novel, "The Day of Reckoning," will be published immediately by Messrs. Warner.

Baron Corso, the author of "Stories Toto Told Me," will issue in the autumn, through Mr. John Lane, another series of these tales. He is at present engaged on a Life of Pope Pius II. and a third series of the Toto stories.

"The Last Emeralds of Zarinthia" is the title of a novel by Mr. H. Pottinger Stephens—better known, perhaps, under his new name, "Pot"—which Messrs. Sands will publish in the autumn.

Mr. Frankfort Moore's novel, "The Millionaires," is being translated into German by Fräulein Schotte.

Mr. Carlton Dawe's "Rose and Chrysanthemum"—a series of Japanese stories now appearing in the English Illustrated Magazine—will be published in September by Messrs. Sands.

The first novel published for some time past by Mr. John Murray will be "Lesser Destinies," written by Mr. Samuel Gordon. It deals with many aspects of life in the East-end.

Messrs. Wells Gardner are publishing a new novel by Miss Ethel F. Heddle, who has, we believe, the distinction of being the only writer of fiction whose books the late "A. K. H. B." ever read.

"Florizel's Folly" is to be the title of Mr. John Ashton's new book on a well known royal romance of George IV.'s reign.

Messrs. Methuen are publishing "Tales of Northumbria," by Mr. Howard Pease, the author of several well-known stories of the North, written with great vigour of style and an intimate knowledge of local life.

The Editor of the Contemporary Review wishes us to state that the article, "Liberal Catholicism," by "Romanus," which appeared in the December number of the Contemporary, 1897, was neither written nor inspired by an American Bishop.

Mr. Archibald Colquhoun has slightly deviated from the route which we announced that he was taking on his way home from China. He now proposes to return, not through Burma, but by way of the French Colonies, to which a chapter of his book will be given.

In consequence of Mr. Poultney Bigelow's continued ill-health, he has had to give up his promised lecture before the Royal United Service Institution on the "Yankee Soldier." Mr. Bigelow has been ordered to Vichy after six months of fruitless struggle against the complaint which attacked him while in the Philippines.

Mr. F. E. Robinson of 20, Great Russell-street, W.C., begs to announce that he has taken Mr. H. G. Boulton into partnership. The style of the publishing business will now be known as F. E. Robinson and Co.

We understand that M. V. Emile-Michelet is to be the new literary and artistic editor of the well-known French monthly, l'Humanité Nouvelle. M. Hamon is the scientific editor.

Lord Yarborough has designed the cover for a new book by Mr. Cosmo Hamilton, the author of "The Glamour of the Impossible."

THE "SOUL-SECRETS" OF THE EMINENT.

In a recent review of the Letters of Robert Browning and Elizabeth Barrett we remarked that their editor's decision in favour of publishing them, though we thought it a sound one, could "hardly fail to divide opinion." And so it has proved, though, amusingly enough, the first protest against their publication comes from a quite unconsidered quarter and has been made in an interest which we confess to having left out of account. The division of opinion which we foresaw had reference to the question whether Mr. R. B. Browning should or should not have withheld this correspondence from the public, as consisting largely of very intimate and often impassioned love-letters exchanged between his parents; it certainly never occurred to us that he might have been expected to suppress it out of tenderness for the memory of his maternal grandfather. The indignant remonstrance of Mr. Moulton Barrett, to which we devoted a few words of comment in our last issue, presents to us an entirely new aspect of the question, and one on which the remonstrant has a perfect right to insist. He is quite entitled to object, from his own point of view, to the publication of matter, however deeply interesting to the world of letters, which gives what he maintains to be an unjustly injurious impression of his father's character. At the same time, and without laying any stress upon the literary interest of the correspondence, we find it impossible to share Mr. Barrett's view of the seriousness of the affair. We can readily give credit to the son's contention that his father was not at all wanting in affection for his children, and we can quite believe that his daughter held him in somewhat exaggerated awe. But in many cases probably this is, and always has been, true of the so-called "domestic tyrant," the martinet father of real life who has stood for his portrait to the comic dramatist from Terence down to Sheridan. He justly suffers, however, for the impression which his behaviour produces on those around him; and, anyhow, a protest from a descendant of Sir Anthony Absolute against the cruel injustice of his ancestor's portrait in The Rivals is something which the world will never be able to read without a smile.

The more serious question suggested by this correspondence has not however been long in presenting itself. It is discussed with perfect impartiality and excellent judgment by Mr. Leslie Stephen in the current number of the National Review, and though we observe with satisfaction that he takes our own view as to the soundness of Mr. Browning's exercise of the editorial discretion, it is clear that he has arrived at this conclusion by a route beset with disturbing doubts. This, indeed, is significantly shown in his accurate and felicitous description of the feeling uppermost in all minds with any pretensions to delicacy, when confronted with some of the more intimate revelations of sentiment and emotion on the part of the two correspondents. "I felt," he writes, "unpleasantly like an eavesdropper while reading these letters, and I cannot at once admit that the feeling was simply erroneous or due to the illusion that writers of letters so full of life must still be living." And in a later passage in his paper he puts the point still more plainly in the observation that this sense of impropriety is "due to the impression that one is looking over the shoulders of the writers at a moment when they would certainly have shown the door to an intruder." Truthful, however, as is this account of the effect produced on us by our admission to these peculiarly sacred secrets of two ardent and sensitive natures, we fear that the process by which Mr. Stephen suggests the possibility of its mitigation would have been impracticable. "Admitting fully," he says, "that the story ought to be told, that we had a right to be aware of this ennobling element in the lives of two such persons, was it really necessary that the whole correspondence should be published, or the whole destroyed?"

I cannot help fancying that some one might have been found—though, no doubt, the task would have required very exceptional tact and insight—who could have given the truth without publishing the correspondence in mass”; though “undoubtedly,” he adds, “it would have been necessary to use the words of the writers and to publish some of the letters completely.” Unfortunately, however, as our reviewer pointed out in discussing this very alternative, “courtship and criticism are so closely interwoven” in those letters which it would have been desirable not to publish “completely”; the exchange of purely intellectual ideas is so complicated with the love-duet; the “feast of reason” alternates so rapidly and continually with the “flow of soul” that the suggested selective process would inevitably leave the correspondence in a somewhat disjointed and fragmentary condition.

In short, it seems to us that Mr. R. B. Browning's choice lay, as he held it to lie, between the destruction of these profoundly interesting and valuable documents, and their publication substantially entire. But although, in adopting the latter alternative he had the fullest paternal sanction, the feeling of embarrassment, to which Mr. Stephen bears witness, and of which every one must have been conscious in reading many passages of the volume, is sufficient, we think, to show that the paternal sanction in such a case is not decisive in itself of the question of propriety. Its ethics are not so simple as that. We all feel that there may be some invitations to us to invade the sphere of privacy, which, though offered to us in perfect good faith by the “parties concerned”—to use a somewhat question-begging expression—it might not be well for us or to the higher interests of civilized and cultivated life to accept. We do not say—indeed we have already affirmed the contrary of the proposition—that the case of the Browning Letters falls within that category. Without unreservedly accepting Mrs. Browning's much too sweeping dictum that “the world has a right to the ‘soul secrets’ of eminent people,” we do not hesitate to repeat our acknowledgment that there are cases in which it is expedient to assume and to give effect to the “right” thus claimed; and this, simply because, on an impartial balance of considerations for and against, it may sometimes be reasonable to conclude that the harmful effect of admitting the public to these otherwise too sacred confidences will be more than counterbalanced by the intellectual and spiritual profit which the reader may derive from them. In other words the question of divulging or respecting what Mrs. Browning calls the “soul secrets” of eminent people depends rather upon the value of the secrets than upon the eminence of the people. Where, however, this value is adequate, it is no doubt true, in a sense, that in proportion to their eminence—so far at least as this implies a certain inevitable conspicuity of position and publicity of action—those who have most notably interested or enlightened mankind during their lives must expect that their “soul-secrets” will be more curiously and eagerly sought after among their literary remains.

Browning, as we know, specifically accepted this conclusion, subject to his son's discretion, as regards these letters; and his wife's concurrence in it has been constructively signified in the general dictum which we have quoted. Nevertheless, we cannot but share Mr. Stephen's doubt whether the publication of the letters, in spite of their own undeniable merits, will not set a precedent eminently likely to be abused. Its justification, of course, is that the case is exceptional, and that, as we have just said in other words, the total result is so impressive and edifying that the ordinary rule may be disregarded. But unfortunately, as Mr. Stephen goes on to remark, there is no way of limiting the application of precedents. “Everybody is apt to be exceptional in his own eyes, and in the eyes of his nearest relatives, and one fears that the habit of turning out the most private receptacles will be encouraged without reason by the success of this particular performance.” It is impossible to pronounce such a fear altogether unfounded. The hunger for other people's “soul secrets” is not only quite sufficiently keen already, but it belongs essentially to that form of appetite which grows by what it feeds on. There will always be a curious and inquisitive public for the love-letters and other such confidential correspondence of any two people whose names are tolerably familiar to the world. The word “eminent,” in such a connexion, is pretty sure to receive a handsomely liberal interpretation; and the “literary” journalism which has puffed men and women writers during their lifetime into a position far above their real claims is likely, if only for the sake of making yet more “copy” out of them, to maintain the fiction of their fame even after their death. Without, therefore, wishing to stop the supply of “soul-secrets” to the literary market altogether, we are strongly of opinion that its encouragement would be most undesirable.

The McGill University of Montreal has done a popular thing in being the first University to recognize Mr. Rudyard Kipling by offering him an honorary degree. There was a time when Mr. Kipling imperilled his popularity in Canada by writing satirical verses about the Canadian climate—a subject on which Canadians are far more sensitive than Anglo-Indians. Both he and they, however, were too good Imperialists to let such trifles stand in the way of friendship—the more so, seeing that what Mr. Kipling said about the Canadian snows was a mere nothing compared to his frequent indictments of the “prickly heat” of Bengal; and we may take it that the compliment thus bestowed upon him by a colonial University, whose Principal is a Scotchman and an Oxonian, is intended as a demonstration of Imperial sentiment no less than as an honour to a distinguished man of letters.

In the Author, Sir Walter Besant writes of the Royal Literary Fund and the Civil Pension Grant, and refers to a criticism passed in Literature on certain previous remarks of his on these subjects. “The Grant and the Fund,” Sir Walter says, “have nothing to do with each other. The former gives pensions: the latter gives temporary relief. Without any reference to the former, it is proved that the latter could only find, last year, twenty-two distressed men or women of letters.” The facts are not in dispute; but our contention is that, instead of discouraging subscriptions to the Literary Fund, the better way would be to enlarge its scope. Its administrators should not have to refuse relief on the ground that it is to be permanent. We agree with Sir Walter Besant that the Civil Pension Grant ought to be confined to persons distinguished in literature, science, and art, and to their widows and daughters; but we fail to see that the Literary Fund could not be usefully employed in contributing to the same end, or that it is, at present, any too large for such a purpose.

It is reassuring to hear that "the school teachers of Louisville, Kentucky, and Jeffersonville and New Albany, Indiana," have arisen in their might for the defence of the purity of our common language. They have met at New Albany, and organized an "Anti-Slang League," the object of which is to promote the speaking of the English tongue, pure and undefiled, "an end to which the teachers pledge themselves to use their best efforts." They will, of course, have our best wishes; but we would submit to them that the invasion of "slang," strictly so called, is not the only, or perhaps the gravest, danger with which the English language is threatened in these breathless days. Slang words and phrases may exist, and for ages have existed, colloquially, in most modern languages side by side with their correct literary forms, but rigorously excluded from their authoritative dictionaries. Occasionally, but only occasionally, they have succeeded in overleaping the barrier and finding their way within the sacred pale; but in almost all such cases they have owed their admission to their recognized fulfilment of some special need of expression, and have thus enlarged the power of the language without any very serious diminution of its purity and elegance.

It is not the introduction of new and unclassical words and phrases which is so much to be dreaded as the misuse or abuse of old ones. Ignorance, carelessness, and above all haste—the imperative desire for brevity which, by the way, is nowhere so operative as among the countrymen of these heroic school teachers—combine to assist this degenerative movement; and its results find their way into literary use and ultimately into the dictionary with much more readiness, and after a much shorter period of probation, than actual slang. In the very same issue of the newspaper from which we have gathered the above piece of news, an American gentleman speaks of himself as having "deeded" a certain property to his wife. No doubt it is a handier expression for a young nation in a hurry than "assigned by deed"; and we ourselves have adopted the term "to will" for "to devise by will," though we are not particularly proud of it. But where is the process of summarily turning substantives into verbs, whenever it saves an infinitesimal fraction of time, to end?

Mr. Bryce's text at the annual meeting of the National Home Reading Union on Tuesday was the intellectual "reaction" produced by judicious reading. He confessed that he never rose from the study of a magazine without asking himself "Why did I do it?" But he boldly upheld fiction, and was a little sarcastic on the librarians who triumphantly report that the novels they issue have fallen below eighty per cent. of the whole. He did not even think it necessary to warn or to except. But discreet selection is of course the work of the Union itself. Few institutions do more useful work, and we are glad to see that its membership is increasing, and that it is particularly attracting more and more attention among schoolmasters.

Letters of Thomas Carlyle to his Youngest Sister. Edited, with an Introductory Essay, by Charles Townsend Copland. 8½ x 6 in., viii. + 276 pp. London, 1899.

Chapman & Hall. 6/-

Not every fresh addition to the voluminous mass of Carlyle literature is, to our mind, as welcome as this volume of comparatively uninteresting letters from Carlyle to his youngest sister Janet, who emigrated to Canada with her husband Mr. Robert Hanning in 1851, and died at Toronto about a year-and-a-half ago. One welcomes them, uninteresting though they are on the whole, as revealing a thoroughly lovable side of a character which, say what else we will of it, it is easier to regard with almost any other feeling than love. This aspect of it has, of course, been shown before in the stricken widower's remorseful tributes to his lost wife, and in other like passages of reminiscence; but the compassion, genuine and profound, no doubt, in many minds, which utterances like these unquestionably stir, is not in very close relationship to the sentiment to which it is proverbially akin. Pity and love in this case are hardly nearer to each other than a couple of "Scotch cousins." Our sympathies, if not so powerfully appealed to for the moment, would, we feel, be more permanently won by any evidences of humanity, unselfishness, and natural affection which might be gathered from Carlyle's written or spoken words during those long years when his public or semi-public utterances were almost invariably gloomy and not infrequently ill-natured, while his domestic life was largely spent in accumulating material for subsequent self-reproach. And from these letters, happily, a sufficient amount of such evidences is to be gathered. His protecting and almost paternal love for Janet Carlyle, some fifteen years his junior, and his pious and reverential affection for his mother, to whom several of the letters in this volume are addressed, set the writer before us in a new and unwontedly pleasing light; and their freedom from the egotism, the acridity, and the eternal grumbling which begin by amusing and too often end by wearying us in his ordinary correspondence excuses all their triviality of detail.

The Introductory Essay by Mr. C. T. Copland, Lecturer on English Literature at Harvard University, with which the collection is prefaced, is apt to annoy the reader occasionally by a certain excess of self-consciousness on the part of the writer, who, for instance, provokes serious remonstrance when he begins a new paragraph by exclaiming, in his own person, "Hence loathed Melancholy, and a truce to sable!" In its appreciation of Carlyle's quality as a letter-writer it is sound and suggestive. It is somewhat wanting, however, in relevance to these particular specimens of his correspondence—as, indeed, is indicated by the fact that most of Mr. Copland's criticisms require to be illustrated by quotations from letters not contained in this volume. It would have been more to the point if he had used these extracts, eloquent, passionate, bitter, full of outcries against life and literature, and the tendency of politics, and the "nature of things" itself, with the tender homely humdrum of Carlyle's contemporary letters to his mother and his sister. Indeed, in one admirable page of his Introduction, Mr. Copland proves that he was aware of that "more excellent way" in which, on the whole, we cannot altogether admit that he has walked. "So far and so much," he writes, "for Carlyle's general aspect as a letter-writer, I have tried to show," though he has not adequately developed his demonstration, "that in addressing himself to a very few friends, and especially to his own family, he displays a different set of qualities."

The difference between his vehemence toward the world at large, and his gentleness toward his mother, sometimes seems as marked as that between the two visions of the prophet Jeremiah: the one a seething caldron, the face of it from the north; the other a rod of an almond tree. The world, in truth, for this peasant of genius, was, to the considerable extent to which he remained a peasant, an assemblage of persons and things to be approached with many reserves and a deal of more or less violent disapproval. Annandale, contrariwise, was an honest strength-giving corner of the world which did for him through life the office of the earth to Antæus. He went back to it so often that he never lost his native accent, and, in certain respects the point of view to which he was born.

This disposition to regard his native valley as the omphalos of the universe, and to make it the measure of all things, comes out amusingly enough in a letter to Janet Hanning, a couple of years or so after her settlement in Canada. She had been suffering from "ague-fever," and her brother impresses upon her the necessity of fixing her abode in "an airy situation quite free from the neighbourhood of damp ground, especially of stagnant water, and with a free exposure to the wind. That undoubtedly is of great importance." And he continues:—

You are accustomed from sound old Annandale to take no thought at all about such things, but you may depend upon it they are necessary and indispensable considerations in your new country. I beg you very much to keep them earnestly in view with reference to the house you live in. Plenty of dry wind, all marshes, &c., at a distance, and there is no more danger of ague in Canada than in Scotland; that you shove up your windows in season and keep your house as clean as a new pin—these are advices I need not give, for you follow these of course, of nature or inveterate habit, being from of old one of the neatest little bodies to be found in five Parishes.

To see the Sage, however, at his most comically homeliest one should read his letter of request to his sister for a pair of "wristikins" (muffatees, as they used to be, and perhaps still are, called in England), which "it has struck me in these cold days I might apply to you" to make. The best pair that he has is now a very old one, knitted for him by one of his sisters at Hoddam Hill many years ago, but "they have beautiful stripes of red yet as fresh as ever." In fact, the author of "Cromwell," at that time in mid-wrestle with the Protector's Letters and Speeches, sometimes wears these beautifully red-striped wristikins in preference to the pair Mrs. Carlyle had bought for him out of the Chelsea shops. Thus, being already provided, he need not in the least hurry his sister as to the matter. She can wait till she has leisure, till she can get right her colours, &c. But—and here is the important point, so important that we may without apology exchange abstract for extract:—

The great defect of all my present wristikins is that they are too slight, too thin, and do not fill up the cuff of the coat, which is rather wide with me. They should be at least double the common thickness of those in the shops. If you had fine boozey yarn and took it two ply, it will make a pretty article.

Then as to colour: this he thinks should be "deep for our reeky atmosphere here"; but though red is beautiful and holds out well, the philosopher thinks that "perhaps the basis should be some sort of brown." But, he concludes magnanimously:—

Please your own eye. There never was a good horse of an ill colour. As to breadth, I think they should be at least three inches.

How delighted Carlyle himself would have been to come across anything of this kind among the papers of one of his heroes—say, in a letter from John Knox to Margery Bowes! How he would have lingered over the details, hoping that a good and sufficient pair of wristikins did, after whatever anxious deliberations upon stuff and colour, finally get themselves made; and moralising over the fact that the wrists they warmed are dust, and dust the nimble fingers of her who knitted them, the click of her needles long fallen silent. No one knew better than Carlyle that it is trifles of this kind that make vital and human for us the historic figures of the past. To the popular impression of himself vitality, it is true, has never been wanting; but for many of us the Carlyle portrayed by himself and his biographers has lacked a certain element of humanity which these letters will help to supply.

The Autobiography and Letters of Mrs. M. O. W. Oliphant. Arranged and Edited by Mrs. Harry Coghill. 9 x 6 in., xvi. + 451 pp. Edinburgh, 1899. Blackwood. 21/-

Few modern writers have left behind them a more pathetic self-revelation than is to be found in the autobiographical fragments which Mrs. Coghill has piously woven together and pieced out with letters into a pretty full record of Mrs. Oliphant's life. These fragments were written under varying conditions and from diverse impulses: partly to interest the writer's sons, partly to add to the provision for them which she toiled so industriously but vainly to effect, partly to relieve the pressure of intolerable anguish by the "lyrical cry" which brings so much relief. It is not surprising that Mrs. Oliphant, who always had a gift of moving the reader's sympathy, should do so in the sad pages which narrate the downfall of her maternal ambitions, and which were written beside the death bed of her last surviving child. "And now here I am all alone. I cannot write any more." So ends the autobiography of the woman who died, as the old Roman curse had it, ultima suorum. It is no wonder that the record of a life smitten so hard by Fate as was that of Mrs. Oliphant contains many elements of pathos. Those who know the details of her domestic afflictions will be glad to learn, on her own authority, that life, in spite of all, had its bright side for her. The words in which she asserts this are worth quoting:—

I have lived a laborious life, incessant work, incessant anxiety—and yet so strange, so capricious is this human being, that I would not say I have lived an unhappy life. . . . Sometimes I am miserable—always there is in me the sense that I may have active cause to be so at any moment—always the gnawing pangs of anxiety, and deep, deep dissatisfaction beyond words, and the sense of helplessness, which of itself is despair. And yet there are times when my heart jumps up in the old unreasonable way, and I am—yes, happy—though the word seems so inappropriate—without any cause for it, with so many causes the other way. I wonder whether this is want of feeling, or mere temperament and elasticity, or if it is a special compensation—

"Werena my heart licht I wad dee"—

Grizel Hume must have had the same.

On the other hand, this book tells us for the first time that Mrs. Oliphant's life contained inward elements of tragedy which one would never have thought of associating with her limited but sane and sober talent. The real tragedy of her life was not in the blows which took away from her one source of joy after another; it lay in that inability to see things as they are and weigh them in a just balance which is so common a cause of discontent. The unstudied outpouring of many of these pages makes that perfectly clear. All her life Mrs. Oliphant suffered from a variety of the ailment of the femme incomprise. She seems to have believed that, if circumstances had favoured her, she might have out-shone George Eliot and Charlotte

Brontë; at least this supposition comes too often to her pen not to have been very close to her heart. Her notion was that the necessity to "boil the daily pot," which her husband's premature death and other family circumstances forced upon her, prevented her from attaining her proper position in literature. "It is a little hard sometimes," she wrote, "not to feel with Browning's Andrea, that the men who have no wives, who have given themselves up to their art, have had an almost unfair advantage over us who have been given perhaps more than one Lucrezia to take care of." She wondered if she would have done better if she had been "kept in a mental greenhouse," like George Eliot. To this question her autobiography supplies no uncertain answer. Much more than literary ability goes to the writing of a great book. A particular kind of energy, for one thing, is necessary; it is rooted in the power to see things as they are and act on the experience so gained. It may seem odd to deny any kind of energy to Mrs. Oliphant, with her hundred and twenty published works, besides so much journalism; but the reader of her autobiography will understand our meaning. She complains that she lived from hand to mouth, that the price of a book was always eaten up before it was received, that it was never possible for her to devote a year to work that was not paid for in advance. Yet within the first decade of her independent career she was in the habit of receiving a thousand pounds or more for each of the novels that she turned out at the rate of two or three annually. When one remembers the conditions in which Carlyle and Tennyson devoted themselves to literature, the contrast is too striking for the reader to have any doubts that Mrs. Oliphant was one of those rather numerous writers of talent who are made happy or miserable, according to their temperament, by the belief that they only need favourable conditions to produce the great book which the necessity of pot-boiling prevents their ever attempting. In Mrs. Oliphant's case the belief was a source of sorrow. Yet she tells us, with a sort of pride that often attends a similar confession, that she was prevented from saving money enough for the year's labour on a great novel by her dislike of the small economies of life. She preferred to travel first-class, and have her comforts. So do we all: that is a natural instinct, and not the proof of refinement which it seems to those who dwell in the twilight of vague ideas. Only some have thought out the fact, which most of us learn by experience, that as everything in this world has to be paid for in some currency, it is well to consider the price beforehand. Mrs. Oliphant unconsciously tells us that the price she paid for her first-class ticket was the abandonment of her chance to be ranked with George Eliot and Jane Austen. That is clear enough proof that she was too far out of touch with the reality of things to be more than the excellent story-teller and sound literary hack whom we know. Herein is, to our mind, the strongest element of her life's manifold pathos.

We have little space left to speak of the interesting picture of Mrs. Oliphant's literary life, which is supplemented by her well-arranged letters. We may draw special attention, perhaps, to the glimpses of Tennyson and Carlyle—the Carlyle of the newly published letters. Of Tennyson Mrs. Oliphant's first experience was not very promising—the "roughness and acrid gloom" which "saved him from his over-romantic appearance" impressed themselves on the young writer, who felt rather annoyed because the great poet took little notice of her. At the end of the luncheon party to which a friend took Mrs.

Oliphant, she went up to Mrs. Tennyson to take leave, when the following incident occurred:—

I am never good at parting politenesses, and I daresay was very gauche in saying that it was so kind of her to ask me; while she graciously responded that she was delighted to have seen me, &c., according to the established ritual in such cases. Tennyson was standing by with his ragged beard and his saturnine look. He eyed us, while these pretty speeches were being made, with cynical eyes. "What liars you women are!" he said.

Mrs. Carlyle called once, to find Mrs. Oliphant in great trouble over her baby, which had had an attack of convulsions.

By the first post possible that same evening I got a letter from her, telling me that Mr. Carlyle had made her sit down at once and write to tell me that a sister of his had once had just such an attack, which never was repeated. . . . That was not much like the old ogre his false friends have made him out to be.

It is hard to know whether to be sorry that Mrs. Oliphant never completed her autobiography, as she intended. We should have gained a delightful book, but we might have lost a curious human document.

A BOOK OF ESSAYS.

A Paladin of Philanthropy, and other Papers. By Austin Dobson. 7½ × 5½ in., 361 pp. London, 1899. Chatto & Windus. 6/-

There is no settled scheme in Mr. Austin Dobson's latest volume of essays. They are collected from various reviews and magazines: some, apparently, have served as introductions to printed books. They range at large over a considerable variety of subjects—from Goldsmith, and Gay, and Luttrell to memories of Old Whitehall, and changes in the neighbourhood of Charing-cross—and they make as interesting reading as can be desired for any one blessed with a touch of the antiquarian spirit, and with a love of eighteenth century books. The reprinting of contributions to periodical literature is an offence in the eyes of some: the reviewer scents easy bookmaking from afar, and objects to the collector of desultory essays that his volume presents no settled design. Desultory essays should present (as collected) no settled design: they are sufficient in themselves, if good of their kind; and we shall be pleased to listen to Mr. Dobson's delightful studies of by-gone times until he tires of writing them. Few men living are better qualified to deal with the period he is so fond of handling: certainly none could veil so solid an erudition with such an engaging charm of manner. The writer is steeped in that half-forgotten literature; there is scarcely a paragraph without its apt quotation or allusion. His papers are packed with information—so much so that we find ourselves too often regretting Mr. Dobson's encyclopædic mind. For, as essays, some of these are overloaded with material. They are delightful reading for the student, but the mere lover of literature would welcome a little more of the author's personality. After all, it is the personal element that preserves most writings—and essays in particular—from oblivion.

The "Paladin of Philanthropy," who has the honour of giving a name to this collection, is that General Oglethorpe who appears fitfully in Boswell's "Johnson," and figures largely in other books of the period. Living to an extreme old age, it was his boast that he had once "shot snipe in Conduit-street," but he is more justly renowned for his services to British colonization in the founding of Georgia, and in his subsequent defence of the settlement against Spanish invasion. This account of his fortunes makes as interesting a paper as any in the volume. "Angelo's Reminiscences"—the autobiographical notes of Henry Angelo, son of the founder of the once famous fencing school—provide material for a picture of the days of Garrick, and Foote, and of Gainsborough and Reynolds. "Boswell's Predecessors and Editors" is an exhaustive essay, for which bibliographers will be thankful, and "John Gay" is the subject of a kindly and appreciative sketch. These four are, perhaps, of more general interest than the others, but there is not one of the thirteen that is not well worth reading. The book makes an admirable pendant to the series of "Eighteenth Century Vignettes." It is written pleasantly, easily, and with now and then a welcome touch of humour. Mr. Dobson's critical faculty is as acute, his mastery of facts as complete, as ever. Sometimes he permits himself a clumsy locution—it is perhaps the penalty of a plethora of material—but there are few writers who could handle such a mass of facts as lightly. And the work—a crowning mercy—is equipped with an adequate index. It is a book not only to read, but to keep.

"BETWEEN THE HEATHER AND THE SEA."

Highways and Byways in Donegal and Antrim. By Stephen Gwynn. With Illustrations by Hugh Thomson. 8×5½ in., xvi. + 319 pp. London, 1899. Macmillan. 6/-

Here is a really interesting and well-written book, in which, nevertheless, the author contrives to fall between two stools. He has tried to combine a book for the stay-at-home reader with a guide for the cyclist or pedestrian who is "doing" the north-west coast of Ireland between the heather and the sea. The former is either amused or annoyed according to his mood by being constantly and pathetically implored "not to take the second turning to the left," let us say, between Killybegs and Ardara; but we should imagine that the latter would be rendered "fit to be tied" (the Irish equivalent for frenzied) at having to mine out such special information, as well as distances, hotels, &c., from the bowels of over three hundred closely-printed pages. True, there is a map, and there is also an index, but the road distances are not marked upon the map, and there is no itinerary. We cannot, therefore, recommend it as a guide-book per se; and although, after a day's tramp, one would enjoy its perusal keenly in some farmhouse of Malinmore, or by the "wild sea banks" of Glen Columbkil, we cannot, owing to its weight, recommend the tourist to take it with him. But we do recommend him to read it before he starts; it will provide him with plenty of information and enjoyment, especially if he reads it at a table.

Mr. Gwynn, a native of Donegal, knows his highways and byways thoroughly, has a nice sentiment for scenery, and possesses a pleasant and literary style. And if he sometimes pads, as in the account of the siege of Derry, which belongs to the historian, or in the long story of the Sons of Usnach, which belongs to the folklorist, he is delightful at other times in his understanding of the peasant, and in his appreciation of the peasant's humour. Irish is still the natural language of the wild west coast, the language of trade, business, and schools. In Glen Columbkil or Gweedore, when the men speak English it is the English of foreigners, not merely English with a brogue, but English with a strong foreign accent. "It's the Irish we speak among wursel's, but we hae enough Scotch to speak till yer honour" is a West Donegal apology for imperfect English, the peasantry believing that any language which is not Irish must be Scotch, owing to the prevalence of Scotchmen in the neighbouring province of Ulster. Scotch is, likewise, a synonym for Protestant as Irish is for Catholic. "There's a many comes here for the watter, Scotch and Irish," said one referring to certain holy water in Columbkil chapel; "an' for a' that A see a Scotch prayer goes up as far as an Irish one." A less liberal spirit was exhibited by the publican at Portsalon, who, having unsuccessfully opposed the granting of a spirit licence to his Protestant rival, went away bitterly cursing the "bloody Orange majority" of the Licensing Bench. "Ah, well," he said to a knot of his sympathizers, "let him alone, boys. Wait till he gets to Hell. He'll find no Orange majority there!" The capital "bull" thus perpetrated makes one pardon the bigotry of intention, although the solace found in the certainty of eternal punishment—for their neighbours—is widespread among the peasant class. It was the evergreen consolation of an old Catholic Irishwoman, whom we knew, when reflecting on the luxuries and follies of the great (Protestant) ones of the earth, to remember that they were bound "to fry" for all eternity, before many more years had passed over their heads. Mr. Gwynn gives some amusing instances of the misuse of words, so characteristic of the Irish peasant speaking English. Thus an old ploughman said of a field overgrown with rushes, "It'll be a quare tragedy gettin' them rushes out of thon field"; as we should say "a sad job." The same old man's description of a paddock in early spring was, "It's just fit for an outsport for them young beasts"; and in answer to an objection that it was bare of herbage, "It's not for what they'll get off it, but they'll just peruse over it." The same old Irishwoman alluded to above spoke of some flowers past their first freshness as being "on the demur"; of a plan which appeared to her far-fetched, "I niver heard of sich a critical idea in me life"; of some foodstuff which she had not seen her way to using, "It was always a speculation to me what to do with it." But Mr. Gwynn's example of an odd shot at a medical term—"An' what is it that's ailin' her?" "It's just the brown cats" (bronchitis)—is equalled by that of a Cockney girl, who, returning from the hospital where she had been visiting a friend, explained that the patient was suffering from "harmoniums in her inside," i.e., pneumonia.

The book contains plenty of information for fishermen and golfers, and Mr. Hugh Thomson's pencil and chalk drawings are numerous and charming.

ART.

History of Modern Italian Art. By Ashton Rollins Willard. 9½×6 in., 566 pp. London, 1898. Longmans. 18/- n.

Mr. Willard, whom we take to be an American, has, in this volume, essayed to tell the life story of modern Italian Art. He has done this mainly by passing in review the sculptors, painters, and architects, who—to use the old phrase—have flourished in Italy during the present century, and some of whom continue to flourish there at the present day. The method has proved laborious, for, with the exception of the "Dizionario degli artisti Italiani" of de Gubernatis, there is no standard work on the subject available. Thus, with regard to deceased artists, he has had to supplement the fugitive art literature of their time with what he could glean from friends and descendants, while, with regard to the living, he has had largely to obtain information from the artists themselves. Notwithstanding these difficulties, Mr. Willard has managed to write a history which, if it contains here and there a hasty judgment, strikes us as, on the whole, spirited, accurate, and just.

Although contemporary art is, of course, the final concern of the author, he has thought it wise to take his readers some way back into the past, into the company of sculptors like Canova, painters like Appiani, and architects like Cagnola, all of whom were born in the middle of the eighteenth century. The necessity of so doing is tolerably apparent, for these men were the leaders of the Italian school of neo-classicism, the school which was dominant far on into the nineteenth century, and which, in architecture at least, is still a force. It is, however, best to give Mr. Willard's justification in his own words, all the more as they explain his theory with precision, and suggest what his treatment is like:—

The classic movement of the last years of the last century is the basis upon which the present structure rests. It is necessary to understand that movement in order to see clearly the sequence which led to the totally different art-product of our own time. The foundation is a singular one, however. The present art-structure rests upon it by not resting upon it. It has come to be what it is by sheer reaction. No one can understand Bartolini—the great modern leader—without understanding Canova. An important element in the controlling motive of the former was a desire to get away from what the latter had done. Bartolini did not himself entirely understand the impulses which prompted him to do as he did; but this unconscious reaction constituted two-thirds of the dynamic pressure which forced him into the development of his own peculiar individual style.

Classicism brought Canova fame and riches, but, probably, as Mr. Willard more than hints, wrought the ruin of a great natural gift. Indeed, if one compares his statue of Clement XIV.—modelled when he was only twenty-six—with its commanding gesture and unity, and admirably treated tunic, with any of the Graces or Goddesses of his maturer years (such, for instance, as Pauline Borghese as Venus), with their vulgar sham classical drapery, the deterioration is undeniable. All that Mr. Willard has to say of Canova is interesting, but more interesting is his sketch of Bartolini, the only one of his contemporaries who in any way disputed his ascendancy. Born in 1777, Canova's junior therefore by only twenty years, and trained in the strictest sect of the Pharisees of Classicism, it is in him that we find the first gesture of revolt. Indeed, the dignified realism of the kneeling girl in the "Fiducia in Dio," familiar to all visitors to Milan, and its intense and exquisite pathos, shows an art wholly emancipated from the classic bondage. At any rate his teaching, which sent the student to nature rather than to the Glyptothek, found favour alike with painters and sculptors. For a description of how this leaven worked in the materialism of Vincenzo Vela and others, and how it is working still, we must send the reader to Mr. Willard's conscientious study.

In painting, the transition was of less interest, because the classicals, Camuccini, Appiani, and the rest, were not men of great gifts. Modern Italian art is essentially romantic and realistic, though here and there, as in the work of Sartorio, there is an echo of early Florence. Mr. Willard's sketch of the Neapolitan Domenico Morelli, the most modern yet most spiritual painter of the last half-century, is noteworthy. So, too, is the brief note on Segantini, the artist whose Barbizon lies beyond the Maloja, and his analytical treatment of colour; but one is surprised to find only a slighting reference to Monticelli, who, for all his formless drawing, was one of the few great colourists of the present century. The chapters on the Italian architects are disappointing. Cagnola, the designer of the fine Arch of the Simplon, heads the list, but, of course, there has been no real romantic movement in the architecture of Italy, where they are still disputing over the hybrid horror of the West front of the Duomo at Milan.

Vandyck's Pictures at Windsor Castle, Historically and Critically Described. By Ernest Law, B.A. With 20 Plates in Photogravure. 21½ x 10½ in. London, Munich, and New York, 1899. Franz Hanfstaengl. £3 6/-

This work is, we understand, the first of a series of volumes which Mr. Ernest Law is preparing on the pictures in the State Rooms at Windsor Castle and the masterpieces in the Royal collection generally, such as the unequalled examples of the Dutch School at Buckingham Palace, the specimens of Venetian and Ferrarese art at Hampton Court, and the Raphael "Cartoons" at South Kensington. The present volume includes thirty reproductions of the Windsor pictures with articles by Mr. Law, containing a general appreciation rather than an exhaustive critical survey of Vandyck's work. Mr. Law's efforts have rather been confined to collecting all that might throw light on the individual pictures, to discussing the evidence of their authenticity, and to providing connoisseurs, as far as possible, with material for drawing their own conclusions.

The Royal collection of pictures has never yet been critically described, and the work which Mr. Law has undertaken will be of great value. The author has all the qualities required for this considerable undertaking—enthusiasm, experience, knowledge, a clear, attractive style, and the courage which enables him to form original judgments.

The first picture he gives is the Windsor portrait of Vandyck, which is generally supposed to be the one painted by the artist for Charles I. on the former's arrival in England.

Vandyck [says Mr. Law], the most princely of artists and the favourite painter of the most artistic of princes, must ever maintain a unique position in the annals of social life, as well as in the history of art in this country. . . . No other painter ever succeeded in impressing his own individuality so strongly on those whom he portrayed, or in identifying himself—foreigner though he was—so completely with a whole epoch and phase of English life. Had it been possible for King Charles to have made his selection from the long range of the great artists since the Renaissance of that one who might best interpret him and his Court to all future ages, he could not have lighted on any who would have fulfilled this function so eagerly, so admirably, so felicitously as did Vandyck—the splendid, the ardent, the refined! No other painter would ever have been so thoroughly in accord, in spirit and in temperament as in taste and in style, with that high-bred dignity of bearing, that ease and grace of manner, that incomparable air of distinction, that perfect "form" which were the marks—salient and supreme—of the men and women who composed the Court of Charles I., and which pervade the artist's whole gallery of their portraiture.

Here one can see something of Mr. Law's point of view. It might be asked, would not Velasquez have been as good a choice if Charles had the world of artists to select from? But "why drag in Velasquez" when Vandyck's work is so entirely satisfying? Its success, however, is due more to the artist and less to his subject than Mr. Law would have us believe in the passage we have quoted. How much of the "incomparable air" of distinction, which he finds in the Court of Charles, is the creation of Vandyck? It is certain that, to no small extent, great painters make their periods; the solidity, the firm simplicity of Henry VIII. and his consorts and his friends can be found in the character of Hans Holbein; the air of dignity in Philip IV., and in the Pope and Cardinals of his time, is really the spirit of Velasquez; the warmth, the grace, the sweetness of the ladies of Charles II. are to be found in Lely's ideal; the health and jollity of the English aristocracy of Georgian times represents the artistic temperament of Sir Joshua Reynolds. As one looks through these splendid reproductions of the Windsor pictures—the delightful Henrietta-Marias, the well-known Charles "and his family," "on a white horse," "on a yellow horse," "in robes of State," the Killigrew and Carew, the Countess of Carlisle, the Princess of Cantecroix—one cannot but feel that the Court of the second Stuart owes no little of its beauty and grace which posterity find in it to the refinement and skill of Vandyck.

One of the most admirably reproduced pictures—and all are of high merit—in this volume is that of the "Head of Charles I. in three Positions." It was drawn, as Mr. Law reminds us, "for the express purpose of serving as a model to the Italian sculptor Bernini in the execution of his bust."

Determined, one might suppose, that nothing should be wanting to posterity—that not a line, not a trace of the 'Kingly image' should perish or elude the perpetuating record of the sculptured marble—he has given us here such a delineation of the monarch's face as for vividness and accuracy exists of no other personage in history. . . . It is characteristic, also, of the depth and intensity of Vandyck's temperament as an artist that this piece, which, as a design for a plastic work in cold marble, might have been supposed to demand in its execution the exercise of no other faculty but a mechanical accuracy of drawing and a scrupulously careful modelling in monochrome, should have issued from his studio a work of supreme merit, instinct with the inspiration of his genius, glowing with all the colour and warmth of life, touched and infused by the soul-kindling fire of his ardent imagination!

Mr. Law writes with vivid appreciation throughout of the originals of the thirty admirable reproductions which have been prepared in photogravure by Mr. Franz Hanfstaengl. To all who are interested in the art of Vandyck this sumptuous portfolio, with the informing and graceful monographs on each of the pictures, will form a valuable source of knowledge.

Bibliography of Eighteenth Century Art and Illustrated Books: Being a Guide to Collectors of Illustrated Works in English and French of the Period. By J. Lewine. With 35 Plates. 10½ x 6½ in., xv. + 615 pp. London, 1898. Sampson Low. £3 3/-

In this important attempt to deal with a great—and in England an almost untouched—subject Mr. Lewine has achieved considerable success. But the thoroughness and comprehensiveness which would have entitled him to unreserved praise are not entirely here. His wide acquaintance with the books he has catalogued should have ensured greater completeness than he has attained. To be sure, he anticipates objections to some extent by declaring at the outset that "I have excluded some books which are either devoid of any feature of interest from the literary or artistic point of view or are not germane to the object of my work." As to "features of interest," there may, perhaps, be some difference of opinion; but most persons will, we think, agree with us that many of the works overlooked are extremely germane to the object of such a bibliography as this. Such, for example, are the omissions from notable "Catalogues" of the "Catalogue systématique et raisonné" of the cabinet of M. Davila (Paris, 1767); of the edition of 1760 with plates by Deseve, and of that of 1768 with plates by Gravelot, from the list of illustrated editions of Rabelais; and of the Chauveau edition from those of La Fontaine's Fables.

We cannot imagine on what grounds many other works have been left out. It may be interesting to mention a few familiar enough to some collectors:—"Recueil de Diverses Figures Etrangères," which, published in Paris in 1760, contains a title and eleven plates after Boucher; Gosmond's "Les Campagnes de Louis XV., représentées par figures allégoriques," Paris, 1751; "Recueil de differens Projets d'Architecture, &c.," with many plates after La Guèpière, 1752; Dr. Langhorne's "Fables de Flora" (London, 1794), which Stothard illustrated; Marin le Roy de Gomberville's "La Doctrine des Mœurs," with a hundred plates by Daret, of which a translation was published in London in 1721; "Vues Remarquables des Montagnes de la Suisse," which, illustrated by Wolff, Rosenberg, Clément, and others, was published in Amsterdam in 1785; and the "Heures Nouvelles, dédiées à Madame la Dauphine: écrites et gravées par Senault," which was issued in Paris, without a date, in 1740. A less cursory examination would doubtless reveal a considerable number of similar omissions, which, together with not a few typographical errors, should be made good in a revised edition.

Fault-finding in this case is not as ungracious as it appears; it is really a tribute to the long-sustained effort of an enthusiastic connoisseur, for we should not have been concerned to take so seriously a less conscientious work. Nearly all the books here catalogued have apparently been seen by the author, who gives particulars of a valuable sort relative to a vast number of them, together with what he considers to be the real market value, independent of the vagaries of reckless collectors and unscrupulous dealers. Had Mr. Lewine taken somewhat lower ground in his preface, the general verdict on his book would in all probability have been more appreciative. The plates give some indication of the character of the originals, but they cannot be considered as works of art in themselves. The rare Freemason series, however, is of great interest and curiosity, especially in view of the imitations—libellous, many of them—that have on several occasions been made. It is to be hoped that Mr. Lewine will not stop here, but will set himself at the earliest opportunity to perfect a work which, with all its minor defects, is an extremely important contribution to the bibliography of literature.

THE RENAISSANCE IN ITALY. By Selwyn Brinton, Part II. (Simpkin 3s. 6d. n.). In this second volume, Mr. Brinton has done for the schools of Venice, Padua, Verona, and Ferrara-Bologna what, in his first, he did for those of Pisa, Florence, and Siena. In plan, Part II is an improvement on Part I. The method now adopted is to introduce each school by an essay of a more or less historical character, and to follow this up with a list of the artists belonging to it, and a tolerably full catalogue raisonné of their principal works. Thus, after an article on "The school of Squarcione," and one on "Verona la degna," we have lists of the Paduan and Veronese artists and of their works, which, though by no means exhaustive, exhibit a meritorious industry. In these lists—which Mr. Brinton calls Analyses—he contrives to call attention to many points of interest, such as the choice of subject, the artistic affinities of the painting, its admitted or suspected authenticity, and the like. The space at his command does not, however, enable him to enter into the pros and cons of such questions, for as the book is intended to be a handy book for travellers and students compendiousness has been deemed of the first importance, and compression has, in fact, been pushed to the utmost limits of the bearable. Under these circumstances it is only fair that Mr. Brinton's work should be considered as a sort of critical pemmican, and as such it is wanting neither in the quality of flavour nor in that of nutrition. Mr. Brinton's own comments are sufficiently spirited, personal, and fresh. In the matter of spelling proper names, Muriano for Murano, and so forth, he allows himself considerable license, but not more than is common among Italians. He is up to date, too, though he makes scant use of Professor Wickoff's discoveries, and his summary rejection of so many of the Dosses at Dresden strikes one as hardly justifiable. Nor do we suppose that many experts will agree with his view that the typical Palma, "The meeting of Jacob and Rachel," is "full of Giorgione's sentiment." His descriptions of pictures from personal examination are in the main accurate enough, though here and there are trifling slips. Mr. Brinton tells us, for instance, that in the masterpiece at Castelfranco San Liberale is bare-headed, while in the deep-toned sketch at the National Gallery "he wears his helmet," whereas the exact converse is true.

The modesty of Mrs. Field's preface to AN INTRODUCTION TO THE STUDY OF THE RENAISSANCE (Smith, Elder, 6s.) should not be allowed to detract from its merits. To say that a book which deals concisely with European art and literature in the extensive period known as the Renaissance can "boast of no research" is absurdly self-depreciative. A volume such as this, although essentially elementary, could not have been written except with a wide and varied knowledge, and others than the students of whom Mrs. Field speaks will be benefited by the concise bird's-eye view of men and things which it affords. Considering the magnitude of the task, the manner of its achievement is worthy of all admiration. A short and fairly complete criticism of the English, French, Italian, and Spanish literature of the Renaissance alone would need a range of reading possible to few; but to this Mrs. Field adds brief summaries of European painting, sculpture, and architecture, and a note on the religious and social conditions of the time. To cavil at details in a book of this nature would be an ungracious task. Mrs. Field's criticism of Villon, for instance, is inadequate, and her statement that Villon typifies "the long-stifled voice of man's lower nature recklessly making itself heard" is misleading, for the most pathetic of all poets stands for much more than this. Again, it is untrue to say that such dramatists as Ford, Tourneur, and Webster "lost the grip of true tragedy." But, on the whole, Mrs. Field is a safe guide, and any disagreement with her opinion regarding a detail here and there is soon forgotten in contemplation of the extent of her labours.

The sketch of the black side of the period with which Mrs. Field concludes is painful reading by the side of the literary and artistic glory of the time, but it is useful to remember that the same age which produced Raphael and Michelangelo produced the Inquisition and made a Borgia Pope. The astonishing contradictions of the Renaissance, the volcanic outburst of artistic energy from the black emptiness of the middle ages, the struggle of human thought and freedom with the tyrannies of Church and Crown, are well touched on by Mrs. Field. We wish the volume could have been twice as long.

TUSCAN ARTISTS, THEIR THOUGHT AND WORK, by Hope Rea (Redway, 5s. n.). This is one more addition to the long and increasing list of books which aim at planting sweetness and light in the inartistic mind of the English tripper. As Sir W. Richmond puts it in a queerly-phrased but eulogistic introduction, "the subject is a very large one and could not have been treated with anything approaching exhaustion in short essay." What the authoress has done is to present the tourist with some half-dozen short sermons on Italian art, taking for her text sometimes a concrete fact like the goldsmiths' predominance among medieval craftsmen; sometimes a philosophical problem like "the relation between Imagination and Reality," and to illustrate or corroborate her views by profuse references to the works of this and the other master. To some extent her attitude resembles that of Mr. Grant Allen in his admirable "Florence," but she does not bring to her task either the same scholarship or the same analytical acumen. It is, however, only fair to say that her book has the charm of sincerity and enthusiasm, and that she writes sympathetically and without a too obvious effort at surprising her readers. Her last chapter contains a really excellent description of the famous arca in Or San Michele.

ECONOMICS.

It is just possible to keep count of the works of first-rate importance which appear in the course of a year. But who could reckon up the endless little volumes which come pouring forth from English and American presses on economic or social subjects—unless, indeed, an amount of time and energy which the occasion scarcely warrants were expended? Little books of this kind divide themselves into four classes. One has first of all the book which is simply and solely a condensation of some larger work. The condensing operation is sometimes performed by the author of the bigger book in question, but oftener by one of his disciples and admirers. Next there is the work of the man who knows his facts, but is quite incapable of reasoning from them, of arriving at any conclusive or definite result. Opposed to his is the far commoner case of the writer who is full of theories, of generalizations, of ingenious arguments, but who quite ignores the necessity of verifying his statements or of basing his generalizations upon facts. And, finally, we have the man—unfortunately for the reader, he comes but seldom—who has taken the trouble to ascertain the truth for himself, and has, moreover, the power of criticizing keenly, reasoning correctly, and thus offering a real contribution to the literature of his subject. It is to this class that Dr. Menger's RIGHT TO THE WHOLE PRODUCE OF LABOUR (Macmillan, 6s. n.) belongs. Here, however, the ground is cut away from below the reviewer's feet, for the book is prefaced by an introduction of over 100 pages, in which Professor Foxwell gives what is really a complete and careful review of Dr. Menger's work. To review a review is scarcely profitable, and it would be difficult to improve upon Professor Foxwell's account of the book. He describes it as—

At the same time a history and a criticism. It deals, not with Socialism in general, under all its aspects, but with a single claim or first principle of Socialists, the asserted right of the labourer to the whole produce of industry, or, if we prefer to express it in its negative form, the denial of a right to "unearned" income.

It should be of peculiar interest to English readers in that it treats at length of a little known school of English thinkers, the school of Godwin, Hall, Thompson, and others, and traces the principles they advocated down to their latest developments in theory and legislation. Dr. Menger inquires "how far these principles are consistent with one another, and how far all or any of them are capable of incarnation in a practical coherent system of rights, adapted to human nature as we know it." The inquiry is conducted in a genuinely scientific spirit, and whether we agree with Dr. Menger's conclusions or not, we are glad that his book, which has been known on the Continent for over twelve years, should now have become accessible to English readers. It has been well translated by Mr. E. Tanner, and Professor Foxwell's careful bibliography should prove extremely useful.

On the whole, Mr. Sargent may be placed in the same class. His little book on the ECONOMIC POLICY OF COLBERT (Longmans, 2s. 6d.) is one of the admirable series of Studies in Economics and Political Science produced under the auspices of the London School of Economics, and is therefore fairly sure to be worth reading. The book, as its author says, is "merely a short study; its object, to give a consistent view of the policy of an administrator and practical economist little known to English students; and to indicate the native sources of information to those who wish to follow up the subject."

This latter end is attained by a clear and well-compiled bibliography. As to the former, Colbert, "habile homme d'affaires," as administrator, as financier, as economist, is studied carefully and impartially by Mr. Sargent, who has the fluent pen and the critical faculty which are the traditional inheritance of Oxford. The author summarizes the results of his study in his final chapter on "Colbert's legacy to France"—

Colbert's policy of trade regulation brought little but evil to France, but progress has followed the application of his real principle, the principle of the removal of hindrances, which dominates his best work as an administrator, and which is the most thorough expression of his views. As a financier he merits ungrudging praise. Here he was truly original; and his principles have received the allegiance of those individuals among his successors in office who have been most distinguished for capacity and judgment.

Dr. Devine's book on ECONOMICS (The Macmillan Co., 4s. 6d. n.) cannot quite entitle its author to rank as an original contributor to the science he teaches. But, though he does not say anything new, he repeats old truths with freshness and interest. The book is intended for use in the class-room or lecture-room, and it might with advantage be read by English students who are not always familiar with the works of American economists, and for whom Mr. Devine's methods will have the attraction of novelty. The least satisfactory chapter is, perhaps, that on value, which Mr. Devine discusses at length, but not conclusively. In this small volume many problems, as for example, trades unions, monopolies, industrial co-operation, financial relations, remain untouched, and a supplementary volume of a more advanced nature would be worth having from Mr. Devine's pen. His present book deserves genuine praise for its careful, clear, and fresh restatement of economic truths and theories.

Mr. Townsend Warner, the author of LANDMARKS IN ENGLISH INDUSTRIAL HISTORY (Blackie, 5s.), also belongs to the class of writer who condenses large and important books into a small space for the benefit of his pupils. Mr. Warner has performed this office conscientiously enough, though it is a pity that he has not made more use of Professor Maitland's researches in his treatment of manor and borough. We should have thought some knowledge of them essential to Mr. Warner's work. Still, his book may quite possibly prove useful for teaching purposes. No doubt it will save a number of students the trouble of reading such books as Cunningham's "Growth of English Industry and Commerce" (upon which Mr. Warner's volume is mainly based), Ashley's "Economic History," Gross' "Gild Merchant," and the like. Whether this is a desirable end is a matter about which there may be two opinions.

M. Achille Loria is an excellent example of class three. He wields a brilliant pen and is blessed with a good translator. If only his reasoning faculty and his accuracy were equal to his powers of writing he might have done valuable work. Unfortunately, this is not the case, and his ECONOMIC FOUNDATIONS OF SOCIETY (Social Science Series, Sonnenschein, 3s. 6d.) is a tissue of plausible but unsound generalizations, of skilful casuistry and bad logic, of wild arguments and astounding conclusions. He has been at a great feast of economic and historical literature and has stolen the scraps; his reading has been wide indeed, but not wise. Almost any one of his general propositions might be inverted and the same results deduced. The panacea for all evils, social, moral, economic, is free land—free land is, indeed, the text, the argument, and the summing up of the book. For the rest, it fills us with a desire to question all his statements. Where are the savage societies whose members are all free, equal, and independent to be found? Is it true that economic transformations are causes of great changes in language? Or that "in primitive communities where capitalistic property does not exist, the ethics of egoism succeed perfectly in assuring the welfare of both the individual and society"? Or that the matriarchal system could only prevail before private possessions existed? As a matter of fact the maternal family can and does co-exist with private property, for example, on the Malabar coast. Yet, despite such astonishing assertions as that "Crime is a morbid emanation of capitalistic conditions," "all legal aphorisms have been drawn up in the interests of the rich and strong and in contempt of justice and equity," "in the temple of Themis there is no place reserved for the labourer," the book is undeniably clever and well written.

Mr. Allen Clarke, who has written a little work on THE FACTORY SYSTEM AND ITS EFFECTS (Grant Richards, 2s. 6d.), is a type of the opposite class. He is—so we gather from internal evidence—an ex-factory hand, the son and brother of operatives, the husband of a factory lass. He left the factory and became a journalist—for towards the end of the book he tells us that—

The northern factory folk have laughed and cried over my humble everyday stories, have cut out of their papers and pasted in scrap-books my factory songs and ballads, and know them as well as I do, have roared with hilarity over my humorous dialect sketches, and have by heart all the comical doings and sayings of my "Bill Spriggs."

We feel that we ought to share this knowledge, but, unfortunately, we do not. The results of both his occupations are writ large upon Mr. Clarke's pages. In the first place he knows the facts, the people, the lives he is trying to describe. And, secondly, he can never resist the temptation of writing journalism and of soaring into wild flights of rhetoric. He is mainly actuated by a hatred of the factory system and all that it involves; and no doubt his little book will enlighten many of its readers as to the conditions under which the Lancashire cotton trade is carried on. If he had only confined himself to a statement of the facts he would have produced a much more telling result. This, however, is rather much to expect. Mr. Clarke's little volume may be commended to any one who is anxious to ascertain the views of a thoughtful man of the operative class—provided that he does not object to very plain speaking and can also sift the real from the merely rhetorical.

Mr. Wilson Harper's work on THE FOUNDATIONS OF SOCIETY (Ward, Lock, 6s.) is one of a class which is becoming increasingly familiar—a class which pours forth in unlimited abundance from all sides, and especially from American presses, which treats of all subjects, but dwells most lovingly on sociology and economics. To be brief, it is a Notebook. It is neatly divided up under headings and sub-headings, and it is, perhaps, well to state that the headings are "Society," "Its Origin," "Its Ethical Basis," "Its Economic Basis," "Its Political Basis," "Its Religious Basis." The notes have been taken with great care, and the references, which are numerous, are given with scrupulous exactness. Mr. Harper has read all the best authorities, and all the books and magazine articles about the best authorities. He quotes from St. Luke and Mr. Benjamin Kidd, Plato and Mr. Grant Allen, Bishop Lightfoot and Sir Frederick Pollock; and many other writers of different degrees of eminence. Indeed, the amount of time and trouble which must have been spent in the compilation of the volume is distressing to reflect upon, when it is compared with the net result. Mr. Harper's own opinions appear occasionally, but though cheerful they are in no way original, and the perusal of his book leaves one oppressed with much information, if not perceptibly nearer the solution of social problems. It is not inspiring, but it might with perfect safety be placed in the hands of a well-meaning and commonplace young person who was anxious to study social philosophy. No worse danger than slight boredom awaits the reader of this "investigation into the foundations of society," which concludes that "the realization of a perfect state belongs to the future; as yet it is only a goal seen in the distance," and that "the drift of events is towards the reconciliation of all that is good and true in individualism and socialism. When this reconciliation is finally effected, social progress will be assured, and the foundations of society rendered absolutely stable."

OTHER NEW BOOKS.

Few literary "finds" of the last year are, in their kind, more suggestive than the LETTERS DE L'ABBÉ MORELLET, edited by Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice (Plon, 3.50f.). The Abbé Morellet, to whom Voltaire alludes as Abbé Mords-les, was a victim of a lack of political foresight. At the close of the eighteenth century he was a friend of the "philosophers" and encyclopædists. These letters, in which, in his role of Anglomaniac, Morellet is revealed as the friend of Shelburne, Burke, Priestley, and Price, open with a touching scene describing the last days of Helvétius, who died in the abbé's arms. He reads and discusses the best pamphlets published in London, and then, in the salon of Mme. Geoffrin, adorns his conversation with brilliant political maxims borrowed therefrom. The contest between Wilkes and Townsend excited his nerve there. At the outbreak of the American War, he rose to the occasion and condemned the intervention of France and the English conservatives. When a Whig administration came into office he urged Shelburne to open negotiations, and, for his pains, obtained a pension from Louis XVI. The next few years were the happiest in his life. He wrote on the liberty of the Press, and was flattered by Shelburne, who called him a French Swift. His enthusiasm for Turgot was so great that in a letter to Shelburne he said that England enjoyed fewer liberties than France:—

... parce que vos préjugés sont bien opiniâtres, et que chez vous l'autorité ne peut pas, comme ici, braver les préjugés nationaux. Mais notre exemple y servira, et si l'administration de M. Turgot dure quelques années seulement, les effets en seront si frappants que l'Europe entière pourra ouvrir les yeux.

Europe did open her eyes, and, in fact, stared in blank astonishment, when the National Assembly, at which the gentle abbé had, at first, laughed, drew up, a few years later, a plan of reform that left none of the old institutions standing. The abbé had mistaken for a period of peace what was merely a lull before a storm, and he, too, was caught up by the whirlwind. It is really pathetic to hear his complaints at the cessation of his pension, and to learn that he is compelled to send his niece to Mme. d'Houdetot. Then the Convention assembled, and all Europe was ablaze. The Allied Armies invaded France, while the King's head fell on the Place de la Revolution. The abbé was not what M. Déroulède would call a "patriot." He wrote to Shelburne that the Allies alone "could establish in France a government that would have some stability and give us, if not happiness and wealth, which have for ever quitted our unfortunate country, at least security for the individual and a little quiet." This passage shows the extent of the abbé's foresight. Peace was restored in France by an army, but it was that of General Bonaparte. The letters end with the elevation of the successful Corsican to the Consulate. For the sequel of Morellet's story we must turn to his Memoires, which were published in 1823. In the wreck of the Monarchy he did save the archives of the French Academy and the manuscript of the unfinished Dictionary, and these he restored in 1802 when Bonaparte organized the Institute. In 1807 he was made a member of the Corps Legislatif, and he died in 1819, having witnessed to the end the great drama of the Revolution. The Holy Alliance must have given him some hopes that his plan of universal peace was about to be realized. The abbé's letters form an interesting supplement to his Memoires, and to the life of Lord Shelburne by their editor.

NAVAL.

Dr. Samuel Rawson Gardiner, who has undertaken to edit for the Navy Records Society the Letters and Papers relating to the FIRST DUTCH WAR, 1652-1654, has issued his volume carrying the record down to the autumn of 1652, and treating in turn of certain phases of the action with a short introduction to each. Dr. Gardiner postpones any general review of the results of the documents to the last volume, which will also contain an Index.

The second issue of ALL THE WORLD'S FIGHTING SHIPS (Sampson Low, 10s. 6d. n.) is much more than a reprint of the first with some new information added. Mr. Jane has revised his handbook all through, and has made many improvements in many details. In its present form it is an extremely useful book of reference, not only for naval officers, but for all who want to know what any man-of-war, native or foreign, they may hear of looks like and what her powers are. The indexes and classifications, very essential parts of such a work, are full and as clear as they well can be considering the complexity of the subject. With Mr. Jane and the Austrian Almanach für die K.-u.-K. Kriegsmarine, which also is about the best thing of its kind, the expert will be well armed. Mr. Jane adds a compact summary of the naval side of the late Spanish-American war, which is more favourable to the Spaniards than some we have seen.

Mr. Bowen Stillon Mends (late surgeon, R.N.), the author of THE LIFE OF ADMIRAL SIR WILLIAM ROBERT MENDES, G.C.B. (Murray, 16s.), informs us in the preface that he has written it—or rather, to be strictly correct, compiled it—in obedience to his father's wishes. This is his sufficient justification for undertaking the task, and yet we cannot allow that, from the point of view of the reader, there is any visible need for a life of the Admiral on this scale. Sir William Mendes did good service in organizing the transport of the army from Varna to the Crimea, and this is the only war service he had a chance of seeing, though he did a good administrative work as Director of Transports at the Admiralty. It is further the case that Admiral Mendes did not think that his services had been sufficiently appreciated by Admiral Dundas. In the long run he did not suffer by this neglect, real or imaginary. He was one of Sir E. Lyons' men, and was warmly praised by that officer. The Directorship of Transports was given him as a reward for what he had done in the Crimea, and also no doubt because his management there had marked him as a very fit man for the place. Yet the injustice of Dundas plainly rankled in his mind to the end, and it is to this fact that we owe the biography. It would seem as if Sir W. Mendes felt that he could not rest in his grave, unless he died with the assurance that all the world would some day know of the sins of Dundas. To be quite candid, the spectacle of this posthumous revenge on a man dead long before himself is not very pleasant. The weakness, the inefficiency, even the want of courage of Dundas are insisted on ad nauseam in the letters of Sir William Mendes to his wife from the Crimea which are quoted in these pages at length. At the same time we cannot say that any very hearty praise is given to anybody else. Even his patron, Admiral Lyons, is rebuked from time to time. Captain Mendes, as he then was, was never tired of insisting on the incapacity of Lord Raglan and the dawdling of the soldiers. He lectures Sir John Burgoyne for his military engineering, and is as schoolmasterly with everybody as with him. Yet he never shows much understanding of the difficulties the soldiers had to contend against. These letters were, perhaps, excusable at the time as coming from a hard-worked and worried man, but to-day it is hardly pleasant or profitable to read them.

PORTUGUESE INDIA.

In the wide field of Indian history a great mass of new information is being rapidly accumulated, and the bewildering multiplicity of the results produces at first almost a feeling of despair. THE CHRONOLOGY OF INDIA, from the earliest times to the beginning of the sixteenth century, by C. Mabel Duff (Mrs. W. R. Rickmers) (Constable, 15s. n.), aims at reducing these results to a system. The materials which it lays under contribution range from modern periodical publications to ancient Chinese State records. The minute and accurate testimony of the latter has thrown a new light on many aspects of Indian history, and especially on the movements of those barbarous Scythian tribes which hovered like a threatening cloud on the Northern frontiers of India in the first century A.D. Perhaps the most interesting feature in the book is its summary of the evidence derived from epigraphical and numismatic sources, which has a very real and permanent value. The book covers a period ranging from 3000 B.C. to 1530 A.D. One position of it seems hardly up to the level of the rest. At the end of the fifteenth century the Portuguese begin to appear in India. The references to them are meagre and faulty even in the case of the most prominent names. Vasco da Gama first touched the Malabar littoral in May, 1498, not 1499. Albuquerque captured Malacca in 1511, not 1510, Ormuz in 1515, not 1514. His period of office is given as twelve years, twice as long as the reality, and—strangest error of all—he is said to have been recalled to Portugal in 1518, whereas he had died at sea in December, 1515. Some mention might with advantage have been made of Almeida, the first Viceroy, Albuquerque's predecessor, and we think it rather premature to date Portuguese decline from the death of the latter. This part of the book seems to have suffered through a too trusting reliance on second-rate authorities. Gleig's "History of the British Empire in India," and Bruce's "Annals of the E.I.C.," though excellent for their own period, hardly strike us as the most convincing names in the bibliography of Portuguese India. The errors, however, are confined to the last few pages; in the continuation (and we hope there is to be a continuation), the dates connected with the first appearance of Europeans in India will, no doubt, be brought up to the high standard of accuracy maintained in the rest of the work.

A separate history of the Portuguese in India, compiled in a manner worthy of the theme, has hitherto been lacking for English readers. THE RISE OF PORTUGUESE POWER IN INDIA, 1497-1550, by R. S. Whiteway, B.C.S. (retired) (Constable, 15s., n.), will go some way towards supplying this want. Written without any striking grace of style, it shows much power of research and a painstaking accuracy. The narrative, however, is too crowded with facts. On the rare occasions when Mr. Whiteway indulges in a generalization his comments are terse and judicious. He has grasped, for instance, the true meaning of the Portuguese appearance in India as the final phase of the great medieval struggle between Christendom and Islam; he pithily sums up in a sentence the Asiatic history of the gallant little nation when he describes it as the intrusion of a "Western power into the alien civilization of the East—an intrusion which the East has resented by absorbing and degrading the intruder"—and he has written an interesting and original chapter on the arms and method of warfare of the time. But we could have dispensed with many of the details with which subsequent pages are overlaid. We weary of the never-ceasing squabbles of the Portuguese amongst themselves, and the dreary catalogue of their appalling cruelties towards the "Moors." At times the main thread of the narrative is not easy to disentangle from the minor strands that cross and recross it.

We are disappointed that the author has limited himself for his authorities to published works. His bibliography is good, but he seems not to have examined the extensive transcripts from Portuguese records at Lisbon made for the India Office by Mr. F. C. Danvers. Any opportunity to test the period from contemporary sources should have been eagerly welcomed. Portugal's stately epic of the Lusiad has cast a glamour over the crude facts of her Indian supremacy, and in many Portuguese historians the chief persons of the drama loom dimly in a semi-mythical atmosphere, heroic figures performing feats of super-human valour, fighting, burning, and slaying on the far off Indian seas. The narrative is carried down to the year 1550, and from that period Mr. Whiteway dates the final decline of the Portuguese. Signs of decay had already made their appearance, corruption reigned supreme, offices were sold to the highest bidder, and piracy became the ordinary avocation of the needy adventurer. From time to time some viceroy more vigorous than his predecessors effected a temporary improvement, but after D. João de Castro, who resigned in 1550, there followed a series of Governors whose names "are but the milestones that mark the progress along the dismal path of degeneration."

PHILOSOPHY.

Friedrich Nietzsche's GENEALOGY OF MORALS AND POEMS, translated respectively by W. A. Haussmann and John Gray (Unwin, 8s. 6d. n.), form the first volume of the English translation of his collected works. Though in Germany Nietzsche is a prime intellectual force, public opinion in our country has not yet made up its mind whether his writing is madness with a streak of genius or genius with a streak of madness. On reading the dithyrambs at the end of the present volume one inclines to the former judgment; on reading parts of the Genealogy, to the latter. Thanks largely to Mr. Havelock Ellis' brilliant essay in his recent volume of Affirmations, most educated people are tolerably familiar with Nietzsche's standpoint. It is simply this: that the Christian morality of pity and brotherly kindness is a mistake; that what is excellent is individual perfection of strength and intensity of life, and that each man should pursue this ideal to the utmost of his power regardless of social checks and elaims. The object of the Genealogy of Morals is to show how the common, servile, sympathetic, Christian morality came into existence and what we are to think of it. Nietzsche's teaching consists of a few dominant ideas reiterated with extraordinary vigour and variety of expression, and the present volume is enough to give us a fair idea of his teaching as a moralist, or, as he would have preferred to term himself, an immoralist. Needless to say, its tendency is intensely repugnant to all the orderly and law-abiding traditions of English life and thought. And, all prejudice apart, it does not seem that Nietzsche's moral paradoxes will bear the slightest cross-examination or confrontation with the facts. For all that, we cannot afford to push Nietzsche behind us. There really is something in what he has to say. His intense individualism appeals to the young world of artists who are calling out for freedom, a freedom which is often abused, but yet is necessary to the life of art. While to the sober moralists his work is suggestive inasmuch as it raises, in however a violent and paradoxical form, the question whether there is not a great discrepancy between our moral practice and our theory; whether the official morality of the churches does not lay more stress on the virtues of sympathetic emotion than the man of the world can find expedient in the conduct of life. On such topics Nietzsche at any rate makes us think; and that is perhaps the secret of his extraordinary popularity.

M. E. Récejac's Essay on the Bases of the Mystic Knowledge, translated by Sarah Carr Upton (Kegan Paul, 9s. net.), which forms part of the English and Foreign Philosophical Library, is "an attempt to make a purely rational critique of mystic knowledge, or it might be better to say, mystic experience." Its task is to select out of all the manifestations of the mystic instinct "that form least likely to vanish at the first touch of pure Reason." The author finds in moral perfection the aim of mystic aspiration. For "Divine evidence is nothing more than moral evidence carried to its highest degree under the joint influence of symbols and holiness"; while "the union with the Absolute" to which the mystic aspires is essentially a moral union. It is failure to recognize these truths which has led to the perversions of occultism and mystic pessimism. Such is the central idea of M. Récejac's essay, and round it are grouped remarks on a great many other topics, including, of course, a criticism of the attempts of Discursive Reason to deal with that field of inner experience which mysticism claims as its own. Unfortunately, the exposition and development of M. Récejac's work is not equal to its main conception. The style is extremely obscure, and the comments on matters of general philosophical interest are not very suggestive or convincing. But it is a disadvantage common to his school of thought that, relying upon inner personal experience, it is the less able to appeal to those who have no large measure of such experience.

GUIDE BOOKS.

If we do not review Murray's Handbook for Warwickshire (Murray, 6s.) at length it must not be inferred that the subject is of no great interest or that the author has executed his task in an indifferent fashion. Quite the reverse would be the truth. It has often been a matter of surprise to us that Mr. Murray has so long left Warwickshire of all the counties of England untouched in his inimitable series of county handbooks. We have gone carefully through the book and find but few matters to remark on, it being needless at this time of day to explain the principles upon which Mr. Murray's handbooks are constructed. In treating of the town of Stratford-on-Avon, so rich in its Shakespearean associations, we notice with some surprise that the editor describes without a word of criticism the well-known "Shakespeare Memorial," merely speaking of it as a "Gothic building." This appears to be hardly correct in any sense, but "Gothic" or not, it seems to many people out of keeping with all the surroundings and history of Stratford, which are Tudor or Elizabethan in the highest degree. It is not stated in connexion with Stratford Church whether the proposal (of doubtful expediency) seriously made some years ago of re-erecting the organ in the nave over the chancel arch has been carried out. The maps and plans are excellent, and Mr. Murray has been well advised in deciding, as he seems to have done, to introduce into all the new editions of his English handbooks maps based on Bartholomew's beautiful $\frac{1}{2}$ -inch map of England. In this connexion we may, however, remark that it is not brought home to the eye that the Moreton and Shipston Tramway has been converted into a railway and is now an integral part of the G.W.R. system.

Baedeker's NORTHERN ITALY (Baedeker, 8 marks) has reached an "eleventh remodelled edition," containing twenty-five maps and thirty-five plans. It is very good (as Baedeker's guides invariably are), but we can draw the attention of the editor to certain ways of making it better still. The Alpine department is weak. For such places as Macugnaga the traveller is referred to the handbook to Switzerland—a work which he is unlikely to have with him if he is approaching Monte Rosa, as some do, from Turin. It would be kinder to print the Monte Rosa matter in both handbooks. The Vaudois country, again, is inadequately treated, getting little more than an inch of small print, whereas half a dozen pages would not be more than it deserves. It is an interesting country, for many reasons, and, until Mr. Basil Worsfold's book, "The Valley of Light," appeared the other day, trustworthy information about it was hard to get.

When Lord Macaulay proposed to visit a new holiday resort, he used to spend many busy weeks, reading every book about it that he could lay his hands on. It is an excellent example which only a few of us have the leisure or the diligence to follow. Most of us have to be content with one book, giving the net result of another man's wide reading; and, for the use of such, the glorified guide-book has been invented. HOLLAND AND THE HOLLANDERS, by David S. Meldrum (Blackwood, 6s.), is a book of this sort, and as good a book of the sort as we are acquainted with. It is not a history and it is not an itinerary; it supersedes neither Motley on the one hand nor Baedeker on the other. But, to the intelligent tourist, it will prove an invaluable supplement to those admirable works, giving a clear and vivid picture of the Holland of to-day, a detailed account of the fight against the invading waters, and of the life of the people in every class of society. The author's accuracy is nothing less than remarkable. We have searched his paper diligently for mistakes, and have only succeeded in finding one—and that a trifling one. According to Mr. Meldrum, the beef in Holland is bad, but is admirably cooked. Our own experience is that the Dutch serve their beef so nearly raw that it is almost impossible for an Englishman to form any opinion of its merits. But let that pass. Perhaps Mr. Meldrum has acquired a taste for steaks that are sent to table blue; or perhaps there have always been foreign cooks in the houses in which he has stayed. The inaccuracy, in any case, is not such as to impair the value of his book.

Mr. Meldrum may have been right in leaving his readers to go to Motley for the story of the Spanish Wars; but one would have appreciated a chapter on the English in Holland—Sir Philip Sidney, Milton, Myles Standish, Oliver Goldsmith, and the rest. This, however, is a subject large enough for a book by itself, and perhaps Mr. Meldrum means to write it. What he has written is, as far as it goes, very lucid and informing. His account of the operations of the Water Staat in particular is as good a popular exposition as need be desired. He tells us exactly how the Haarlem Meer was drained, and how it is proposed to drain the Zuider Zee, and what are the arrangements for opening the dikes at any moment in order to keep out an invader. For the energy of the Dutch in these directions he is full of admiration. But he complains that, in other directions, they are not energetic and he attributes their lack of enterprise to the excessive influence of women. The passage is worth quoting.

Her husband and children and house are the Dutchwoman's only concerns. To make the house comfortable for the husband is her chief end in life, and so eminently does she succeed that he is never happy out of it. Her affectionate care cajoles him from his ambitions. . . . Woman's triumph is complete. Without putting a foot in his realm she entices him into hers. . . . Thus everything confirms the Dutchman in a safe and uneventful life.

There certainly could be no more salient example of the Aristotelian doctrine that virtue is in a mean, and that excess of what appears to be virtue may have deplorable effects.

TRANSFIGURED.

Love took the sordid clay,
 She pierced its grossness as with lustral fire,
 Fashioned a spirit from the common earth
 And crowned him lord and king with tears and mirth :
 Love took the sordid clay
 And shaped it to the god of her desire.

Then, ere he could resign
 His white divinity and fall away
 From that ineffable, ideal height
 Whereto he had been lifted by Love's might :
 Ere he could so resign
 His godhead and return again to clay,

Death took the god of Love—
 The god that was but man ashine with gleams
 From inner fires that Love's own hand supplied—
 And made him deathless who might else have died :
 Death took the god of Love,
 And shrined him in the heaven of her dreams.

A. ST. JOHN ADCOCK.

Among my Books.

WHAT TOM BROWN READS.

I stand, this May morning, in a library which is my own and yet not my own ; it is true that in a merely legal sense it is mine. I rent the house of which it forms a part ; the books, furniture, pictures, and apparatus are bought with my money. I may put my head in as I pass, even stand and talk for a few minutes, conscious of the indulgent geniality of its inmates. But were I to protract my stay, I am well aware that on my departure even my best friends would observe, "What a bore my tutor is!" and "I hope to goodness he is not going to behave as if this was his room!"

This is my boys' library. It contains many shelves of well-thumbed books in strong repulsive bindings ; a few folding chairs ; a table honeycombed with incised names ; a small billiard-table, much mended, and guarded by stringent regulations ; many bound volumes of ancient illustrated papers ; innumerable dailies and weeklies purchased by subscription. The living furniture of the place varies from three to a dozen sturdy youths, who read, write, talk, play with extraordinary good humour, in a noise which would distract more elderly nerves. Though it is nominally open to all boys above a certain standing in the house, there are unwritten laws, mysteriously made and faithfully obeyed, which determine exactly the favoured few who really use the room ; and an intruder, however legal his status, is received with such grim disfavour, such chilling silence, that there is little temptation to insist on rights in the matter. But one privilege belongs to all the boys in the house from top to bottom—to take out books for the prescribed period, and at stated hours.

To what extent is this privilege made use of? What, in fact, does Tom Brown read? Indeed, does he read at all?

A literary man was driving with a venerable peer, famed for skill in horsemanship—Γεφύριος ἰπποῦρα Νέικτωρ—when the steed gave an awkward wriggle. The man of the pen observed, with miserable geniality, "The horse is a fearful animal, as Mr. Pinchbold said." "Who is he?" said the venerable peer. "Why, he's the man in 'A Cruise upon Wheels.'" "Oh, a book?" said his lordship, grimly, "I don't like books."

Such, many would have us believe, is the attitude adopted by the barbarians, young and old, of the English upper class towards literature generally. Tom Brown is supposed to be a boy nullius in libri. I have been for fifteen years a master at Eton, and believe this to be an entire mistake. I have mild literary tastes myself, and have kept my eyes and ears open for traces of similar tastes among my boys, and my deliberate belief is that the boys of this generation read more, and that more boys read, than used to be the case when I was myself an Eton boy twenty years ago.

Books are now a part of the normal furniture of life for the ordinary schoolboy ; they are a source of leisurely enjoyment which plays a large part in nearly every boy's life. On the long winter evening when fagging is over, and tea has been cleared away, and the serious events of the day—such as the house-match or the game—discussed point by point, and next day's work completed, and a little genial scuffling done, to relapse into the easiest of chairs to read till the supper bell rings is for most boys the natural and agreeable thing to do. I remember—and I can lay no claim to a precocious boyhood—how often I lay extended at full length on one of the deal tables of the library, with the gas lights glaring on the bare boards, and the panelling with its painted lists of school honours, with the great courtyard silent without, immersed in some story of Scott or Dickens or Lytton, till the clanging clock recalled me with a curious wrench and gasp from a world which had grown in that hour so far more real than the world of life. That breathless poignancy is year by year more markedly withdrawn : but there is many a boy who can slip, at the rustle of Prospero's pages, into a bigger world than that bounded by football fields and pupil rooms. And yet there are those who are found to say that the pursuit of the romantic in a book unfits for the commonplace realities of life : a pestilent heresy ! Life is a pill that wants some gilding—and most of all for the young : disillusionment is often the herald of grosser visitants ; and a boy fed by the thought of romantic deeds, and the gracious carriage of seemly persons, is far more likely to desire to be seemly and gracious himself, to put some fire into life, than the boy whose horizon extends no further than the Sportsman and the School Chronicle. At Eton, only one boy that I can call to mind is, and has been, unable to derive the faintest interest from printed matter. He has been known to look into a Lillywhite ; but an attempt to make him pledge himself to read "Treasure Island" ended in failure at the fifteenth page—"and even by that time," he said cheerfully, "I didn't know what it was all about." The hero of my tale makes up by good humour, shrewdness, and great athletic dis-tion for his deficiency in intellectual curiosity. Still, it is a trait regarded by other boys as both exceptional and unintelligible.

Though literature happens to be my own hobby, and though an absence of all intellectual curiosity in a boy seems to me to portend an old age tedious to himself and insupportable to his family, yet I have long held literature to be one only of many legitimate sources of amusement, to be in no sense a duty, and not necessarily productive of a manly and sensible view of life. It certainly appears to me, as hobbies go, the most prudent and far-reaching investment from an investor's point of view. But it is not every one who has a natural appreciation of style, to whom a well-placed epithet or an unerring noun is as keen a pleasure as a long drive or a delicate put is to an ardent golfer. If the taste is there it is a thing to thank God for and enjoy; not a distinction which confers a right to a sense of superiority over one's fellow creatures, any more than a relish for certain kinds of meat.

If, then, it is granted that the habit of reading does exist among boys, we may pass on to the less important question of what they read. I am not one who would wish to set before boys a very high standard in the matter of reading. If the habit, the craving, is once created, the added years, the insensible alterations of tastes, occupations and ambitions, will bring about a change in the subject-matter of reading.

Fiction is the natural food of the young mind; and, if that is cut off, in nine cases out of ten the impulse is hardly strong enough to survive. My experience is that Mr. Henty is the most popular author among younger boys at public schools; many boys have a shelf of Henty—delightful books in their bright and tasteless binding, every plot with a wholesome resemblance to every other, where the hero is a boy who holds the keys of the situation, and makes attached friends of the great generals and politicians of history, and no wonder:—"Quod novum ridet tenerumque captat lumina vulgi."

Much that is wide of the mark is talked about the pernicious effect of magazine literature. I have times without number been attracted, in a boys' room, by the sight of one of the many illustrated modern magazines which do, for many boys, form the staple of their reading. I declare I cannot see the slightest objection to the practice. Indeed, I would go further and say that I think it a wholesome form of reading. It is comminuted knowledge, it is true, but extends a boy's horizon all the same. He gets, in the compass of a single number, straightforward stories of adventure, descriptions of foreign countries, of eminent persons, of current politics, of natural curiosities, of manufacturing processes, all admirably illustrated. I cannot see in what these books differ from the old Penny and Saturday magazines that our grandfathers use to praise as the origin of so much useful general knowledge, except that they are better written, more interesting, and infinitely better illustrated. As boys get older their tastes vary; a few devour all books; one pupil of mine, aged fourteen, told his mother that he was "so fond of erotic poetry." Another has a taste for personal memoirs, another for history, another for old plays. One delights in travels, another in natural history. Henty and "Mr. Sponge's Sporting Tour" give place to Dickens and Thackeray; yet, strange to say, so strong is the sense of decorum in boyhood that when I held a plébiscite, and made some twenty of my upper pupils vote on English authors, Walter Scott headed the list without a competitor.

If I am asked why, if this taste for reading be so firmly implanted in boys, it so seldom survives the education of a public school—why an education professedly literary should produce a type so little addicted to literature in after life—my answer would be that we do not cultivate it sufficiently. The complicated grammar which we instil is an admirable training in exactness, an admirable lesson in the art of performing conscientiously a mental operation from which all mental enjoyment is subtracted. But no one can pretend that a masterpiece of literature treated grammatically could retain pleasurable associations for tender wits. Imagine a lesson in "Treasure Island" which entailed all the nouns being parsed viva voce and all the verbs on paper. Similarly, who that reads Xenophon in small doses three days a week on alternate weeks could guess that the Anabasis is one of the most candid, picturesque, and interesting descriptions of a romantic campaign ever put on paper? Of course it is not to be hoped or even desired that boys will take naturally to high literature. A boy who will read Shakespeare for his own amusement is probably a remarkable boy; the ordinary Tom Brown is far more likely to be of the opinion of George III., who said to Miss Burney, "Is not Shakespeare sad stuff? only one must not say so! What, what! But is there not sad stuff?" The Ion of Euripides is no doubt a very Greek play; it contains some beautiful lines; the opening scene has high imaginative beauty; but the plot after all differs little from that of Wilkie Collins' "Dead Secret," except that it is brought out with an intolerable tediousness. No one would maintain the hypothesis that the "Dead Secret" was higher literature than the "Ion." Yet no one would inwardly approve of the boy who preferred Euripides to Collins for private reading. "We're doing Euripides with my tutor," said Smith minor at breakfast in company with Jones minor, at one of my colleagues' houses. "It's awfully hard—and it's harder still when we've construed all we've learnt, and my tutor goes on construing it. I never can make out what it's all about!" "You don't mean you want to?" said Jones minor, with scorn and derision.

There the matter lies; the thing cannot be forced at all. The habit is the thing; no harm is done if knowledge is secretly introduced, so long as it is introduced without spoiling the flavour. As Charles Lamb wrote to Coleridge in 1802, "Mrs. Barbauld's and Mrs. Trimmer's nonsense lay in piles about. Knowledge insignificant and vapid as Mrs. Barbauld's books convey, it seems, must come to a child in the shape of knowledge; and his empty noddle must be turned with conceit of his own powers when he has learnt that a horse is an animal, and Billy is better than a horse, and such like, instead of that beautiful interest in wild tales, which made the child a man, while all the time he suspected himself to be no bigger than a child."

ARTHUR C. BENSON.

HUMOURS OF DICTIONARIES.

Many years ago, when the worthy pedagogue, whose weary task it was to teach me Greek, warned me against using an English-Greek lexicon for my compositions, I, naturally, bought one. Almost the first occasion on which I used this curious work introduced me to the humour of dictionaries. For, in the midst of a frenzied endeavour to do a Greek verse, I turned up the word "sad" in my lexicon, hoping to find some Greek word that would fit into my line. I looked up "sad" and the lexicon recommended me to see under "tristful." I looked up "tristful" and was referred to "melancholy." I looked up "melancholy" and was referred again to "grave." I looked up "grave" and it said, see sepulchre. Thus I found that there is always a soul of humour in things miscalled dull. There are, in fact, just three jokes in Liddell and Scott. Or rather, there were. For in the last edition, the stupendous pun anent the explanation of the word συκοφαντης has, with miserable pusillanimity, been sacrificed. The derivation of this word as meaning "one who informed against persons exporting figs" is now no longer a "figment," but a "mere invention." Lest a similar fate should befall the other two jests we will pass them over in silence.

The work of the "Great Lexicographer" himself teems with quiet fun. Did he not define a lexicographer as a writer of dictionaries, a harmless drudge? One may fancy, however, that the Hammersmith Semiramis would hardly have appreciated that. And then there are a dozen other cases in which Dr. Johnson gave way to "capricious and humorous indulgence," as Boswell calls it. But his definitions of Tory, Whig, Patron, Pension, Oats, Excise, and Grub Street are too well known to need quotation. We will only give ourselves the pleasure of repeating one:—

Pension. An allowance made to any one without an equivalent. In England it is usually understood to mean pay given to a State hireling for treason to his country.

The humour here was, of course, intentional; but among my books there is a large French "Dixionary" which is a jest in sober earnest, something after the manner of the "English as She is Spoke," which set us all laughing some years ago. I have said that it is large; and it was, indeed, for its size that I bought it one day, when I had grown tired of those smaller works which always omit the words you want, or translate them by the words which look most like them, regardless of meaning. Some authors are very eccentric in the words they omit. Napoleon had a dictionary, I believe, in which there was no "impossible"; but I have never seen it. For two shillings, accordingly, I bought the two mighty tomes in which the voluble Chambaud interpreted the French and English languages. His volubility is his chief charm. He is never content with the skimpy allowance of one word to translate another. He is never penny-father or muck-worm (avare) with his words; he empties the whole pepper-pot. He is not a mere ignoramus; for he knows a B from a bull's-foot (Il ne fait ni A ni B); nor must you suppose that he is intentionally a buffoon, jester, Merry-Andrew, Jack-pudding, or pickle-herring (Buffon), but there is with him a certain natural bubbling-up or estuation (Bouillonnement) of words which gives him a fatal tendency towards loquacity, dicacity, tittle-tattle, chit-chat, linguacity, gibble-gabble, polylogy, prittle-prattle (Babil). He is, you perceive, a prattle-basket; his tongue is well oiled and hung; he never falters or fumbles for a word (a bon bec), but will invent one rather than cheat you of your allowance. Ask him the meaning of so light a word as Bagatelle, and he floods you with—"Trifle, trash, bawble, peppercorn, nidgeries, feather, punctilio, pimping-thing, piddling-business, fiddle-faddle stuff, toy, fiddle-stick, fig, foolery, fingle-fangle, flim-flam, kickshaw, trinket."

You say "Benet," and he answers:

Simple, oafish, booby, looby, numskull, hobby, changeling, bull-head, ninny, wise-acre, tony, ninny-hammer, noodle, nincompoop, put.

Truly, his tongue runs glibly or walks well! (Il a la langue bien affilée.) If you try a word like "abolition," will he be content to say "abolition" and have done with it? Not at all. "N'abandonnez pas les étriers. Do not quit the stirrups, but spit in your hand and hold fast," you hear him cry, and he adds:—

Abolition, extirpation, dissolution, rescision, circumduction, erasement, expunction, extinction, suppression, indemnity.

One wonders where and how he found some of his wonderful words. Had he the invention of a Rabelais or a Shakespeare in this respect? Or did he use some slang dictionary which led him into reproducing a curious medley of "low, trivial, inglorious, mechanic, putid, vulgar, pelting, despicable, shabby, humble, downward, linsey-woolsey, scurril and scurvy words" (bas)? The humour of the matter it would be difficult to explain, but I fancy it lies in his skilful collocation and ordering of words. He will not merely beat you, but he will "bang, belabour, bethump, pommel, curry, drub, thrack, swaddle, and thrash you" too (battre). Perhaps, if one knew one's own language perfectly, with all its cant and obsolete words, this master of synonyms would not "charm, queme, enravis, and eyebite" one (charmer) as he does. A lady once asked Johnson how he came to define Pastern as the knee of a horse. Instead of making an elaborate explanation, as she expected, he at once answered, "Ignorance, Madam, pure Ignorance." So, let me frankly confess, it may be due to my ignorance that Chambaud's wordsound strange in my ears and that in combination I find them ludicrous. But if that is so I boldly prefer my ignorance to philological omniscience. Omniscience, after all, must be fatal to one's sense of humour. There would be nothing funny in anything if one knew everything.

Besides the eccentricity of his words some of our author's phrases are very instinct or lively (animé). Here are some that I have noted as I have gone carelessly through or nuddled along (aller vite et négligemment) this great work (for I was always a slow lazy—un homme lent et paresseux):—

Il se pendit bien et beau. He hanged himself as round as a robin.

Une femme bise. A brown or tawny woman, waincot face. (Was he thinking of Biscuit or Boisé? The matter invites ingenuity in the elucidation! But he is always hard on women. He has the face or forehead to say (a l'audace) that Les femmes sont long temps à s'attifer—Women take a long time in setting off their heads!)

Brut. Noise, ado, lerry, fup, clap, clatter, pucker, rent. Caprice. Whim, conundrum, maggot, crochet, crinum, phantastery.

Il se fait beau garçon. He is turning out a pickled youth. Un affranchi. A freedman, a libertine, a manumised, a colibert, a denizen.

Chagriner. To grieve, to muzzle, to yearn, to wherret, to hyp.

Brilliant. Lamping, showy, lucid, nitid, relucant, pageant. Briser. Flaw, shatter, flake, craze, mangle, mammock, comminute, refract.

C'est une franche Catin. She is one of my cousins; she is one of my aunts; she is of the game; she is an arrant Betsy.

These things, indeed, are not so perfect of their kind as the "This girl have a beauty edge" or the "Not so devil as he is black" of Senhor Pedro Carolino's "New Guide of the Conversation in Portuguese and English"; but at any rate they edulcorate (adoucir) the bitterness of the labour of looking out a word. They tell me there are better dictionaries; but, with all their faults, I love and re-love (rendre amour) my shilling tomes and their author, not "for the care what we wrote him and for her typographical correction," but because after all "c'est un bon enfant, he is a good companion for a winter's evening, he is a hearty cack, an arch-blade!"

CECIL HEADLAM.

Notes.

In next week's Literature "Among My Books" will be by Mr. Goldwin Smith, who will write on Sir George Trevelyan's "American Revolution."

The committee promoting the erection of a memorial of Lord Byron in Aberdeen has decided that the memorial is to take the form of a bronze statue of the poet, some eight or nine feet high, which will be placed on a granite pedestal in front of the grammar school where Byron received most of his early education. He had previously been at an educational establishment bearing the grandiloquent title of "Mr. Bower's English School"—really a hovel in the Long-acre of Aberdeen, kept by a certain Mr. Bodsey Bower, and at the age of seven was sent to the grammar school, where he attended till he succeeded to the title.

The performance by the Elizabethan Stage Society of Edward FitzGerald's adaptation of Calderon's famous play, Life's a Dream, announced for Monday evening next, May 15th, at St. George's Hall, is arousing a good deal of interest. The Spanish Ambassador has given his patronage, in view of the fact that this is the first time that a play by Calderon has ever been put upon the English stage. Life's a Dream, the most celebrated of all Calderon's writings, has been translated into many languages and performed with success on almost every stage in Europe. Miss Margaret Halstan will take the part of Segismund, the Boy Prince; Mr. Ernest Meade will be the King, and Mr. Arthur Broughton Clotardo. Edward FitzGerald's adaptation differs in many ways from the Spanish original, and the dialogue has been entirely re-written. The play will be acted without the aid of scenic effects, and there will be no waits between the scenes. Mr. William Poel, the director of the Elizabethan Stage Society, is superintending the performance.

A correspondent writes:—

At this season of the year the papers are full of art criticism; it is interesting to remember that Sir Joshua Reynolds had a book of Press cuttings just like any self-conscious modern. He had the scraps bound up with his copy of Robert Strange's pamphlet on "The Rise and Establishment of the Royal Academy of Arts," where one can still refer to them and see what early art criticism was like. Here, for example, is a trenchant estimate of Gainsborough:—

"Who, for instance, views a painting of Mr. Gainsborough but must acknowledge that he throws a dash of the purple with every colour from his pencil? Which must proceed either from his not cleaning it sufficiently, or from a reflection from the purple colour of his eye. I remember having seen a portrait by him of a certain nobleman, remarkable for the sobriety of his life, and who was never known to have been drunk; but his lordship having naturally a very florid complexion, the addition of Mr. Gainsborough's purple to the colour of his nose and his cheeks will probably make him pass with posterity as the damndest drunken dog that ever lived."

Nor is Sir Joshua himself more gently handled. The critic thus addresses him:—

"I cannot help taking notice of a fashion which your portraits have helped to introduce, called the Vandyke manner of wearing the hair. It certainly saves the trouble of painting the likeness of the forehead of a child, to bring down the hair almost to the eyes; but I maintain it to be a most barbarous taste, to conceal the finest feature of the face and make every boy and girl look like a wild bull. If to give the face the look of surly pride be your aim, continue combing down the hair. If you want to express innocence and simplicity, part the hair at the top of the forehead and let it gradually separate as it falls down to the ear. But if you desire to behold an open, noble countenance, that detests all pride, show the forehead in all its glory, and let not the neighbouring nations of Europe continue to our children the character of ferocity and pride, under the ridiculous figurative appellation of a John Bull."

Mr. Anthony Hope Hawkins was certainly the right witness to give evidence before the Select Committee of the House of Lords on the clause of the Copyright Bill dealing with the anonymous or pseudonymous publication of books; and his protest against the proposal to cut down the copyright of works so issued to a term of thirty years will be endorsed by every author. There is no more reason in the nature of things for mulcting an anonymous writer than for mulcting a firm of solicitors or merchants which, for one cause or another, trades in a name which is not that of the actual partners in the business. As Mr. Hawkins pointed out, effective anonymity is a thing that has practically ceased to exist. The author of "Democracy" is, we believe, the only author of a book that has made a stir in recent times whose identity has never been discovered; and even he (or she) would probably have been dragged to light if his (or her) personality had been as widely interesting as that of "Junius." In cases of breach of copyright, it would be necessary, for obvious reasons, for the anonymous writer to disclose himself in order to obtain redress; otherwise the door would be open to impersonation. But it is equally clear that there is nothing in this fact to justify the restriction of his right to his literary property. It is quite enough to leave such a man to decide for himself whether he prefers to keep his secret or to vindicate his claims.

To the Atlantic Monthly Mr. Edmund Gosse contributes some recollections of "Orion" Horne. Few poets have had careers so extraordinarily varied. He served as a volunteer in the Mexican War of Independence; coming home across the continent on foot, he visited the Mohawks, the Oneidas, and the Hurons, and bathed in public under the cataract of Niagara; he was wrecked in the St. Lawrence; he quelled a mutiny on a timber ship in mid-Atlantic; he published a poem at the price of a farthing; he sub-edited Household Words; he incurred the wrath of Miss Mitford, who "declared that he had used her hospitable dining room to propose to a lady (with £60,000 a year) at lunch, and to another (with £40,000 a year) at tea"; he went to Australia and commanded the gold escort; he also "flung himself into the cultivation of the cochineal insect, edited a Victorian newspaper, became Commissioner of Waterworks, gave lessons in gymnastics, professed the art of natation, and was one of the starters of Australian wine-growing." At the age of seventy he "persuaded the captain of a ship to tie his legs together and fling him into the sea, and swam with ease to the boat."

In his old age he was very poor, and it was in his old age that Mr. Gosse knew him. The picture is well drawn:—

It was from 1876 to 1879 that we saw him most frequently. He was living at this time in two rooms in Northumberland-street, Regent's Park, in very great poverty, which he bore with the gayest and most gallant insouciance. An attempt was made—indeed, several attempts were made—to secure for him a little pension from the Civil List, and these were supported by Carlyle and Browning, Tennyson and Swinburne, to name no smaller fry. But all in vain; for some reason, absolutely inscrutable to me, these efforts were of no avail. It was darkly said that Mr. Gladstone would never, never yield; and he never did. When Lord Beaconsfield came into office, he granted the poor little old man £50 a year, but even then he had not too much food to eat nor clothes to keep him warm. Still he went bravely on, shaking his white ringlets, and consoling himself with his guitar. He was fond of mystery, which is a great consolator. For economy's sake he used to write on post-cards, but always with a great deal of care, so that the postman should be none the wiser. I have such a post-card before me now; it is an answer to a proposal of mine that he should come in and take dinner with us:—

"Nov. 29, 1877.

"The Sharpshooter's friendly shot just received. By adroitly porting my helm, and hauling out my flying-jib, I shall, by 7 o'clock this evening, be able to get the weather-gauge of the Cape I was bound for, and run into your Terrace.

Thine,

REEFER."

Nothing, surely, could be more discreet than that.

Mr. J. Henry Quinn has performed a useful service in writing a "Manual of Library Cataloguing," which is published by the Library Supply Company (5s. n.). The subject is not, perhaps, quite so recondite as librarians are apt to think. But it presents more difficulties than the average ignorant person is aware of, and it saves trouble to have the rules formulated instead of learning them by slow experience or thinking them out by a desperate intellectual effort. We doubt, however, the wisdom of Mr. Quinn's decision that a classified is to be preferred to a dictionary catalogue. The most useful catalogue in the world is Mr. Portescue's famous subject index, and the arrangement there is purely alphabetical. It is practically impossible to classify human knowledge, and, when the heroic attempt is made, there is no guarantee that the man who uses the catalogue is accustomed to the same classification as the man who compiled it. As we said once before, when discussing this vexed subject, the most erudite can hardly determine whether bacteriology is a branch of botany, zoology, or medicine; but the dullest student can look out bacteriology in an alphabetical index and find the books he wants.

A good subject index is certainly a desirable addition to a library; but in the case of small libraries—libraries, let us say, of less than 10,000 volumes—is it so absolutely indispensable as librarians sometimes maintain? A minimum of subject indexing can always be done in the course of compiling the general catalogue; while the earnest student of any particular subject—a comparatively rare person—can either make his own subject index or get the help of the librarian's assistant. This may not be the ideal method, but, when expense has to be considered, it would answer well enough for all practical purposes. Searching a catalogue of ten thousand volumes does not take much longer than reading a novel. At the British Museum readers often take a good deal more trouble than that in working up the bibliography of a difficult subject from Bouchier de la Richarderie, or Quérard, or some similar work of reference.

Mr. A. G. Reid in his "Annals of Auchterarder and Memorials of Strathearn," just published, throws some light on the origin of the familiar Scottish rhyme about a certain "terrible parish" which has long puzzled antiquarians and others, and the explanations given are generally more ingenious than convincing. One version runs:—

O, what a parish, what a terrible parish,

O, what a parish is that of Dunkell!

They hae hangit the minister, drooned the precentor,
Dung doon the steeple, an' drucken the bell!

Though the steeple was down the kirk was still stannin',

They biggit a barn where the bell used to hang;

A stell-pat they gat, an' they brewed Hieland whisky,
On Sundays they drank it, an' rantit, an' sang.

Another version gives Kinkell instead of Dunkell. On behalf of Kinkell tradition says that its bell was sold to the parish of Cockpen—and the proceeds "drucken." Mr. Reid shows that the Kinkell bell was certainly sold to Cockpen, but he cannot find any proof of the charge that its custodians drank the price.

A correspondent writes:—

There is an historical blunder in the statement which has been issued by the local committee in charge of the scheme for the enlargement and development of the old grammar school at Huntingdon in which Oliver Cromwell received much of his education. It is stated that the school was founded in 1187 "by David, Earl of Huntingdon (the Sir Kenneth of 'The Talisman'), who afterwards became King of Scotland, and from whom our own Royal Family are directly descended." The committee is in error in two particulars. David never was king, and our Royal Family is not descended from him. Scott in his novel refers to David quite correctly as "Earl of Huntingdon, Prince Royal of Scotland;" but, as a matter of fact, the Prince never came to the throne. He predeceased his father, William I. (the Lion), who was succeeded in 1214 by David's younger brother, Alexander II., the father of the monarch whose marriage with the Princess Margaret of England led eventually to the union of the Crowns.

The most notable feature in the Butterfly is a poem on "Hereditry," by Mr. Adrian Ross; and the most remarkable thing about the poem is the dashing originality of the metre.

The poet boldly ventures on rhymes four syllables long. In this way:—

Give the rein to idleness, and let the weed of folly flower,
Cultivate the naughty rose, and cut the moral cauliflower!
Do not blame the sluggard if a week or so in bed he tarry;
Sleeping is hereditary—nothing but hereditary.

And again:—

So you see heredity must always be a valid answer
When a monarch manifests a weakness for a ballet dancer;
When a noble lord behaves in style that would discredit 'Arry,
That must be hereditary—nothing but hereditary.

We speak subject to correction, but we believe this is really a new departure in the matter of rhyme.

The Socialist authorities of Tours seem to have been somewhat misjudged in their attitude towards a Balzac centenary. It was a Socialist, M. Fournière, who has just proposed in the Chamber that the ashes of Balzac should be transferred to the Panthéon. The dispute over the statue of Balzac by M. Rodin, of which we gave an account a year ago, had just been revived by the exhibition at this year's Salon of the new statue by M. Falguières, which has pleased public opinion no more than the other. The appearance, therefore, at the tribune of a deputy to propose the apotheosis of the author of "Père Goriot" was not a surprise. But M. Fournière's appeal on behalf of a writer whom the reactionaries had tried to monopolize as an ardent Catholic caused comment. "Honoré de Balzac," said the Socialist deputy, "belongs to no party. He belongs to France."

"Rodin," Mr. Arthur Symons tells us in the Fortnightly Review, "is the first man who has completely understood Balzac." This essay is one of two very interesting articles on the novelist which appear in this month's magazines, the other being by Mr. Garrett Fisher in the Cornhill. The latter has one or two curious stories, showing how to Balzac the persons of his novels were the only really living persons. Mr. Arthur Symons has much suggestive criticism. He continues the sentence we have just quoted thus:—

It has taken Rodin ten years to realize his own conception. France has refused the statue in which a novelist is represented as a dreamer, to whom Paris is not so much Paris as Patmos; "the most Parisian of our novelists," Frenchmen assure you. It is a hundred years this month since Balzac was born: a hundred years is a long time in which to be misunderstood with admiration.

The novels of Balzac [Mr. Symons says] are full of electric fluid. To take up one of them is to feel the shock of life, as one feels it on touching certain magnetic hands. To turn over volume after volume is like wandering through the streets of a great city, at that hour of the night when human activity is at its full.

The French papers have been full of souvenirs of Balzac for some time past. The most remarkable is by M. Adolphe Brisson, who has given to the "interview" so artistic a literary form. The interviewer is the octogenarian playwright, M. Eugene Cormon, who saw a great deal of Balzac from 1838 to 1840, when the latter was living at Jardies, near Ville d'Avray.

M. Cormon had just been introduced into the master's study. The latter did not deign to look round. He seemed absorbed in a painful task requiring all his efforts. Seated at his table, his shirt collar wide open, his braces down, he was covering a paper with minute hieroglyphics. M. Cormon advanced and discreetly coughed. But this timid appeal not having been heard, he stopped, frightened, and, holding his breath, amused himself by looking round the room.

There was nothing very attractive. There were common seats, spotted with ink, encumbered with papers, printers' proofs, and books in disorder. On the walls he discerned strange inscriptions chalked in: Here a picture by Raphael; Here a Goblin tapestry; Here a stylabate of cedar; Here mouldings, Trianon style. The great man had not had the leisure to procure these works of art, but he had marked their places. M. Cormon, more and more surprised, sat down respectfully on the corner of a sofa, and opened his newspaper. Twenty minutes passed. Finally, Balzac decided to throw down his pen.

"What, is it you?" he exclaimed pleasantly. "You are going to share my omelette. No, no, I won't accept a refusal."

He fancied ingenuously that his guest had fallen from the clouds. M. Cormon did not take offence. He excused himself, but Balzac enthusiastically took him out into his garden, showing him in detail the stones and shrubs. He then brought him back to the dining room, decorated, like the study, with hypothetical panels. . . . Finally, the teapots were brought in, and Balzac became grave. "Coffee and tea," said he, "are the best friends of the man of letters. . . . As for the tea," Balzac put a finger on his lips, and going to a cupboard drew out a carefully tied up package. He undid it with infinite precautions, borrowed from it a pinch of yellow leaves having the delicacy and colour of eastern tobacco. "This tea," he resumed, "is sacred, almost divine. It comes from the palace of the Emperor of China. Virgins gather it with their hands and bring it to him in attitudes of worship. Every winter this sovereign sends some boxes of it to the Tsar of Russia, his brother. One of the bales was obtained by Baron von Humboldt, who has kindly done me the homage of it."

How suggestive is the anecdote! In Balzac it would be difficult to say where dream left off and where real life began.

As far back as October 30th, 1897, we expressed the hope that Professor Texte's "Jean Jacques Rousseau and the Cosmopolitan Spirit in Literature" should as soon as possible be translated into English. It appeared as long ago as 1896, and we have, from time to time, alluded to the results of his inquiries into the reciprocal influence of French and English literatures. We need not, therefore, introduce Professor Texte to readers of Literature, or attempt to define at length the extreme utility of his work. It is remarkably well translated by Mr. J. W. Matthews (Duckworth, 7s. 6d.), to whom we owe certain corrections and verifications as well. But M. Texte himself, furthermore, has also improved his book by fresh notes. Researches of this sort can never be entirely completed. The construction of a book of this sort is analogous to the growth of a coral island: it proceeds by the slow piling-up of minute facts, and new discoveries are always possible.

Thus M. Texte writes of the influence upon Rousseau of the author of "Hudibras." Here is a curious proof M. Texte might have adduced, if he had only chanced upon it, of Rousseau's acquaintance with Butler's mock-epic. The "Dictionnaire Social et Patriotique" (Amsterdam, 1770) contains (page 488) the following:—

There is to be found in a collection of verses, entitled "L'Ami des Muses," which appeared in 1759, a poem by Rousseau, entitled "L'Allée de Sylvie." He therein announces his future melancholy in these terms:—

On verra la Philosophie
Naitre de la nécessité;
On me verra par jalousie
Prêcher mes caduques vertus;
Et souvent blâmer par envie
Les plaisirs que je n'aurai plus.

Here surely we have:—

Compound for sins they are inclin'd to
By damning those they have no mind to.

Allon, in his "Essai sur l'Universalité de la Langue Française," as well as M. Texte, insists on the importance of Hudibras in Towneley's translation, which appeared in 1757, but neither of them has noted this apparent proof of Rousseau's knowledge of Butler.

Again, M. Texte might have found in the "Lettres de l'Abbé Morellet," reviewed on another page, a precious store of matter in illustration. In the discussion of the use of the word "cosmopolite" it is pertinent to note the following from Morellet's letter of March 12th, 1776:—

Voilà toujours ma politique cosmopolite, my lord; quoique vous soyez, à mon avis, un peu trop national je suis persuadé qu'elle ne vous déplaira pas, et je crois que vous y reviendrez. Hélas! c'est bien faite de ce cosmopolitisme que votre gouvernement se conduit d'une manière si absurde et si injuste envers les Américains. Vos ministres, &c. . . .

M. Texte shows us Voltaire abusively belabouring poor Letourneur as the type of the Anglomaniacs, for his efforts to introduce Frenchmen to Shakespeare. Here is a letter from that arch-Anglomaniac, equally odious to Voltaire, the Abbé just mentioned, in which he refers to Letourneur's translation. It is really a partial excuse for Voltaire's explosion of jealousy:—

M. Suard vous parlera d'une traduction de Shakespeare, dont nous sommes bien mécontents tous les deux. Nous mériterions bien mieux le nom de barbares que nous vous donnons si libéralement, si nous étions contents de voir votre grand Shakespeare ainsi défiguré. Mais soyez sûrs que les gens de goût qui connoissent l'original sont indignés, et que ceux qui ne le connoissent pas le sont aussi du mauvais françois des traducteurs, qui n'écrivent pas dans notre langue, mais dans je ne sais quel jargon calqué sur les expressions de la vôtre, sans grâce, sans vérité, sans simplicité, et contre toutes les lois de la syntaxe et du goût. Le pauvre Garrick sera furieux.

And the Abbé suggests that the celebrated actor should challenge a member of the firm of translators, Comte de Catullan, to a duel for this insult to the memory of the great poet. Constant readers of French eighteenth century literature can thus supplement M. Texte's documents by others. His book is an epoch-making book, and English readers will welcome it with the same intelligent appreciation as French readers have done. It is interesting to note that M. Texte is now writing an important preface for an "Essai de bibliographie des questions de littérature comparée," to be published soon by Dr. Louis Betz, an American professor at Zurich.

Another translation from the French which will receive a wide welcome is the English edition, now published by Mr. Fisher Unwin (21s.), of M. Jusserand's "Shakespeare in France under the Ancien Régime." We reviewed the book very fully on December 10 of last year, and we note that the absence of an index, to which we called attention, is now supplied. The book can be warmly commended to all lovers of literature as throwing a flood of light on a department of literary history hitherto too much neglected.

An "International Congress of Comparative Literature" is being prepared for the Paris Exhibition of 1900. It is the first of its kind, and nothing could be more characteristic of our time. We shall return to the subject later, giving further details.

Writers who sell their books to publishers without submitting their MSS. for approval will find food for reflection in the report of the case of the "Imperial Press (Limited) v. Johnson." The plaintiff was sued for damages because a book which he had written for the defendant company contained errors. Though he was only called upon to pay a shilling, the inaccurate may well feel the precedent alarming—the more so as the Lord Chief Justice instructed the jury to consider the "cumulative effect" of blunders trivial in themselves. On this principle historians as eminent as Froude and Carlyle might have been mulcted heavily if their works had not happened to hit the public taste; while the historical novelist who is guilty of anachronisms, and the religious novelist who appoints a deacon to a Bishopric, and the lady novelist who, dropping into French, gives us nom de plume and bon riveur and à l'outrance, may well tremble in their shoes. So long as their books sell they will, of course, be safe; but when the demand for their works of genius slackens it may well be held that the magnitude of their "advances" imposes a correspondingly high standard of composition, and even such little matters as an historic present or a nominativus pendens may be brought up against them, with disastrous consequences, in a Court of Law.

A copy of a curious newspaper has been found in the French national archives. It is dated January 9, 1808, and is called L'Athénée des Dames. The articles are evidently written by women, and the object of the paper seems to have been an attempt to place women on an equal footing with men. The feminine pioneers of 1808 were evidently nearly a hundred years in advance of their times. La Fronde, the Parisian newspaper written, printed, and published by women, is now in its third year and appears to be successful, whilst only one copy of L'Athénée des Dames is to be found. By a strange irony this unsuccessful feminine paper was published in the Rue Gît-le-Cœur.

There are several books by the old Tudor printer, Thomas Berthelet, to be found in the last catalogue of second-hand books issued by Messrs. Maggs, Church-street, Paddington. Not so long ago books from Berthelet's workshop could be procured with comparative ease, but since it became fashionable to collect black-letter books, examples from his press have become scarce. Berthelet was a man of considerable note in his day, for, besides being the King's printer, he was one of the original members of the Stationers' Company. From contemporary records he appears to have been employed a good deal in the printing of statutes. His printing is not, however, distinguished by fine qualities, his Gothic types being heavy and dull. Besides printing, Berthelet also bound his own books, and it is interesting to compare his early with his later work. The former bears all the marks of its foreign origin, but his later bindings form excellent examples of what is known as the "Tudor" style, which owes its popularity more to Berthelet than to any other contemporary printer. A record dated 1543 contains an account rendered to the King, Henry VIII., for an abridgment of the statutes, printed by Berthelet and "gorgeously bounde" in his workshop, for which a charge of 5s. is made. Berthelet appears to have carried on business for many years at the "Lucretia Romana," in Fleet-street, and a record of the Stationers' Company shows that he died early in 1556.

At the sales held at Sotheby's at the end of last week the early Italian printers seemed to be at a discount, for some very good Aldines were disposed of for a few shillings each. The most conspicuous example was a small folio volume from the press of Baptista de Tortis, dated Venice, 1481, examples of whose work are very rare; probably there are not at present a dozen genuine copies in Europe. This volume consisted of a collected edition of Cicero, magnificently printed, and in excellent condition. The dignified old volume, in its oaken boards, bearing well its centuries of age, certainly deserved a better fate than to be sold for 11s. In exact contrast to the typographical splendour of this book were two "dumpy twelves," one a translation of Boccaccio, printed by "A. Jeffes for T. Woodcocke," 1587, an ill-conditioned black-letter volume in paper covers, which fetched £11; the other was the rare 1648 Edinburgh edition of "The Life and Acts of the Most Victorious Conqueror, Robert Bruce," a very inferior copy, which sold for £15 15s. The other important books included in the sales were Dugdale's "Monasticon Anglicanum," 8 vols., 1817-30, £21; several fine county histories—viz., Blomefield and Parkin, "Topographical History of the County of Norfolk," 11 vols., 1805-10, £20 10s.; Hasted, "History and Topographical Survey of the County of Kent," 4 vols., 1778-99, £19; Lipscombe, "History and Antiquities of the County of Buckingham," 4 vols., 1847, £16; Shaw, "History and Antiquities of Staffordshire," 2 vols., 1798-1801, £18 10s.; Surtees, "History and Antiquities of the County Palatine of Durham," 4 vols., 1816-40, £18 10s. There was also a copy, in excellent condition, of the Moderate Intelligencer, Nos. 1 to 245, February, 1645, to October, 1649, which fetched £26.

THE MYSTERY OF "THE VIRGINIANS."

Did John P. Kennedy write a chapter of "The Virginians," or part of one? This question is revived on the other side of the Atlantic by General James Grant Wilson, and the evidence of the late Mr. Latrobe, the friend of Kennedy, of Mr. Crawford Neilson, of Baltimore, Mr. Sydney G. Fisher, of Philadelphia, and Mr. John Samuel Fisher, of the same city, is invoked to the elucidation of the alleged puzzle. The discussion has so far been made known to English readers through the columns of the Daily Chronicle.

The testimony of the gentlemen named turns chiefly upon the good faith of those who are quoted, and on the trustworthiness of the memory of the quoters. There is an attempt to show that Thackeray could not have been familiar with all the facts recorded in the debated chapter (Chapter 4 of the second volume), these facts consisting of landscape descriptions of Cumberland and a trade blunder. It is further pointed out that, although Mrs. Ritchie made a half-promise to deal with the matter in her introduction to "The Virginians," at that time unpublished in the Biographical Edition, she did not carry out her intention. On the other hand, Mrs. Ritchie has declared that the original manuscript of the book is entirely in the autograph of her father. That should be conclusive; indeed, General Wilson accepts it as testimony powerful enough to necessitate the revision of Mr. Latrobe's article in "Appleton's Cyclopædia of American Biography," of which he is the editor; yet the only concession which has been made is in the ascription to Kennedy of "part" of the chapter instead of the whole of it. The question of Titmarshian touch does not appear to have weighed with the critics in any degree, nor the importance of distinguishing between contribution of information (such as Kennedy doubtless gave) and contribution of text.

But there is another point involved of still greater importance; Mrs. Ritchie hints it in her simple statement, the more significant for its simplicity—"I am sure my father wrote his own books." It is, in fact, a question of honesty and morality; and I believe it to be impossible that a man of such sensitive and punctilious honour as Thackeray could have committed a fraud upon the public simply because, as Mr. Latrobe would have us believe, he was afflicted one day with a "disinclination to supply the printer with 'copy.'" Upon this point I would ask permission to make contribution to the discussion by giving Thackeray's own views upon a literary transaction not essentially dissimilar to that here involved.

In Punch (No. 327, p. 147, vol. 13, 16th Oct., 1847) there appears an article by Thackeray, hitherto unprinted and unidentified by bibliographies, entitled "X.Y.Z." Over these initials a literary man had been persistently advertising in The Times that he would provide "any party" with "sterling poetry" or "first-rate prose." Such productions, it was implied, were at the disposal of the purchaser, who, by publishing them as his own, might secure for himself the credit of having written them. The absurdity of the proposition tickled Thackeray as prodigiously as its immorality disgusted him. He explains how application was made to "X.Y.Z." at the advertised address in the Haymarket (he says it was Mrs. Punch who did so in the name of Adelaide Bunyan—whose "volume of poesy 'Moans of the Nightwind'" still awaits the help of a Mæcenas in support of a publisher). He obtains details and terms from the advertiser, who turns out to be one Mr. Smithers, author of Rumbuski, and proceeds to comment upon them thus:—

But has he any right to do so?—that is the point. No young author has a right to go and purchase a hundred lines of sterling verse, written by a Rumbuski, and buy a claim to immortality for five pounds five. The tickets to that shop are not transferable, so to speak. It may be very well for a Smithers to throw off a few thousand sterling lines or reams of first-rate prose, and secure his own seat; but he cannot keep places for ever so many friends besides. It is not fair upon us who are struggling at the door.

No, I say; for the interest of the public this scheme must be stopped. Let us concede that Rumbuski is the greatest work of the age; that the author of that prodigy may, out of the benevolence of his disposition, and at a reasonable charge, edit the works of geniuses less accomplished; cut down a book of travels; put a little point here and there to the vague moral of a pamphlet; or help a literary dowager to grammar. These jobs are often taken in hand (for the benefit of the public, too) by men of the literary profession.

But here he must stop. . . . You may touch up a man's drawing, Smithers; but you must not do every line of it. You may put a few feathers into a jackdaw's tail, but do not send him out into the world as an accomplished peacock. It is not fair on the other jackdaws.

What?—the author of the great Rumbuski a literary smasher, and vendor of illicit coin? O, fie!

With such a code of literary morals—assuredly applicable in still greater force to a man of established reputation—and in the face of such a declaration, it is hardly likely that Thackeray would have allowed another man to strike his literary coin for him. His views of the commercial side of the issue were clear and unyielding; and he knew that when the public were paying for Thackeray they ought to have it, without Kennedy being palmed off upon them on the plea that the genuine author was “disinclined” to be honest. Besides, even if he had agreed to the irregularity, is it conceivable that he would have converted that irregularity into fraud by recopying his friend’s contribution into his own autograph? Surely, in the words of Mrs. Richmond Ritchie, “It can scarcely be necessary to contradict the assertion.” Without actually impugning the good faith of the gentlemen cited by General Wilson, some other explanation must be forthcoming.

M. H. SPIELMANN.

FICTION.

There is just a touch of old-world charm about SUNNINGHAM AND THE CURATE, by Elith A. Barnett (Chapman and Hall, 6s.), that may secure it a small circle of appreciative readers among those who have a lingering tenderness for the early Victorian period. It is evident enough that “Cranford” is the author’s model here, and perhaps it is not altogether surprising that she has partially failed in attempting to produce a picture of society in Sunningham on the same lines as Mrs. Gaskell’s masterpiece. To tell the truth, the greater part of this book suffers from too faithful a chronicling of unimportant matters: its simplicity degenerates into dulness. Towards the end things go a little more brightly. There is cleverness and pleasant sentiment about the writing, but the story is one that will appeal chiefly to a public of a reflective temperament, who like to absorb their fiction slowly, and to whom any violent excitement is distasteful. Unfortunately, readers of this kind grow fewer in number year by year.

THE GARDEN OF SWORDS, by Max Pemberton (Cassell, 6s.), is a story of the Franco-Prussian War, and the author bravely interlards his pages with scraps of French of varying degrees of accuracy. The favourite objurgation of his troopers is Sac à papier, an expression which belongs to the days of the Grande armée, and is about as convincing in the mouth of a French soldier of 1870 as “Zounds” or “Odds Fish” would be in the mouth of a contemporary English guardsman. We also have grandmère for grand’mère, and porte-étendard (in conversation) for porte-drapeau, and talkz for valse, and déjeuner (thus quaintly accented), and, as the climax, vilains Prusses for sales Prussiens. This is very near the high-water mark of the lady novelist; and the blunders are a bad blot upon a book that is otherwise by no means devoid of merit. The actual story is, indeed, cheap melodrama, and the characters are hardly individualized. But, on the other hand, bits of the fighting are very vivid, and the description of the charge of the Cuirassiers at Reichshoffen is worth all the money. Boys will appreciate the novel.

In spite of a plot which scarcely seems to lend itself to such a description CICELY VAUGHAN, by Philip Davenant (J. Long, 6s.), will be frequently described as a “sweetly pretty story.” The plot bears a somewhat striking resemblance to that of “The Confession of Stephen Whapshare.” In that powerful and depressing story it is the man who poisons an exasperating invalid. Here it is the woman who adopts the same course. It is a coincidence, doubtless, though a curious one, that the hero’s name should be Stephen. But with the name all resemblance ends. We are not roused to enthusiasm for Stephen, the curate, for whom Mr. Davenant so earnestly invites our admiration. The chief fault of the story, which is fairly well written, is its sentimentalism, a fault which a young writer may outgrow.

“It has not happened to many men, as I think, to have fallen into the hands of as cruel and bloodthirsty a monster as ever defiled God’s earth and to have escaped to tell the tale.”

So ATHELSTANE FORD, the hero of Allen Upward’s new novel (Pearson, 6s.), begins his autobiography. And on the last page he muses thus, in good old style:—“Sometimes when I walk abroad . . . I ask myself whether all this has really been as I have written it . . . or whether they are not dreams and visions which have come to me while I have slept.” Nevertheless, these dreams and visions are told with a creditable amount of dash and vigour, and in some of them we see Clive, are present at the battle of Plassey, and again endure that night of memorable horror in the Black Hole.

When we began LADY LANARK’S PAYING GUEST, by Gertrude Forde (Chapman and Hall, 6s.), we feared, with some reason, that we were committed to four hundred and twenty-eight closely-printed pages of as conventional a romance as could well be imagined. There is the poverty-stricken dame of high degree with the lofty-minded son who will have a “barren title” to support. There is also the American heiress who is to be chaperoned by the high-born dame “for a consideration.” The heiress is, of course, beautiful and piquante, with the usual outfit of “guesses” and “reckonings,” and a deceased parent whom she can call “Poppa.” The story does, indeed, result in the orthodox manner, but with a refreshing difference from the ordinary routine. We have not the space to describe this difference, but it saves the book from an over-strong flavour of penny novelette.

THE PRESIDENT OF BORAVIA, by George Lambert (Chatto and Windus, 3s. 6d.), revives some old “business” in the Buried Treasure line that has not been much in vogue lately. “All for the love of a lady,” a young Englishman protects the threatened President of an excessively uncomfortable Republic, and goes through many perils for him, even endowing him with most of the treasure. Of course, the President has a lovely daughter—and eventually a son-in-law. The tale is told in a creditably spirited fashion, and the riches tossed lightly about make our mouths water. Five hundred thousand pounds is hardly worth mentioning in Boravia.

NORTHERN LIGHTS (Redway, 3s. 6d. n.) is a volume of psychical stories, by E. D’Espérance. Presumably the author is a lady. It is certain that she has abundant faith in the appearance of disembodied spirits, and in their occasional intervention in human affairs. She has brought together a good deal of material from out-of-the-way places—from Scandinavia, Bavaria, the Tyrol, and the country of the Wends—and whatever the authorities on spiritualistic matters may say as to the credibility of her stories, they are undeniably interesting. As a rule, she writes brightly and prettily; the few exceptions are found where she attempts to force the pathetic note. The story called “The Mill Stream,” for example, is written almost entirely in a sort of blank verse, which produces, after a short time, an indescribably exasperating effect. But most of the stories are distinctly good, and the supernatural element is not handled at all in the hackneyed manner. “The Light of Pentraginny” is the last, and also one of the best, in the collection.

THE MISTAKE OF MONICA, by Nella Parker (Routledge, 6s.), has a time-honoured plot, but this is partly disguised by the modern tone of the treatment. Monica is an attractive and musical young woman with an obviously business-like love affair in the near back-ground. Yet she despairs of her future and marries the first adventurer who proposes to her, with the persuasions of an elderly aunt to back him. Our sympathies are not vitally aroused by the pathos of a damsel who marries the wrong man to please her aunt, but the author certainly carries off her weak plot valiantly and wins our interest for Monica. After supporting the wrong man in comfort until he becomes insupportable, this strangely unsophisticated heroine betakes her to the care of the well-intentioned admirer of her early days. She sacrifices to propriety by an immediate attack of fever, shortly after which the adventurer-husband bicycles down hill into a stone wall, with the happiest results to every one concerned except himself. It is all rather silly, but really very readable.

THE FAITH THAT KILLS, by Emeric Hulme-Beaman (Hurst and Blackett, 6s.). Mr. Hulme-Beaman is certainly bold. He has taken up the idea of murder and suicide clubs where De Quincey, Stevenson, and Barrie had left it, and has developed it for his own purposes in this novel. His previous success in the "Prince's Diamond" proved that, without being a mere imitator, Mr. Hulme-Beaman has it in him to excel in the region of Stevensonian romance, and we gladly admit that his boldness has here been justified. Primarily, this is the history of one of those generous, true-hearted men who put their faith in a light woman—the faith that kills. But the thrilling interest of the book lies in the chapters which deal with that last enthralling infirmity of gambling, and describe the meetings of that suicide club which the narrator would have us regard as, in its inception, the disinterested product of an unselfish enthusiasm, where men played for their lives as the only stake which would yield the quintessence of excitement and fear, the whole object of a gambler's existence. Gambling and suicide clubs may perhaps be considered to be not very edifying subjects for a novel. But suicide, as De Quincey said of murder, may be laid hold of by its moral handle, or it may also be treated æsthetically, that is, in relation to good taste. The author manages to treat the matter æsthetically by putting the story into the mouth of the sole survivor of the club, a cynical, good-natured gambler, who is cursed with the exasperating misfortune of being unable to lose at the tables, and whose subtle, unconscious self-portraiture does great credit to the author's powers of characterization. Admirably written (though the accents on the French words set one's teeth on edge), this exciting volume will certainly add to the author's reputation; and leads us to look for still better work in the future. One of its chief merits is that it sends us back once more to the pages of "Murder Considered as a Fine Art," and of "The New Arabian Nights."

Obituary.

Mrs. MARSHALL, who died from pneumonia on the 4th inst. at Leigh Woods, Bristol, was well known as the writer of a series of historical tales, published by Messrs. Seeley, and also of many stories for the young. The value of her work lay in the fact that, while not tiresome or didactic, it never failed to stimulate, and undoubtedly gave great enjoyment to thousands of readers. Her plan was to take some historical character, such as George Herbert, Bishop Ken, Purcell, Philip Sidney, and weave round it a graceful story. Her talent was not likely to become widely famous, but it enjoyed its full share of grateful recognition. The good influence exerted by her work was even more powerfully felt by those who came into direct communication with her personality. Among the most popular of her books were "Under Salisbury Spire," "Penshurst Castle," and "Winchester Meads." We have already had occasion in these columns to note the excellence of her last, "Under the Dome of St. Paul's."

Mr. CHARLES HENRY COOTE, who had been employed for forty-one years in the British Museum, was a contributor to the "Encyclopædia Britannica" and the "Dictionary of National Biography," and a high authority on the subject of old maps. In 1878 he published a paper on "Shakspeare's new map in Twelfth Night"; in 1888 he edited, with an introduction and bibliography, "A Reproduction of Johann Schöner's Globe of 1523"; and in 1894-95 he supplied the explanatory letterpress of F. Muller and Co.'s reproductions of "Remarkable maps of the Fifteenth, Sixteenth, and Seventeenth Centuries." He also wrote the introduction to the Earl of Crawford's "Autotype Facsimiles of Three Mappemondes," and prepared for the Hakluyt Society "Early Voyages and Travels to Russia and Persia," and published, with prologue and notes, "The Voyage from Lisbon to India in 1505-6 by Albericus Vesputius."

Mr. BENJAMIN VINCENT, for many years keeper of the library of the Royal Institution, was a diligent worker in the more laborious fields of literature. Among other undertakings, he assisted in editing "Flügel's German Dictionary" (learning the language for the purpose in a few weeks), compiled an index to the persons, places, and subjects mentioned in the Bible, superintended the preparation of the seventh and later editions of "Haydn's Dictionary of Dates," and brought out a companion "Dictionary of Biography." His classified catalogue of the books in the Royal Institution Library was an admirable work of his kind. Like Faraday, who was his friend and patron, Mr. Vincent was a Sandemanian.

PROFESSOR LUDWIG BÜCHNER, who died recently, was a prominent German disciple of Darwin, and a successful popularizer of the doctrines of materialism. His best known book, "Kraft und Stoff," appeared in 1855, when it excited great hostility, and it obliged its author to resign a lectureship at Tübingen and earn his living by practising as a physician at Darmstadt.

A SPEECH BY THACKERAY.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—The thirteenth and last volume of Thackeray's works which Messrs. Smith, Elder, and Co. have just published contains on page lxii. of the introduction what purports to be the report of a speech delivered by Thackeray on the occasion of the thirteenth anniversary festival of the Royal Theatrical Fund, held at the Freemason's Tavern on March 29, 1858. It is certainly not generally known that the speeches of the actors and eminent men of letters who were present on that occasion—Dickens and Buckstone among the number, with Thackeray as chairman—were printed and circulated immediately after the termination of the proceedings in the form of a pamphlet which must, unless good reason be shown to the contrary, be taken to report accurately what was said by those who appealed to a large audience of something like 200 friends of the Royal Theatrical Fund. This pamphlet is extremely difficult to meet with, as many pamphlets, old or new, often are, and it is solely through the kindness of Mr. W. T. Spencer that I am able to draw attention to the rather singular circumstance that the speech quoted in the recently published volume of Thackeray's works is so unlike that reproduced in the pamphlet that the two may almost be described as essentially different. Dickens also spoke on the same occasion, and the reports of what he said as given respectively in the pamphlet and in Herne Shepherd's "Speeches of Charles Dickens," published by Messrs. Chatto and Windus in 1884, may also be fairly looked upon in the light of different addresses altogether. As an instance of the disparities to which I refer the following may be quoted from the pamphlet. It has reference to the procedure of Thespis who, according to Plutarch, was accustomed to declaim from a wagon:—

Having witnessed his performance Solon sent for Thespis—the great Solon had a large stick in his hand at the time. Thespis came up, and he said to the poor wandering manager, "Sir! how dare you utter such a parcel of nonsense and lies before any public assembly?" In vain Thespis protested that an actor did not of necessity guarantee the truth of all the words he uttered. "Sir! Begone," continued Solon, "the man who would tell such fibs from the stage would not hesitate to forge a bill of exchange."

This incident appears in the new volume of Thackeray's collected works as follows:—

Well, the great Solon having attended one of poor Thespis' performances, sent for that wandering manager when the piece was over and, it is recorded, flapped his cane down upon the ground and said to Thespis, "How dare you utter such a number of lies as I have heard you tell from your wagon. A man who will tell fibs in a play will forge a contract."

To make a schedule of the many points in difference existing in the two reports, the additions and omissions, would be a laborious and, perhaps, unprofitable task, for the editor of the pamphlet, whoever he was, may, after all, have taken it upon himself to revise and correct the orators' parts of speech much in the same way as Sir William D'Avenant is said to have "amended and polished" the language of Shakespeare. Or he may even have given his own reflections on Theopis and matters theatrical in his own language. This we shall probably never know, though it may, at this point, be not altogether unprofitable to ask, what did Thackeray say?

I am, Sir, yours faithfully,
Carshalton, Surrey. J. H. SLATER.

CLASSICAL METRES.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—In the very friendly and interesting comments which you made last week on my pamphlet on classical metres, I am accused of inconsistency in scanning my lines, a charge which from my point of view is of the utmost gravity. What is the value of a prosody if its rules are not kept? But the fact is that the second of the two lines quoted is not scanned as I intended it to be, or, indeed, as it could be according to my rules. It should be divided thus:—

Thān wĥen | twō dwĥlling | In ōne ā | bōde āre |
āt ōne in | all things.

And not—

āre āt | ōne in | all things which would involve four false quantities. The mistake has arisen I think from the unfortunate spelling of one, which I will not believe is pronounced in any way differently from won. Accordingly the first in and at must both be long by position, and the second in is short before the vowel, as it should be. I do not deny that my rules are arbitrary, often, perhaps, absurd, but to have broken them in the smallest particular would have been unpardonable. That is my only ground for troubling you with this letter.

Yours faithfully,
Radley. W. J. STONE.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—I am pleased to see in your "Notes" in the issue of 6th inst. a defence of the much-abused English hexameter, "that expressive and essentially English rhythm," as you justly call it. You regret that the innumerable verse-writers of the day so very rarely use this metre. It is pleasant to find that some one regrets it, but I am afraid there is one thing which is likely to deter the versifier from employing this rhythm, and that is the poor encouragement he receives when he ventures to do so. In the little volume of verse which Messrs. Macmillan published for me some time ago the principal poem, "Persephone," was written in hexameters. I am not going to defend my work against its critics; no one knows its deficiencies better than myself. But one thing I have learned from my venture—the existence, amongst those whose business it is to review current verse, of an ineradicable prejudice against the English hexameter. In every sort of review, in the scholarly pages of the Saturday, and in the very provincial columns of the provincial newspaper, the same note is sounded. With a few exceptions, the big critics and the little critics alike cannot away with the English hexameter. One cannot tell how far this prejudice is shared by the public. "Evangeline" is popular; but then more than half the readers of "Evangeline" neither know nor care what metre it is written in, or whether it is written in metre at all; they would probably like it just as well if it were written in prose. Of the small public that reads poetry I am afraid very few have taken the trouble to learn even the A B C of prosody. Among the critics, however, I find certain indications that the prejudice I have alluded to is largely due to a failure to recognize that the hexameter in English must be based on accent, not quantity. The critic cannot forget the drilling in quantity he got at school, and, though in all other forms of verse he scans by accent as a matter of course, the moment the hexameter presents itself, the memory of his longs and shorts revives, and all is confusion. One critic, for instance, objects to my use of "taciturn" as a dactyl. Well, I admit that as a dactyl it is unsatisfactory. But my critic contends that it is really an anapaest. This surely is to substitute quantity for accent. Perhaps my cockney ear is at fault; my critic hails from Birmingham, where, doubtless, the English language is spoken with classic purity. However this may be, my experience convinces me that the versifier who attempts to write hexameters is sure of a cold welcome. But perhaps, my vanity misleads me. Perhaps the real truth is that "Persephone" is not "Andromeda;" and, perhaps, the poet who has the talent to produce a really powerful poem in hexameters will find all prejudices give way before him. I sincerely hope it may prove so, and am, Sir, yours truly,

CHARLES CAMP TARELLI.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—In connexion with the account in last week's Literature of Mr. Stone's pamphlet, the enclosed may be of interest:—

SAPPHO'S LITANY.

Thron'd upon light, Thou very God, Love our Queen,
Daughter of God, mystery-worker, hear me!
Spare from all love's weariness and bitterness
My spirit, O Queen!

Come to me! Thou didst come of old, when I call'd, Hearing all my sore supplication out of High Heaven, yea, didst come in answer, and leave
God's palace of gold,

Harnessing to Thy chariot; the love birds,
Making haste, bore Thee to the gloom of our earth,
With the quick beat of many wings, adown mid-
Air from Heaven's height;

Swiftly they came. Then, Blessed Helper, ah! then,
Smiling on me with very face immortal,
Thou wouldest ask: What trouble I had, and why
I summoned Thee;

What was I most fain to have in the wildness
Of passion? "What new love is it wouldest thou Draw to thee by My loving influence? Who,
Psappha, hath hurt thee?"

Though shunning thee, she to-morrow shall ask thee—
Though refusing thy offerings, give herself—
Though kissing thee not, to-morrow to thy lips Press kisses unsought."

Come to me now! and deliver from all my Hard sorrows; and of the longing within me Fulfil all; and be ever, I beseech Thee,
My succour and shield.

From PLATO.

Day Star of the living wast thou once shining among men,
Now thou'rt Ev'ning Star of the dead in Paradise.

SHAKESPEARE AND HERALDS' COLLEGE.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—One of the best known facts in Shakespeare's life is his application in 1596 to Heralds' College for a coat-of-arms, and its rejection. It would be interesting indeed could we discover through the plays which official at the college took upon himself to reject the suit. Suggesting that this may be possible, I venture to call attention to the following circumstances.

At the time of the poet's application a certain Ralph Brooke was York Herald. He appears from his works to have been a learned upholder of the rights of the nobility, argumentative, but also skilled in abuse; a most likely man to see many reasons why the application of a mere stage-player should be rejected. Anyhow, it was rejected, and shortly afterwards (about 1598) The Merry Wives of Windsor appeared with the name of "Brooke" given to Ford, a character particularly serviceable for the purposes of satire. But this is not the only suggestion we get from the play, for the earliest quarto of 1602 contains passages which seem to point to the conclusion that Shakespeare was having his laugh at the herald, as, for instance, that one where Falstaff exclaims :—" M. Brooke, thou shalt see I will predominate ore the peasant." He "predominated" in 1599, when the coat-of-arms was granted to him.

Another suggestive circumstance is the change made in the folio edition of the plays of 1623, in which "Broome" is substituted for "Brooke" throughout. Jaggard, one of the printers, had just previously stated that he would have nothing to do with Brooke, the herald. This was in 1619. A violent quarrel between Brooke and other heralds had been in existence for many years, of which the Court itself had not been unmindful. Might not these facts have induced the promoters of this great enterprise of the folio to safeguard it from attack as far as possible by altering Ford's name to "Broome"? The poet could scarcely have been responsible for the change, for the alteration in the folio spoils in that edition a well-known play upon the name "Brooke" which occurs in the quartos.

How far these suggestions are worthy of credence Shakespearean students may be able to decide. I give them tentatively, feeling that anything adding even remotely to our knowledge of the poet through his plays must be of interest.

Yours faithfully,

25th April, 1899.

SIDNEY H. BURCHELL.

Authors and Publishers.

Mr. Wirt Gerrare, the well-known novelist, author of "The War-Stock," has undertaken to write of Moscow for Mr. J. M. Dent's Medieval Towns Series.

Messrs. Constable announce "James Russell Lowell and his Friends." The author was himself included among the latter, being Dr. Everett Hale, a New England minister.

Mr. C. W. Boyd has been obliged to give up his idea of publishing the Rev. A. K. H. Boyd's diaries and correspondence. It seems that Dr. Boyd had expressed a wish before his death that these papers should not be printed, and, of course, his son has cancelled the arrangements he was making for their appearance.

Sir Walter Besant will follow up his volumes on Westminster and South London with a book on East London. The material which he has collected will first appear as a series of articles in an American magazine.

Mr. Temple Scott's "Book Sales of the Year 1898," which has been so long delayed in its publication, will be ready next week. The introduction contains an examination of the modern book-collector, and offers suggestions for future methods.

A curious book has been edited by the Rev. O. P. Wardell-Yerburgh for Messrs. Longmans, who have it now in the press. It is a collection of marriage addresses by various ecclesiastics, including the Bishop of London, the Bishop of Truro, the Dean of Rochester, the Dean of Norwich, Canon Newbolt, and Canon Body.

A New York paper announces that the Doubleday and McClure Company contemplate issuing a "Kipling Calendar" for 1900. Mr. Kipling's father is said to have had a share in the preparation of the calendar and to have "modelled a plaque representing a profile likeness of the author, flanked by two elephants' heads, with a figure of Mowgli and his jungle companions below."

In Mr. Lewis Melville's forthcoming "Life of Thackeray" will appear some hitherto unpublished reminiscences of the novelist from the note-book of the late Dr. J. M. Cookeley, of Boulogne-sur-Mer, who was Thackeray's doctor in that town. Dr. Cookeley was a descendant of the Dr. Cookeley of Devonshire who found the boy Gifford at the cobbler's stall, and at his own expense sent him to Oxford to be educated. The Boulogne Dr. Cookeley was the father of Mrs. Patchett Martin, the translator of Count de Segur's "An Aide-de-Camp of Napoleon" and of Gyp's "Mariage de Chiffon."

Mr. George Moore has been "fighting the air" with a defence of an author's right to alter a published text. He quotes the examples of Shakespeare, Goethe, Balzac, Wordsworth, Fitzgerald, and Mr. W. B. Yeats. He might also have quoted

Mr. George Meredith. It is a wonder he did not quote the author of "The Heather Field." Messrs. W. H. Smith and Sons would seem to be of the opinion that Mr. Moore has improved "Esther Waters." They refused to take it when it came out, but they are now taking the sixpenny edition. Or can it be that they have recognized they were wrong in excluding the book from their stalls?

Mr. Lionel Cust has in hand a work on Van Dyck which will be produced in a handsome form by Messrs. Bell. Mr. Cust's position as director of the National Portrait Gallery entitles him to speak with authority on a painter whose fame, notwithstanding his foreign origin, is so largely associated with British portraiture.

Mr. Patchett Martin has completed the revision of a poetic play, Isola, founded on a story of Nathaniel Hawthorne's, which he wrote originally in conjunction with the late Miss Clara Lomore (author of "The Love of an Obsolete Woman"), and which contains a careful study of an old medieval savant of Mephistophelian character and habits.

Just as the latest volume (on Winchester) in Messrs. Duckworth's "English Public Schools" Series reaches us, Messrs. Methuen announce "The Annals of Shrewsbury School," by the late Mr. G. W. Fisher, which will be ready early next week. The author, who was an assistant master at the school, and whose death occurred while he was revising the proofs, transcribed many important documents regarding the early history of the school. The book will be profusely illustrated.

We mentioned recently that Mr. E. G. Browne, the Lecturer in Persian at Cambridge, was engaged upon an edition of Dawlatshah's "Tadhkiratu'sh-Shu'arā" ("Memoirs of the Poets"). This work will shortly be published, with indices and apparatus criticus, by Messrs. Luzac in London, and by Messrs. Brill of Leiden. All the most important books of reference on the Persian language and literature exist only in manuscript; while others, though they have been lithographed in the East, are hardly more accessible to European students. It is difficult to obtain copies; the text is inaccurate and illegible, and there are no titles, paragraphs, or indices. To this latter class belongs the "Tadhkiratu'sh-Shu'arā" of Dawlatshah, a work of capital importance to the student of Persian literature. The only edition is that published in Bombay, 1887, which presents in many places a corrupt text and is without the indices or tables of contents.

Of books that are written round about the works of well-known authors there is no end; and we are generally glad to welcome them—for books about the books one appreciates make an irresistible appeal. A new volume of this sort will be found in "Mr. Pickwick's Kent: a Photographic Record of the Tour of the Corresponding Society of the Pickwick Club in Rochester, Chatham, Dingley Dell, Muggleton, Cobham, and Gravesend" (Marshall). The book, which has been written by Mr. Hammond Hall, contains some hitherto unpublished facts, and claims to be the completest guide yet issued to the most interesting chapters of the "Pickwick Papers." It has thirty illustrations, mostly from photographs. A chapter is devoted to the origin of the Wardle family of Dingley Dell.

"From Cromwell to Wellington," which we reviewed the other day, is to be followed immediately by a companion volume, "From Howard to Nelson: Twelve Sailors," from the same firm, Messrs. Lawrence and Bullen. The general editor is Professor Laughton, who contributes a memoir of Lord Howard of Effingham. Sir Frederick Bedford writes on Drake, and Professor Montagu Burrows on Blake, Sir Edward Fremantle on Hawke and Boscawen, and Sir R. Vesey Hamilton on Rodney and Hood. Rooke finds a champion in Rear-Admiral Penrose Fitzgerald and Anson in Vice-Admiral A. H. Markham. Rear-Admiral T. Sturgess Jackson describes the career of Howe, whom Nelson styled "our great master in naval tactics and bravery," and the lives of Lord St. Vincent and Nelson will be by Vice-Admiral Philip H. Colomb.

Mr. E. V. Lucas has edited for Mr. Grant Richards an anthology of prose and verse which might, not inaptly, be termed "A Knapsack Library for Pedestrian and Cyclist." He calls it "The Open Road: a little Book for Wayfarers." In his preface Mr. Lucas says:—"It is just a garland of good or enkindling poetry and prose fitted to urge folk into the open air, and, once there, to keep them glad they came." A book to slip easily from the pocket beneath a tree or among the heather, and provide lazy reading for the time of rest, "with perhaps a phrase or two for the feet to step to and the mind to brood on when the rest is over." Many writers have been exploited for the making of this little tome, and among the list may be mentioned R. L. Stevenson, William Morris, Mrs. Meynell, Mr. Austin Dobson, Mr. Maurice Hewlett, Mr. William Watson, Mr. Robert Bridges, and Mr. Kenneth Grahame. There are to be three editions;

one in limp cloth, one in limp leather, and a third on India paper from the Oxford mills, bound in leather.

Madame Sarah Grand's new story, which is shortly to appear as a serial, is called "Petticoats." As the title suggests, it is of lighter interest and more in the vein of comedy than the books by which she is best known. Still, it forms one of the series of studies of women which began with "Ideals," and which she hopes to continue in future works. The scene is laid in a corner of the country, seventeen miles from a railway station, and it is this condition of the heroine's existence which helps the author to her plot. The proposal made some time ago to dramatize the Boy and the Tenor episode from "The Heavenly Twins" has not yet taken any definite shape.

Sienkiewicz's American publishers (Messrs. Little, Brown, and Co.) are about to issue another of this writer's works, entitled "Sielanka: a Forest Picture," the sixth volume from the Hungarian author's pen. It is composed of several separate items, and included among these will be fourteen short stories, a "dramatic picture" in one act, some miscellaneous papers, and a five-act play. As was the case with "Quo Vadis," Mr. Jeremiah Curtin will prepare the authorized translation of the book.

Mr. J. M. Barrie has practically finished, subject to correction and revision, the long-promised sequel to "Sentimental Tommy." It is to be entitled "Tommy and Grizel," and will exhibit the artistic temperament under the influence of the passion of love.

Mr. Frank Mathew's new historical romance, dealing with the relations of Henry VIII., Anne Bullen, and Cromwell, will make something of a new departure by reproducing portraits, after Holbein, of the three leading characters. Another equally interesting innovation will be found in the fact that the binding will be copied from a design used in Henry VIII.'s library.

It has generally been taken for granted that the works of Mr. George Meredith were unsuited to the taste of the proletariat. We are glad to see that Messrs. Newnes think otherwise and are issuing "The Ordeal of Richard Feverel" in a sixpenny edition. Taking advantage of the discount price, this masterpiece of fiction is now to be obtained by almost any one who can read.

With reference to our note on Sir Sherston Baker in our last week's issue, the editor of the Law Magazine and Review asks us to state that Sir Sherston resigned the editorship at the end of 1897, though he has since contributed to the paper.

Another "hundred best books" is coming from Messrs. Stoneham, who offer them at £9 9s.

Another volume of the works of Nietzsche (whose "Genealogy of Morals" we review in this issue)—Nietzsche Contra Wagner—is announced by Mr. Fisher Unwin.

Messrs. T. and T. Clark announce "The Autobiography and Diary of the Late Samuel Davidson, DD., LL.D.," edited by his daughter. The book will contain an account of the Davidson controversy by Mr. J. A. Picton.

Mr. Eugene Mason, whose "Flamma Vestalis" was included in the Cameo Series, is issuing another volume of poems, the title of which is to be "The Field Floridas."

"Hood in Scotland," by Alexander Elliot, which was published in 1885, has been out of print for some time, but a second edition has now been issued by Messrs. J. P. Mathew, of Dundee. It contains much authentic information regarding the humorist, which is not to be met with elsewhere.

THE BALZAC CENTENARY.

"La mort est le sacre du génie," said the great writer, who was born at Tours just a hundred years ago. A volume might be profitably written on that text, but, here and now, the only necessary comment on it is that, although Balzac has been dead for almost fifty years, we have not yet reached a sufficient distance in time from his strange and meteoric career to see it steadily and see it whole. Both the man and the writer still afford ground for the kind of argument and disentanglement of myths which we associate with the names of Homer, Shakespeare, or Villon—stars that are hard to register exactly on account of their distance or their nebulousity. In the case of Balzac both causes contribute to the imperfection of our knowledge. His life has not yet been adequately written; indeed, there is no account of it in French so good, on the whole, as the excellent compilation of his American translator, Miss Katharine Wormeley. The chief authority on the subject has pointed out that Balzac the man is very inadequately known to the world as yet. He loved to surround his life with a veil of mystery, to be inaccessible to his most intimate friends when the fancy seized him, to emerge like Jupiter from the cloud, to spend twenty feverish days in a printing-office and leave a masterpiece behind him as he disappeared again into obscurity. The continual embarrassment of his finances, a very Penelope's web for intricacy, the need for discretion in his Platonic friendships, are but two of the main causes of this love of secrecy. The very date of Balzac's birth seems to be still imperfectly known; his baptismal certificate declares that it was the 20th of May, 1799; but his sister, followed by most who have written upon him, stated it to be the 16th. The best original authorities for his life—Madame de Surville and Théophile Gautier—evidently reserved much that they might have told; in the accounts of Balzac given by others of his contemporaries and friends it is never very easy to distinguish between fact and fiction. Indeed, it has been said, with some approach to the truth, that Balzac's whole life was a colossal hallucination. More than any other novelist that we can remember did he live in a world of his own creation. The stories which are current, such as that of his requesting Jules Sandeau not to talk about his sister's illness but to turn to the real world and discuss the affairs of Eugénie Grandet, probably bear witness to something more than that absorption in literary work which is usually deduced from them. Balzac was like the child so well described by Stevenson: "making believe" was the gist of his whole life, and he could not so much as take a walk, or read his play to the actors, or bargain with a publisher, except in character. It was his lot to "walk in a vain show, and among mists and rainbows." Perhaps no biographer will ever succeed in giving us the true and life-like story of that wonderful career which endowed the world with so many masterpieces and the papermakers with so much raw material. At any rate, among all the celebrations of this centenary, it does not seem to have occurred to any competent person that the best of all would be a definite life of Balzac.

Balzac himself says, in one of his letters, that the greatest men are those who stand in no need of the biographer, who are not indebted to him even for the inane munus of an epitaph. "The only good epitaphs are those contained in a single name—La Fontaine—Masséna—Molière—one single name which says everything and makes one ponder over it." Such an epitaph is his at Père-la-Chaise, where the monument of David bears but the name of Balzac and the title of the "Comédie Humaine." After all, that tells the whole story. The House of Molière has been playing Mercadet at Tours, and a new little play in Paris, but these are hors d'œuvres, as, with some regret, one must pronounce even the brilliant "Contes Drolatiques," the finest piece of sincere flattery that has been inspired by Balzac's fellow Tourangeau, the "prince de toute sapience et de toute comédie." But it is on the "Comédie Humaine" that Balzac's definite reputation alone rests, and on the mass of it, not on separate stories. It is only since the appearance of the almost complete translation of the forty volumes which Mr. Saintsbury has lately edited that the English reader can pretend to appreciate Balzac, for the mere reading of detached fragments, even of "Père Goriot" and "Eugénie Grandet," gives no real impression of his greatness. He is one of the writers who must be judged "all in all or not at all." A smaller reputation may be made and sustained by the innate excellence of a very tiny achievement. Gray and FitzGerald, Villon and Sappho and Prévost, to take the names haphazard, have their secure niches in the House of Fame by reason of a mere handful of work. But when it is a question of climbing the very highest pinnacles in that much ornamented building, quantity must be taken into account as well as quality: by a curious paradox, an author climbs higher the more weight he has to carry. Shakespeare and Goethe, Balzac and Scott and Thackeray must be judged by the mass of their good work, which has a cumulative effect far surpassing the sum of the units.

To praise Balzac, however, now that the celebrations are practically over, is a work of supererogation, just as it would be out of place to direct attention to his obvious faults. But it is well to put on record the number of English-speaking readers to whom the "big yellow books, quite impudently French," have been a striking revelation of a new world. The true "Balzac fever" generally leads to intellectual, as other ailments are said to lead to physical growth. When it gets fairly hold of a young reader, most other books seem tame and flat for the time being, and few occupations are better worth while than to roam in the wondrous world which (as some say) Balzac dreamt and France has since been trying to reproduce. The mood is not permanent, but few experiences are more apt to stir up and re-arrange a young man's views of life than this temporary absorption in an environment so strange and a humanity so familiar. Balzac's aim, of course, was not to invent, but to describe. In the remarkable preface which now stands as a manifesto at the head of the "Comédie Humaine," though it was not written till half the work was done, he has told us how his intention was to do for human society what Cuvier and Geoffroi St. Hilaire had done for the lower animals. Besides the representation of all human types, their environment also came into Balzac's plan, whose subject was simply "l'homme et la vie." That, of course, is the subject which all novelists propose to themselves, but none has yet attempted it at once on so vast a plan and in so scientific a spirit. Balzac died, worn out, in mid-career, and left his plan only half executed. Yet the gigantic fragment which exists will for all time bear witness to what Mr. James has truly called its author's incomparable power. For the moment, the contests which are always raging about Balzac's name in France, the old argument whether he was a realist or an idealist, the search into his methods, and the hunt for his originals, may be allowed to rest. Just now there is only need to express gratitude for the "rich and complicated legacy" which Balzac left the world. The time of criticism will return: to-day it is enough to say of Balzac, "Peace to his ashes! he was a very great man."

Not even the sacred precincts of the editorial department nor the study of the anonymous reviewer are hidden from the eagle eye of Mr. Sherlock Holmes. Under the pseudonym of "Conan Doyle" in last Monday's Daily Chronicle he unveils the latest mystery of the literary world. The crime is the heinous act committed by the reviewer who deals with the same book in several publications. Next as to the clue. Who but a Sherlock Holmes or a "Baconian" would find anything but innocence in the following:—"Claudius Clear, A Man of Kent, O. O."? With the help of these bare signs Mr. Doyle discovers that the writer of two different columns in the British Weekly and a contributor to the Sketch are one and the same critic. Nor is this all. The same wicked pluralist who is editor of the Bookman, and sends a letter at the same time to the New York Bookman, "frequently expresses his opinion of any important new book in the anonymous columns of a daily paper."

Apart from the particular case, on which the reviewer in question has himself replied, what is the remedy for the evil in general—what is to prevent the same writer from perpetrating several reviews of the same book, the author from being crushed by the same hand in all quarters? The remedy suggested by Mr. Doyle seems to us to be worse than the evil. "In the last resort (he says) we have one final method of ensuring fair play. A combination of authors who are opposed to wire-pulling and pluralism would easily, either acting independently or through the Society of Authors, break down this pernicious system." This remedy would surely involve a more pernicious tyranny than that of the pluralist over the author—viz., that of the author over the critic. Any system which might possibly allow an author to have a word in deciding who shall or shall not review his book—or still worse his rival's book—would be contrary to the first principles of fair criticism.

Another objection to Mr. Doyle's "final method of ensuring fair play" is, that it is one of those remedies which decrease in effectiveness in direct proportion to the increase in the gravity of the abuse. "It is obvious," he says, "that four or five such critics" as those he complains of "would cover the whole critical press of London": and in such a case, therefore, the protest of the combination of authors would apparently have to take the form of denying their books the advantage of advertisement in any metropolitan organ of criticism whatsoever. We doubt whether that would be a form of reprisal which would commend itself to publishers even from the strictly business point of view. On the moral objections to the proposed introduction of the practice of "exclusive dealing" Mr. Doyle does not touch, though he can hardly be unaware of them. They are indeed patent, and to most people connected in any capacity with the profession of letters will, we should hope, be decisive. It is not to be expected but that conflicts of opinion and of interest should arise from time to time between authors, critics, and publishers, but they can surely fight out their battles in a more civilized fashion than by importing the barbarous weapon of the "boycott." Mr. Doyle, we are glad to observe, would be loth to see it used "unless it were necessary for the higher interests of literature." If that proviso be insisted on we shall never see it used at all.

Last Saturday saw the final performance, at the Irish Literary Theatre in Dublin, of The Countess Cathleen and The Heather Field—the latter a new play, which we reviewed on Feb. 4th. The former play, as it touched Irishmen very nearly both on the national and religious side, clearly gave them a welcome opportunity for some free fighting, and during the past few weeks the Dublin papers have indulged in that occupation. The Freeman's Journal found in the plays "a splendid evidence of the vitality of the Irish intellect, and of the resurgence of Irish genius," and saw in the dissatisfaction of part of the audience at the performance of Mr. Yeats' The Countess Cathleen only "the protest of less than a dozen disorderly boys, who evidently mistook the whole moral significance of the play." The Daily Nation, another Roman Catholic journal, was proportionately indignant with the play as both blasphemous and insulting to the Irish peasant: it applauded the "emphatic and eloquent protest against the outrage," which showed "right and patriotic feeling on the part of loyal-hearted young Irishmen," and obtained an adverse opinion on the play from Cardinal Logue, who had not read the play, but only other adverse criticisms on it.

The Irish Times, a paper of a different school, stated well the main point which caused all the trouble:—

The idea of The Countess Cathleen is the redeeming of the souls of starving peasants who have sold their religious convictions for gold, by the sacrifice of her own soul. If there is one thing more clearly crystallized in the history of Ireland and of the entire Celtic nation, it is that physical pain never yet cost the damnation of a spiritual idea, so far as the Irish peasant was concerned.
